There are ample grounds to argue that Swiss neutrality was a contradiction in terms. The back doors of some notionally Swiss-controlled arms factories straddled the border and opened inside Germany. According to the Stuart Eizenstat's report to Congress, nearly 40 percent of all the Third Reich's arms deals were handled by the Swiss.[1] The principal focus of the Eizenstat report was on gold bullion stolen by the Nazi regime from ten occupied nations. Even with this inquiry, less than two-thirds of these assets were able to be traced: some $2 billion worth of bullion is still listed as 'disappeared'.

The overwhelming majority of Europe's wealth lay, however, not in national treasuries, but in private hands. Tens of billions of dollars' worth of gems, currency, and corporate assets had also been taken by Hitler's minions. The Eizenstat report did not even look at the fate of these vast holdings.

The story of Hitler's stolen treasure actually began in 1919 in the aftermath of World War I. Then, as now, there was controversy over the tracing of German money. The victorious Allies had imposed harsh financial penalties; German assets held in foreign banks were seized as war reparations. In the 1920s the international banking industry was thrown into turmoil as it struggled to return to the delicate financial balance that had existed before the war.

The current generation of Zürich bankers is not alone in knowing the key role played by the Vatican in laundering the Nazis' money. Many others in the world of international finance in the late 1990s also understand how these events in the early decades of this century connect directly to the Holy See and the Nazis' stolen treasure. Many in the American and British financial and industrial establishments are also aware of what really went on because they have inherited the key to the puzzle – both literally and figuratively – from their fathers and grandfathers.

Outside of this select group, however, few remember that the German Kaiser himself – arguably one of the greatest personal losers in the post–World War I vengeance of Versailles – had found an American law firm willing to take on the unpopular cause of getting his money back. But then, Sullivan & Cromwell was a most unusual firm, and John Foster Dulles, the Kaiser's personal attorney, was a most unusual lawyer.[2]

During the Versailles negotiations in 1919, Foster Dulles lobbied to protect his German clients. The subsequent Congressional investigations determined that Foster Dulles may have been the 'bagman' for bribes going all the way to Harry Daugherty, the Attorney General of the United States. Daugherty was indicted, but Dulles evaded criminal sanctions and returned to his New York practice, where he was soon joined by his brother Allen.

Foster specialized in a very profitable practice: he became the lawyer of choice for those wealthy people unfortunate enough to be on the wrong side of a war. The Kaiser was only his first German client. By the end of the 1920s Sullivan & Cromwell represented most of the leading banks of Berlin and Bavaria.

The 1920s and early 1930s were a profitable time for American investors in Germany. The break up of the American cartels at the end of the nineteenth century, followed by Teddy Roosevelt's 'trust-busting' legislation in the 1910s, induced the early multinational corporations to seek a more friendly clime offshore. Germany not only permitted cartels and vertical monopolies, it encouraged them as a means to rebuild its industrial might after the devastation of World War I and the Versailles reparations.

Moreover, from the late 1920s the German economy, although cash poor, was scientifically advanced. As the Weimar Republic began to disintegrate under the weight of internal chaos and external greed, German scientists, sponsored by German corporations, led the world in research in physics, chemistry, and biology. So esteemed was the German intellectual edge at the end of the 1920s that American scientists who wished to make their mark would take their advanced degree at a German university.

Effectively, Germany had a virtual high-tech monopoly on advanced production techniques, rigidly reinforced through a system of worldwide patents that gave it a decided advantage. If the Du Pont Corporation, for example, wanted a license for chemical processes, it had to deal with Berlin.

Sullivan & Cromwell's American clients, in turn, had something that the Germans wanted badly: gold. Under the Versailles Treaty, Germany had to pay its reparations to the Allies in gold bullion. In 1924, Sullivan & Cromwell stepped into the breach with the ingenious Dawes Plan. In its simplest form, the Dulles brothers' clients would loan gold to Germany, so that it could repay its reparations to France and Britain, which would then recycle the American gold to repay their war loans to America. It was a crazy merry-go-round, but it worked.

The attraction for Sullivan & Cromwell's clients was that the Germans paid off the original American gold loans with stock in German corporations. Unlike the hyperinflated Deutsch mark, German stocks and bonds were far from worthless, as they were backed by the very patents and trade secrets that American industry so desperately sought.

With the crash of 1929, the American economy went into the Great Depression, but simultaneously Sullivan & Cromwell's clients poured billions into the German economy. For example, John Foster Dulles's legal records show that he handled the transfer of $10 billion worth of gold in return for German bonds and investments. By some estimates, 70 percent of the money that went to rebuild the German economy after World War I came from Wall Street investors, most of whom sought the legal counsel of Sullivan & Cromwell.[3]

By the 1930s the total American gold investment in Germany may well have been on the order of $60 billion in today's values. By comparison, the Eizenstat report says that the entire value of the gold stolen by the Nazis during World War II was less than $6 billion, hardly enough to meet the interest payments on the American gold loans.

The American investors did not send their gold to Germany for nothing. In return, they obtained patent rights at well below their market worth, as well as access to newly developed advanced technology. Of course, something of a stigma attached itself to German investments straight after World War I. In addition, there was the distinct risk that the American investments might be seized in some future conflict as war reparations. Through their expertise in the Trading With the Enemy Act, Sullivan & Cromwell's lawyers found a place to hide the foreign investments: Switzerland.

The Americans secretly owned the stock in certain Swiss banks, including a significant share in the Bank of International Settlements, as well as undetermined interests in several others such as Credit Suisse and Union Bank. These institutions were also represented by Sullivan & Cromwell at key points before World War II. The Swiss banks, in turn, owned significant stock interests in several of the leading German banks (again represented by Sullivan & Cromwell), which in turn owned the stock of major German corporations, such as I. G. Farben (also represented by Sullivan & Cromwell), which in turn owned the valuable patent rights and processes so desperately desired by the American investors, such as the Rockefellers (represented, inevitably, by Sullivan & Cromwell).

On paper, the Americans owned only bank shares in neutral Switzerland. The effect, however, was as if they had bought major shareholdings in the German corporations. Everyone swapped paper to protect their investments. So great was the cross-collaterization of loans and patent rights that, after the Rockefellers, the next largest investor in the Standard Oil Company was I. G. Farben. It was hard to tell where American investment ended and German management began.

Of course, the Americans were not alone in buying German shares during the Great Depression. A substantial number of British corporations, such as Imperial Chemicals, were also involved in this profitable enterprise. By the time the Deutsch mark stabilized in the early 1930s, the Western investors were sitting on a not so small fortune.

The secret strings of German investment were held by American lawyers sitting on the boards of German banks and corporations. Allen Dulles, for example, sat on the board of the Schröder Bank, with offices in London, New York, and Berlin. Ostensibly owned by a prominent German banking family, the real controllers were Sullivan & Cromwell's clients.

Correspondent banks, such as Schröder, handled their transactions through the Bank of International Settlements (BIS) in Switzerland, whose director, William McKittrick, was personally represented by Allen Dulles both before World War II and after. Despite the fact that the BIS was targeted for dismemberment by the Allies after the war as a Nazi front, it never was.

John Foster Dulles served on the board of I. G. Farben, the company that was largely responsible for later building Auschwitz, and then became legal counsel to the US agency responsible for seizing German assets. I. G. Farben was never dismembered and 'de-Nazified' after World War II, despite the direct orders of General Dwight Eisenhower.

Sullivan & Cromwell's expertise in 'cloaking' foreign investments, as well as their capacity to protect their clients from the Trading With the Enemy Act, made the Dulles brothers attractive to some of the largest investment houses in America, including Dillon Read and Brown Brothers, Harriman. Represented by the able lawyers of Sullivan & Cromwell, such investment houses promoted German cross-investment in America.

Up until America entered World War II, there was technically nothing illegal about investing in Germany. It wasn't as if American corporate leaders were investing in the Nazi party. Quite the opposite, most American investors preferred the more stolid German monarchists to the upstart Hitler. Besides, the bulk of American funds had gone to Germany in the late 1920s before Nazism was anything more than a fad. To Sullivan & Cromwell, petty nationalist disputes should never interfere with international banking and commerce.

It is hard to believe now, but fifty or sixty years ago, Nazism was seen as a good thing by many foreign investors. Fascism, so it was thought, was simply an external manifestation of the attitudes of the conservative German people who were traditionally hostile towards Communists and labor unions. Some of the most prominent and respected German industrialists – such as the Thyssen family and the Brooklyn-born Hjalmar Schacht – reassured the American investors that Hitler was simply 'a dog on a chain' to keep the left out of power in Germany.

People such as Henry Ford and the Rockefellers admired a great deal in the new Nazi philosophy. While most Americans still favored the German establishment, they sought to cover their bets by financing the infant Nazi party as well.

Sullivan & Cromwell's clients were not the only foreign investors in Germany, nor were they the only ones to hedge their bets by making small donations to the infant Nazi party. Following the $26 million cash settlement with Mussolini over disputed lands in 1929, the Vatican invested nearly all the proceeds in German industry, but at least one small investment was made in the Nazis as well. The following incident was reported by an eyewitness, Sister Pascalina, a nun who was the personal aide (and devout admirer) of the Papal Nuncio in Munich and the man who would become Pope Pius XII on the eve of World War II:

> Hitler came one night to the holy residence of Archbishop Eugenio Pacelli [later Pius XII]. All others in the household were asleep by then, except [Sister] Pascalina . . . Hitler told Pacelli that he was out to check the spread of aetheistic communism . . . It did not come as a surprise to her, therefore, > in light of Pacelli's hatred of the Reds, to see the prelate present Hitler with a large cache of Church money to aid the rising revolutionary and his small struggling band of anti-communists.[4]

It should be noted that Pacelli deeply despised Nazism as a philosophy, although he was actively pro-German. The Vatican was merely protecting its heavy financial investment in German industry in case Hitler ever came to power, while Pacelli really supported the Catholic Center Party.

In fact, the Dulles brothers' neglect of the infant Nazi party actually caused them some problems. By 1932, the Nazis were denouncing Foster Dulles's principal client, I. G. Farben, 'as an exploitive tool' of the 'money-hungry Jews'. In June 1932, two I. G. Farben officials met with Hitler in his home in Munich to try to make peace, and a deal was made: Hitler would leave I. G. Farben alone in return for heavy backing by the German industrialists. Both I. G. Farben and the huge Giesche conglomerate, another of Dulles's clients, backed Hitler financially in the 1933 elections.

Following the Nazis' electoral success in January 1933, Hitler sought to distance himself from his foreign backers with the bank disclosure law that forced a flood of German money over the border into Switzerland. This forced the Dulles's clients to create a protective barrier of Swiss bank stock to insulate them from Hitler detecting their continued control of the major German corporations.

It is no coincidence that the Swiss passed a law in 1934 making disclosure of Swiss bank accounts a crime. In the same year, Sullivan & Cromwell officially closed its Berlin office. From 1934, Switzerland was the center of the Dulles brothers' operations. With so much of its own holdings tied up in Nazi Germany, the Vatican had little option but to adopt the same course.

The Holy See devised a special shield to help protect it from the looming international conflict – its own financial institution, the Vatican Bank. This was the one monetary entity in the world that was completely immune from outside audits, protected by Vatican sovereignty, and with the added convenience of diplomatic immunity.

During the War, the Dulles brothers and the Vatican were drawn into a symbiotic relationship: Sullivan & Cromwell's investors needed the Vatican Bank to launder their profits under the watchful eyes of both the Nazis and their own governments, while the Vatican needed the Dulles brothers to protect its own investments in Hitler's Germany.

After America entered the war in 1941, Allen Dulles managed to transfer his headquarters from America to Switzerland. While ostensibly representing US intelligence (the Office of Strategic Services), Dulles also had ties to the Bank of International Settlements (BIS) through his Schröder Bank connections (not to mention that the director of BIS was Dulles's personal client).

In an admission that confirmed our long-held suspicions, the BIS has recently conceded that it purchased $4 billion worth of gold from the Nazis during World War II.[5] In relative terms, this is a minor transaction compared to the Dulles brothers' banking operations. For example, on one occasion alone the Dulleses' clients laundered 9 billion francs through the BIS on the eve of the 'secret' American invasion of North Africa in 1942.[6]

This is the first documented instance to show that Dulles's BIS clients and the Vatican collaborated on financial deals in Switzerland even while the war was going on. According to a sworn statement from Nazi official Otto Abetz to American officials on 21 June 1946:

> German bankers, along with their French correspondents, transferred 9 billion gold francs via the BIS to Algiers. Anticipating German defeat, they were seeking a killing in the dollar exchange. The collaborationists boosted their holdings from $350 to $525 million almost overnight . . . Another collaborator in the scheme was one of the Vatican's espionage group who leaked the secret to others in Hitler's high command.[7]

By 1944, Allen Dulles's Vatican connections had grown so close that he began to use them in private intelligence operations that aimed to protect both their investments. From Switzerland, Dulles used Vatican intermediaries in an abortive attempt to arrange for the surrender of German forces in Italy. One of the Nazi negotiators was Walter Rauff, the inventor of the poison-gas vans used to massacre Jews, whose work on the Vatican's Ratlines is discussed in Chapters Two and Eleven of this book.

After his arrest by the Allies, Rauff openly boasted of high-level connections in the Vatican negotiations, which he claimed could be 'confirmed by Hussman and Mr. Dulles, Allied agents in Switzerland'. Needless to say, Rauff and the other Nazis linked to Allen Dulles were quietly released with the help of James Jesus Angleton, Dulles's Catholic protégé in Italy and later head of the CIA's Vatican desk.[8]

The path from Dulles to Rauff leads to an interesting man, Frederico Schwendt, one of Rauff's colleagues in the SS. Schwendt was the head of what was then the largest counterfeiting operation in history: Operation Wendig (Window). As the Russian Army advanced towards Berlin, the SS swapped forged banknotes for genuine British currency held in the German banks and then spread the forgeries far and wide in an attempt to undermine the Allies' financial strength. It was just one small part of a much wider operation to smuggle German capital out from under the Allies' watchful eyes and send it to safety via the Vatican.

Anticipating defeat, Schwendt shipped the genuine British currency to a castle in Merano through the Brenner Pass to the Vatican Bank. An unverified FBI report that recently surfaced in the American press claims that the proceeds of the Deutsche Bank later ended up in Argentina, after key Nazis smuggled them through the Vatican. Other intelligence reports, however, are indisputably corroborated.

On 23 July 1997, the US National Archives faxed us a copy of a Top Secret document that had recently been declassified. It was a report from Emerson Bigelow, an intelligence officer of the Strategic Services Unit.[9] The SSU was an interim spy organization that existed between the end of the Office of Strategic Services and the creation of the Central Intelligence Agency. The intelligence report was 'received from a reliable source in Italy' and was forwarded to the US Treasury Department on 21 October 1946.

In Chapter Six of this book we set out the detailed evidence of Father Draganović's role in smuggling large amounts of the Ustashi's plundered treasure and gold to safety in Rome. The Bigelow report independently demonstrated the Vatican's involvement in smuggling Nazi gold out of Switzerland to the safety of the Vatican Bank, and eventually on to the Nazi diaspora in South America.

This recently released report confirmed several key pieces of US Army CIC evidence about the Vatican gold connection on which we had relied in the first edition of this book. According to Bigelow's separate sources, a large portion of Nazi gold stolen by Ante Pavelić and his fellow Croatian war criminals had, indeed, ended up in the Vatican Bank:

> The Ustascha organization (a Croatian fascist organization, headed by Ante Pavelic) removed funds from Jugoslavia estimated to total 350 million Swiss francs. The funds were largely in the form of gold coins.

> Of the funds brought from the former Independent Croat State where Jews and Serbs were plundered to support the Ustascha organization in exile, an estimated 150 million Swiss Francs were impounded by British authorities at the Austro-Swiss frontier; the balance of approximately 200 million Swiss Francs was originally held in the Vatican for safe-keeping. According to rumor, a considerable portion of this latter amount has been sent to Spain and Argentina through the Vatican's "pipeline," but it is quite possible that this is merely a smoke-screen to cover the fact that the treasure remains in its original depository.

Bigelow was right to suspect a smoke screen. As discussed in Chapter Six of this book, a few months after the Bigelow report, Special Agent William Gowen of the US Army Counter Intelligence Corps established that the British had taken the Ustashi money to Italy 'accompanied by a number of priests'. British intelligence, instead of seizing the stolen assets, passed them to the Vatican to finance an anti-Communist Croatian terrorist network known as the Križari.[10]

Father Draganović, the key Vatican organizer of the Ratlines and a major intelligence source inside the Vatican, later admitted that in 1945 400 kilos of Ustashi gold, worth millions of dollars, had been hidden in Austria, and he had personally moved 40 kilos to Rome concealed in two packing crates.[11]

But this 400 kilos of gold was just a tiny part of the Vatican's role in hiding and moving Nazi plunder. Eighteen months after the Bigelow report, US Army intelligence confirmed the existence of a Vatican-Swiss bank connection. They reported that 2,400 kilos of gold and other valuables (worth more than $30 million at today's gold prices) still remained in the Vatican's secret accounts in Switzerland. But how to get it out? And where to hide it? The Vatican's key courier for the Ustashi's stolen gold in Switzerland was the Slovene quisling Bishop Rožman, who arranged to send it to Italy and later to Pavelić in Argentina.[12]

Yugoslavia was not the only looted nation. Mark Masurovsky, an instructor at the American University, discovered a US Treasury report concerning the Nazi bank of Hungary. According to this report from the files of Operation Safehaven (the US operation to track down and intercept Nazi financial assets), Allen Dulles had smuggled the Hungarian Nazi treasury to safety in Switzerland toward the end of the war. He was accused of manipulating the gold transfer with the assistance of a German businessman, whom Dulles had ostensibly recruited for intelligence work for the Allies. Dulles denied all the charges, insisting that the Allies had no proof.[13]

In fact, the ultimate proof of the Swiss bank scandal has been buried in classified files for many years. Allen Dulles did not know it, but President Franklin Roosevelt's agents, working with the British, had broken the Swiss bank codes used in their telegram traffic. Moreover, the electronic spy service of the Nazi Airforce had deciphered Dulles's private cipher code. After the war, these intercepts fell into Allied hands and have remained hidden in the vaults at Fort Meade, Maryland, and at Cheltenham, England.

Even if both governments resist handing over their Swiss bank wiretaps on the grounds of national security, the Vatican secret will still emerge. As outlined earlier in this book, in 1967 the Vatican's top Nazi smuggler, Father Draganović, surrendered himself to the Yugoslav government and gave a secret confession that was later smuggled out to the authors. It is certain that Father Draganović gave the Communists a comprehensive account of the Vatican's Swiss bank connection.

Slowly, the secret files have emerged, and the jigsaw puzzle has been put back together using sources from the old Soviet bloc, declassified files in Washington, Rome, Canberra, Buenos Aires, and even London. The only source still completely closed is within the walls of the Holy See, buried somewhere in the Vatican's Secret Archives.

On Sunday, 24 August 1997, the Chicago Tribune published a front-page story headlined, 'WWII files of Vatican need airing, critics say; some believe church helped hoard wealth of fascism's victims'. Long before the Vatican opens its vaults for inspection, the records are emerging from Argentina, the former Yugoslavia, Washington, London, and other capitals that know some piece of Pope Pius XII's secret. In each of these countries, the trail of laundered Nazi money leads inexorably back to the Vatican.

Further confirmation of the central role played by the Vatican in the Nazi money laundering scheme was recently uncovered by Stuart Eizenstat's team in the US State Department. In March 1998 the US News and World Report cited new evidence that the laundering had been going on even during World War II.[14] Eizenstat's team has traced at least one significant money transfer from a Nazi-controlled bank in Berlin to the Vatican Bank in Rome. Even though the Holy See keeps its financial records safely under lock and key, the truth keeps seeping out from the secret files held in the Allied archives.

Few who watch the film Evita would recognize that the Perón family of Argentina worked directly with the Croatian Ustashi to establish a pipeline from the Vatican Bank. As recounted earlier in this book, Ante Pavelić himself, the Croatian Nazi leader, moved to Buenos Aires and became a 'security adviser' to the Peróns. Laundered through the 'untraceable' Vatican Bank, the Nazi treasure moved from Switzerland to South America. There the stolen funds were invested in a number of Argentine businesses whose lawyer was, of course, Allen Dulles.

As the final act of the money laundering, Dulles created the World Commerce Corporation to revive trade between Argentina and West Germany. On its board were such notables as William Donovan of US intelligence, and William Stephenson of British intelligence. During the 1950s much of the stolen proceeds were laundered back to Germany for the great economic revival of West Germany.

In the end, the money went back to the original German companies and their Western investors. It is not Swiss bank accounts that we should be tracing; it is the stock ownership of the Swiss banks. There lies the last and perhaps the ugliest secret of World War II. And therein lies the major culpability of the Vatican in its relations with Hitler's Germany: without the Vatican's investments in the Third Reich there could not have been the motive to provide the means to smuggle the Nazis' plundered loot from Switzerland through the Vatican Bank.

In the end, history will probably record that the Ratlines were established less for the benefit of the fugitive Nazis and more for the financial interests of the non-German investors, including the Pope. Certainly the fresh evidence we have uncovered since this book was first published in 1991 suggests that Count Three of our conclusions requires substantial revision. The Vatican did more than receive stolen goods. It was an accomplice to the theft.

Postscript

The revised edition of this book would not be complete without our acknowledgement of one of our sources in the US intelligence community, upon whose postwar investigative reports we heavily relied in the research for the original edition published in Britain in 1991. As you will have read, in Part One of this book we quoted extensively from intelligence reports written in 1947 by William Gowen, the American Army CIC agent named in Chapter Three as the man who, according to Congressional records, had smuggled Ferenc Vajta, a leading Hungarian Nazi, out of Rome.

Just as this book was first due to be published in America in 1992, St Martin's Press received a letter from Gowen, who had read the British edition of the book and was incensed by our charge. We replied that he had been officially denounced by a State Department investigation in the 1940s and again in the 1970s in a General Accounting Office report to Congress.[1]

Gowen insisted that he was innocent, had never known that he was the subject of any government investigation, and stoutly maintained that he had been framed. His bewildered outrage had the ring of truth to it. We added a note to the US edition of this book, warning readers that Gowen may indeed have been set up by his own government.

The more we investigated, the more the evidence indicated that Gowen had been falsely accused by the State Department. Gowen became one of our sources for The Secret War Against the Jews, the follow-up to this book. As detailed in that book, we confirmed that James Jesus Angleton, head of the CIA's Counter Intelligence section, had deliberately deceived a Congressional investigation and shifted the blame for his own misdeeds onto the shoulders of William Gowen. Moreover, Angleton had deceived two US presidents with forged information.

As set forth in detail in The Secret War Against the Jews, Angleton forged a series of Top Secret Vatican telegrams and planted them on his own government under the codename JVX. The CIA unwittingly shared the phony JVX files with other US agencies and eventually deposited them with the US National Archives as an important historical source.

In good faith, we relied in this book on one of the JVX files obtained under the Freedom of Information Act from the US Army's CIC. As a result, one of the Vatican's official historians, the recently deceased American Jesuit Father Robert Graham, criticized our reliance on a forgery and caused us to double-check our research. This led us to expose Angleton as a liar and forger, and since then the CIA and the National Archives have relabled the JVX files as forgeries.

Gowen also confirmed one of the main theses of this book: that British intelligence asked the Vatican to smuggle Nazis out of Europe as part of a future cadre of anti-Communist experts. As already discussed in this book, it was an embarrassing blunder, as the British architect of this scheme was Kim Philby, the highest-ranking Communist spy to penetrate the British Secret Service. Angleton, a protégé of Allen Dulles, had defied his own president to aid the British (and Philby's) scheme.

Years later, Gowen finally understood why Angleton had targeted him for disgrace and harassment. 'I was the first man to identify that the British were behind the Vatican network.'

Although we did not know it at the time this book was first published, Gowen had collected a mountain of intelligence on the postwar Nazi-British collaboration. Among his secret sources was Monsignor Augustine Juretić, who had been a classmate of Ante Pavelić himself. Juretić was the representative in Rome of Maček's Peasant Party, the largest non-Fascist party in Croatia, and also the Vatican's Ecclesiastic Counsel to the pre-war Royal Yugoslav Embassy in Rome. This prominent cleric had intelligence from both sides of the secret war in Yugoslavia.

Juretić confirmed that Pavelić, and other Nazis, were working for the British Secret Service. As discussed in Chapter Six, Gowen's report of his interrogation of Juretić revealed how the British had helped Pavelić truck his stolen treasure to safety in Italy. The stolen Nazi treasure was used by the British Secret Service to finance a Croatian 'resistance' force inside Tito's Communist Yugoslavia.

Juretić was not Gowen's only source inside the Vatican. The head of the Nazi smuggling network, Father Draganović, showed up in Gowen's office one day. He assumed that Gowen was pro-Ustashi and briefed him extensively on the secret British-Pavelić connection. The reason for Draganović's error was simple. He thought Gowen was one of the Dulles-Angleton clique that worked with the British Secret Service on the Nazi scheme. It was a reasonable mistake. Both the British and Angleton had intelligence offices in Gowen's building.

In addition, Draganović also provided Gowen with intelligence about the Ustashi's connection with British intelligence. In fact, he introduced Gowen to another fugitive Nazi, Colonel Babić. Just before the end of World War II, Pavelić had sent Babić out of Croatia to make contact with the British. Babić told Gowen how the British had picked him up by submarine. His mission was to relay Pavelić's offer of official cooperation with the British if they invaded Croatia and stopped Tito from taking power. To provide cover for the secret mission, Pavelić announced that Babić had been shot as a traitor.

Draganović insisted to Gowen that there had been all sorts of contacts between the British and Pavelić before the end of the war.

Gowen reported his observations to his superiors. It was not for him to decide whether to emulate British (and French) policies of recruiting Nazis as an underground intelligence force. Indeed, such an alliance was directly opposed to President Truman's explicit directives. But what Truman did not know was that renegade Americans were already working with the British. James Jesus Angleton, later head of the Vatican desk of the CIA, feared that Gowen was coming too close to the truth.

As we discussed in Chapter Eleven, Angleton had recruited Monsignor Giovanni Montini as his secret source inside the Vatican. Montini was then the Vatican Assistant Secretary of State who supervised Father Draganović's Nazi smuggling on behalf of the Holy See. One of the British officials, D'Arcy Osborne, told Gowen that Montini was the only person in the Vatican who was truly supportive of British policy. As the second half of this book demonstrates, it was one of the saddest chapters in the Catholic Church's history.

No one realized that Kim Philby was pushing the recruitment of ex-Nazis as a means of helping Soviet intelligence, not hurting them. Under Philby, British intelligence policy was a disaster. As we documented in Chapter Ten, Philby succeeded in placing numerous 'Red Nazis' right inside the British-Vatican network.

In hindsight, William Gowen realized that the British-Nazi connection did great damage to the Vatican. Readers who wish to know the full details of William Gowen's revelations should refer to the follow-up to this book, The Secret War Against the Jews. It is an attempt to place the role of Western intelligence and the Vatican in the larger context of the geopolitical struggle that continues in the Middle East.

As one retired intelligence agent said to us: 'If you think what we did with the Nazis was bad, wait till you see what we did to the Jews.'

Acknowledgements

Numerous people have assisted us in writing this book, not all of whom can be credited here, partly for space reasons, but also because many wish to remain anonymous. We are especially grateful to the many former and present officials of both Western and Communist governments who have quietly provided information, documents, leads and advice. Their identities must remain confidential, but they have our gratitude.

We could not have even started our work without the patience and perseverance of official archivists around the world, particularly in the Public Record Office in London and the United States National Archives in Washington, where John Taylor of the Modern Military Section and Sally Marks of the Diplomatic Branch were of immense help.

Christopher Simpson was enormously generous in allowing us access to his personal records, compiled in preparing his book, Blowback. James Walston is also gratefully acknowledged for his diligent research in the Italian Archives in Rome, as are many officials of the Roman Catholic Church and the Vatican, who encouraged certain lines of investigation. Although they do not wish to be cited by name, their help is reflected in the text.

It should be noted that we went to considerable trouble to obtain access to the Vatican's own records of the events dealt with, but were denied access to all relevant files. The access policy of the Vatican Secret Archives bars researchers from seeing most files after 22 January 1922. We thank official Vatican historian, Father Robert Graham, for trying to fill in some of the resultant gaps, and for his prompt responses to our many queries.

A large number of people gave us invaluable assistance by translating into English hundreds of pages of documents from many languages. Their work allowed us to present a rich diversity of material from international sources. We particularly thank Paula Gruden for translating Serbo-Croat and Slovenian material, and Claudia Taranto for Italian. Pierre Vicary, East European Correspondent of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation, convinced surviving priests who worked on the Ratline to give tape recorded interviews and obtained rare personal photographs, some of which appear in the book. Mr. Vicary, a British citizen fluent in several languages, lives in Zagreb and was also instrumental in negotiating the release of several key documents from Communist sources.

We would also like to thank Mr. William Gowen, whose criticisms and comments reached us only after this book was written. While Mr. Gowen states that he was not personally aware of Pius XII's involvement in the Ratlines and disagrees with us on a number of points, he does confirm the secret support given to the Vatican's Intermarium program by British intelligence.

Finally, we wish to record that, although we frequently took the advice of our many contacts, we alone are responsible for any errors, omissions or shortcomings.

1 Accounts of Pavelić's flight from Zagreb via Rogaska Slatina and Maribor to Austria can be found in Križman, Pavelić u bjekstvu; and Vilim Cecelja, 'Ċetrdesetdodjisnjica Bleiburga', in Vjesnik, Journal of Croatian Workers and Migrants in Germany, year 14, number 51, Easter 1985. The former gives his account from a pro-Yugoslav point of view, while the latter was a senior Ustashi member and gives a sympathetic portrayal of Pavelić.

2 A detailed history of the growth of the Ustashi, its terrorist activities in the 1930s and the terrible atrocities committed during the war can be found in Mark Aarons, *Sanctuary! 35 CIC Agent Report, Refugee Relief Act, 'Turkul, Anton', dated 22 August 1956, found in USNA, RG 319, Box 303, Investigative Records Repository, CIC File XE 001758, TURKUL, Anton, hereinafter cited as 'T/1249'. Because of the fragility of the Turkul files in the US National Archives, the three voluminous dossiers in which this document appears were not yet available for photocopying, and cites are given to our tape recorder serial numbers in order to provide a relative guide to the sequence in which the Turkul documents appear. For example, 'Military Entry Permit, 17 July 1946, T/001,' indicates that this document can be found among the earlier 1946 documents while the Refugee Relief Act Report of 22 August 1956, T/1249, can be found among the later entries in the file. Since the three volumes of Turkul dossiers appear to be arranged in reverse chronological order, researchers are cautioned to begin with what is labeled as Box III, and proceed through Box II to Box I in order to preserve the chronological sequence of our tape-recorded index

36 In addition to the Turkul files in the US National Archives, the authors received additional pages which were previously withheld from declassification. Undated CIC index card 'Turkul, Anton; Born: Bessarabia 2/12/1892' found on p. 3 of the INSCOM, USAIRR dossier for 'Anton Turkel', released under US FOIA 16 April 1990. The very next card on the same page lists Turkul's birthdate as '11 Dec 92 – Odessa, Russia'. Nineteenth-century Russian birthdates are often misleading because of the subsequent change of calendar systems. It is also possible that Turkul himself gave different birthdates in order to hinder Western background checks.

39 Anthony Cave Brown, 'C': The Secret Life of Sir Stewart Menzies, Spymaster to Winston Churchill, Macmillan, New York, 1987, pp. 143–4. Turkul's CIC file equates General Wrangel's 'Russian Officers Committee' with 'ROWS'. Depending on the transliteration method used ROWS stands for 'Ruski Obtshe Wojennyi Sojuz' or 'Ruski Obtshe Vojenski Soiuz' (Russian Common Military Union). General Kutepov's 'Combat Organization' of front line veterans is described in Turkul's CIC file as the 'Verbander Frontksemper' or the 'Verband der Frontkaempfer' (Union of Front Line Fighters). 85 It has been suggested that Stalin himself wished to keep Hitler alive during 1939–41 in the vain hope that his Western opponents might destroy themselves in a bloody repetition of World War I. 119 There are several good sources on the mystery of the Red Orchestra, the best of which is Heinz Höhne's Codeword: 'Direktor', Secker &

USAIRR CIC File, Red Orchestra, declassified under FOIA, January 1990. However there are intriguing references to a possible Vatican connection in the earlier works, notably in Alexander Foote's recollection that the Lucy ring operated under a Catholic publishing house and seemed to receive detailed German plans via diplomatic pouch. A. Foote, Story of a Russian Spy, formerly Handbook for Spies, Doubleday, New York, 1949. See also Leopold Trepper, The Great Game, McGraw-Hill, New York, 1977 for an intriguing account of yet another deception scheme, the 'Brown Orchestra' in which the Gestapo attempted to feed disinformation to the Soviets. With Turkul's ability to check the actual German troop dispositions, it is not surprising that the GRU failed to be taken in

A somewhat conflicting version can be found in David Kahn, Hitler's Spies, Arrow, London, 1980, pp. 298–303. Kahn's work is intriguing as it connects 'Fritz Kauders' and the MAX network to an American consul in Zagreb as well as to a 'Miss Beloševic of the embassy of the newly founded Croatian state'. This early link to the Ustashi may well have been the forerunner of Soviet penetration of the post-war Ratlines. For the handling of Jewish Mischlinge, see Abrams, Special Treatment, pp. 148–9

According to Rodal, 'Sidor was admitted to Canada only after the direct intervention of Pope Pius XII with the Prime Minister, Louis St Laurent.' Rodal Report, p. 414. The Vatican began interceding for Sidor soon after the war. By the end of 1945, Monsignor Montini of the Secretariat of State was dropping hints that Sidor should be allowed to settle in America, and over the following four years several official requests were sent. See Airgram of 13 December 1945 from Tittman to Washington, USNA, Myron Taylor Papers, Box 29 and State Department Decimal File 701.60F66A/12-1345; letter from US Consulate, Naples to Gowen, 15 May 1947 and Note Verbale from the Personal Representative of the US President to the Vatican, 20 May 1947, USNA, Myron Taylor Papers, Box 17; and letters from the Vatican to Taylor, 28 June 1949, and from Gowen to Montini, 5 July 1949, USNA, Myron Taylor Papers, Box 25. The US State Department concluded that 'Mr Sidor's entry into the United States either as an immigrant or as a temporary visitor, would be prejudicial to American interests.' US Embassy (Consular Section) memo, 18 July 1949, USNA, Myron Taylor Papers, Box 25

73 A cursory reading of the main report of the Deschenes Commission contains numerous references to an American connection, but virtually all references to British involvement were deleted from both the main report and the Appendix. We gratefully acknowledge the background explanations by a former US Counter Intelligence Officer. The CIA has recently published a multi-volume history of the early disputes between the CIA and Dulles, the so-called 'Darlin Report' which is available behind the information desk of the Main Reading Room of the USNA. However, neither the Darlin Report nor any other CIA history has ever identified the DDU as the cover for Dulles's rival intelligence organisation in the State Department. To our knowledge, this is the first time the existence of this super-secret organisation has ever been discussed in print

148 Allen had been promised the directorate of the CIA after Dewey's victory. His brother, John Foster Dulles, was to become Dewey's Secretary of State. Mosley, Dulles, p. 245. Allen did not wait for the election results before hiring his staff. John A. Bross, who later went on to a distinguished career in the CIA, confirmed that he was interviewed by Allen Dulles in the middle of the 1948 election campaign. Bross Interview, 1988. Mr Bross insists however that his own involvement as a legal officer in the Barbie case was prior to his actual employment with Dulles and not in any way connected with intelligence work. See for example, Bross's Office Memorandum of 13 June 1950, Office of the US High Commissioner for Germany, App. 410–11, which does not reflect any knowledge of Barbie's intelligence connection. Subsequently, Bross became Chief of the East European Division where he supervised Harry Heckscher of the old 'WDD'. See note 118, supra; Bowie interview, 1985

11 Barbie and the American Ratlines

1 Although Rauff's name is not mentioned in Dulles's memoirs of Operation Sunrise, The Secret Surrender, Rauff certainly remembered Dulles's name during his CIC interrogation. The sensitive Rauff-Dulles connection undoubtedly came to Angleton's attention as he had been 'transferred to Italy in November 1944, as the commanding officer of the SCI Unit Z'. Robin W. Winks, Cloak and Gown, Morrow, New York, 1987, p. 350. After March 1945, Angleton was in charge of co-ordinating all OSS interrogation information, especially concerning captured SD officers, such as Rauff. Id. p. 362. The US Army's files confirm that after SD officer Walter Rauff was interrogated by CIC he was released to the OSS unit 'S Force Verona'. INSCOM DOSSIER, 'Subject: Walter Rauff', US Army Investigative Records Repository, Ft. George V. Meade, Md., originally released under US FOIA to the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. Shortly after the CIC turned Rauff over to the OSS, he escaped under mysterious and controversial circumstances. See Chapter Two, supra. Rauff's subsequent role in the Ratlines is discussed in the French book, Cercle Noir, translated excerpts of which were graciously provided by Charles Kenney of the Boston Globe

9 A number of authors have correctly described the 'Special Procedures Group' as a component of CIA, without mentioning that SPG was an ad hoc joint operation between the CIA and the State Department's Special Projects Division. It was the latter which pushed the Italian election initiative over the reluctant CIA. SPD formally became OPC in 1948 as a permanent State Department mechanism for circumventing the CIA's scepticism for covert political action. Compare Winks, Cloak and Gown, p. 385, with Powers, The Man Who Kept The Secrets, pp. 36–7, and Loftus, The Belarus Secret, pp. 69–70. We use the term SPD to identify the non-CIA covert operations section run by the State Department prior to November 1948. Although Angleton was technically in the CIA, he was also one of the SPG co-ordinators for Italy and helped SPD run the election campaign through his assistant, Raymond Rocca in Rome. Winks, Cloak and Gown, p. 385, n. The recently released 'Darlin Report', discussed supra, explains many but not all of the bureaucratic tangles

45 Simpson, Blowback, pp. 224–5n (Tenzerov, Augsburg and Barbie worked for the Gehlen Organization). There is no doubt that this network was working part-time for Dulles's undercover 'War Department Detachment' as the CIC makes explicit mention of payments received by the WDD. Letter, 8 March 1948, 970th CIC Region IV, p. 2, para d, App. 159. Unfortunately, the subsequent Barbie investigation missed the Dulles connection entirely because they could find no trace of the term 'War Department Detachment'. Ryan Report, p. 159n. The Turkul file contains ample references to this unit, e.g., CI Report 53, Subject: Operation RUSTY, 8 November 1946 (mentioning a conference about Turkul with Mr Hecksher of the War Department Detachment), T/1190-1200.

The Peterson net's secret connection to the Gehlen Organization (codenamed TIB) is discussed in Letter, Subject: Merk, Kurt; Barbie, Klaus, 16 November 1948, CIC Region IV, App. 217, para. 4, p. 2. The Turkul-Tenzerov-DDU connection is discussed infra

49 Letter to HQ 970th CIC Det., Subj: Klaus Barbie, 11 December 1947, p. 4, App. 113 (note that Barbie's reports on Lebed and Grynioch were submitted to CIC on 18 November 1947, almost three weeks before Barbie's case handler, Camille Hadju, arranged to smuggle them from Rome and hide them in his house; compare INSCOM Dossier C8043982J, Mykola Lebed, US Army Investigative Records Repository, Ft. George V. Meade, Md., declassified under US FOIA, pp. 15–16 (report by Hadju on conduct of 5 December 1947 smuggling). The Barbie-Hadju-Ukrainian connection may have begun even earlier. Hadju's informal memorandum of 10 November 1947, unsourced (p. 142) was apparently based on oral reports from the Merck-Barbie network, as Hadju had no other network with contacts outside Germany. Barbie's information about Lebed and Grynioch had to have been typed up during the week of 10 November in order to be logged in for payment on 18 November. It is no coincidence that on 17 November 1947, Barbie's case handler, Hadju submitted his first official request (pp. 47–50), to smuggle Lebed from Rome to Germany, and then logged the Barbie reports in the following day as back-up. (App. 113)

The recently declassified Lebed file also contains a wealth of information on the wartime and post-war activities of Father Grynioch and the OUN, see e.g., p. 31 (Father Grynioch served as Lebed's deputy); p. 9 (Grynioch describes co-operative agreements with Germans), p. 19 (Galician training ground), p. 12 (Lebed's association with Abwehr intelligence); p. 146 (Father Grynioch was co-founder of the Ukrainian Army, UPA, along with Lebed)

50 INSCOM Dossier C8043982J, Mykola Lebed, US Army Investigative Records Repository, Ft. George V. Meade, Md., declassified under US FOIA, p. 36, described Lebed as 'a well known sadist and collaborator of the Germans'. Another source, listed as highly reliable by CIC, confirmed that Lebed, in order to dominate the anti-Soviet resistance movement, simply murdered several of his Ukrainian rivals and burned their villages to the ground. 'As a result, the Ukrainians now have difficulty forgetting the fact that Lebed killed some Ukrainian partisans who were fighting for the same cause,' p. 39. For an overview of the SB's gruesome conduct, see generally, Armstrong, Ukrainian Nationalism 1939–45

Meade, Md., declassified under US FOIA, pp. 9, 24 (Lebed fled to Rome along with the Croatians in May 1945 and established himself as 'General Secretary for Foreign Affairs'). Bishop Bučko was not his only Church contact: Archbishop Szepticky had previously helped commute Lebed's sentence for political assassination in Poland, p. 7. Lebed's CIC File, p. 6, lists his 1955 occupation as 'Secretary General, Foreign Affairs, Supreme Ukrainian Liberation Council, 353 Fort Washington Avenue, New York 37, New York'. This was a subsidiary of Dulles's American Committee of Liberation (AMCOMLIB) in New York which was subsiding General Turkul at the same time. Agent's Report, Refugee Relief Act, 22 August 1956, T/1279. OPC sponsorship of Lebed's group is discussed in Loftus, The Belarus Secret, pp. 102–3. See also App. 158–60 (under Hadju, Barbie net was giving information of much value to the WDD which in turn subsidised this CIC net)

69 It should be noted that the man who gave the bizarre drop-off orders described in the preceding footnote was Colonel Eckmann, the CIC liaison to DDU. IRS, Barbie, Klaus, 24 May 1949, App. 247

73 Memorandum for Colonel Erskine, 3 May 1950, p. 5, para. 23, App. 336 ('decided by Col . . . Eckmann . . . that Barbie shall not be placed in hands of French contrary to opinion expressed before'. Colonel Johnson and Ligon of Intelligence Division concurred in decision); Letter, Subject: Extradition of Klaus Barbie, 30 August 1950, App. 440 (decision not to hand Barbie over was co-ordinated with Mr B. Shute, Director of Intelligence (State Department), High Commissioner for Germany and Colonel W. R. Philp, Intelligence Division). Vidal noted that the reasons for the May 1950 hands-off decision on Barbie was 'well known to the above mentioned persons'.

Shute was State's liaison for DDU, Colonel William R. 'Rusty' Philp was the red-headed Army liaison to Gehlen's 'Operation Rusty'. Interview with former State DDU (and later CIA) officer, John A. Bross, 1983–4; see also Höhne and Zolling, The General was a Spy, p. 68 (Col. Philp recruited Gehlen in 1945). It is not surprising that they ordered Vidal to keep the French from getting their hands on Barbie on NTS programmes in Germany. According to this rather defensive source, the OPC's attitude at the time was that they were merely writing cheques; if Turkul produced something good, fine, if he turned out to be a spy, all they had lost was money. In fact, Turkul helped them lose Hungary in 1956 and wrecked most of Gehlen's operations. See discussion of NTS failures in Höhne, Gehlen: Spy of the Century

2 Confidential 1984 Interview, former Western intelligence officer. The person who named Waldheim also described extensive details of the Italian-Austrian leg of the Ratline which were subsequently corroborated by another source who admitted that the DDU unit was disguised as a medical team for the 351st Infantry Regimental Combat Team in Trieste, later the 349th regiment in Linz, Austria. Waldheim's own superior in the Austrian Foreign Ministry also confirmed that 'there may be a link between the US intelligence community and Waldheim'. Statement of Karl Gruber to the London Observer Service, quoted in Quincy Patriot Ledger, 29 April 1986

3 Waldheim was awarded the Ustashi silver medal of King Zvonimir with oak leaf clusters for bravery under fire for his services during July 1942. Waldheim admits that this was the period of the Kozara massacre, but claims that he was 200 miles away at the time. New York Times, 6 March 1986, 'Waldheim Says His Past Was Misrepresented'; see also Der Spiegel, 14 April 1986, 'The Waldheim Case: Austria's Quiet Fascism'. However, a check of the original Ustashi newspapers in the Yugoslav Archives showed that Pavelić awarded Waldheim the medal specifically for services in 'Western Bosnia' which was also the area assigned Father Draganović by the Ustashi Bureau of Colonisation

11 Estimate by Allan Ryan, author of Quiet Neighbors, and formerly director of the Office of Special Investigations at the US Justice Department. He is also the author of the Ryan Report on Klaus Barbie. However, Ryan continues to insist that the 10,000 Nazis entered America without any governmental assistance and that Barbie was the only war criminal to go through the Ratline. E.g., Ryan Report, p. 212

12 The 1959 report, which is still classified, was a belated admission from the Gehlen organisation. Some elements of the CIA had been saying the same thing openly since 1952. Lyman Kirkpatrick, The Real CIA, Macmillan, New York, 1968, p. 153

The Definitive Story of

The Vatican's Secret Collusion with Nazi War Criminals

PRAISE FOR UNHOLY TRINITY

"Meticulously researched, carefully documented... The shadow of these accusations still hangs heavy and dark over the twentieth-century Church."
—Morris West, author of The Shoes of the Fisherman

"Impossible to put down." —Publishers Weekly

"Head-spinning documentation of how Vatican immunity shielded Nazi war criminals from just punishment." —Kirkus Reviews

"[Unholy Trinity] is an important and meticulously researched piece of work and deserves the sort of massive readership reserved for books that the British government ham-fistedly attempts to ban." —The Literary Review

Written in riveting fashion by the coauthors of The Secret War Against the Jews, Unholy Trinity tells one of the darkest tales of World War II. After the war had ended, fearing a surge of Soviet growth, the Papacy entered into an espionage alliance with British and American intelligence agents. Subsuming justice to the nascent Cold War ideology, these three powers ferreted Nazi criminals out of Europe so that they could be used in the supposedly greater fight against Communism. The Vatican's Nazi smuggling network was penetrated by Prince Anton Turkul, the great Soviet double agent who turned the operation into a sting for his masters in the Kremlin. Unholy Trinity exposes Turkul's "Red Nazi" operation for the first time and shows how Kim Philby, the infamous British–Soviet double agent, and his network were nearly sacrificed to preserve Turkul's Vatican operation.

Exploring the Vatican's role in aiding Nazi criminals to escape punishment for their crimes, this book, originally published in 1991, first revealed the Vatican–Swiss bank connection to Nazi gold and documented the hidden links to Western investors in Nazi Germany. Since 1991, major revelations about the role of the Swiss banks have confirmed Unholy Trinity's exposé of the flight of the Nazis' stolen treasures; the new introduction and new final chapters, written by Aarons and Loftus for this edition, bring the book completely up to date and show how the media have missed the vital Vatican connection in the Swiss-bank story. Among other things, the authors demonstrate that U.S. and British code-breakers were fully aware of the Holocaust as early as 1941 but lied to the Western press; that the code-breakers bugged the Swiss banks and then buried secrets of Nazi gold transfers to protect U.S. intelligence chief Allen Dulles; and that the Australian, British, and Canadian governments are still waging a campaign to keep their citizens ignorant about the Nazi war criminals living among them.

Covering all these topics and more, Unholy Trinity is the definitive history of a series of profoundly disturbing cover-ups involving the Holy See, Allen Dulles, the Swiss banks, and the remnants of the Third Reich.

MARK AARONS is an internationally award-winning investigative reporter and the author of several books on intelligence-related issues. He exposed Nazi war criminals in Australia, where he lives, and prompted changes to Australian federal law. Attorney JOHN LOFTUS is the author of four histories of intelligence operations. As a former prosecutor with the U.S. Justice Department's Nazi-hunting unit, he had unprecedented access to top-secret CIA and NATO archives. He lives in Florida. Together, Aarons and Loftus are the authors of The Secret War Against the Jews.

NAZI SECRET WEAPON?

ERNST ZÜNDEL

DEDICATION

This book is dedicated by the authors, their collaborators and the publishers to the unsung and often-maligned heroes of the Second World War.

ZÜNDEL

Every effort has been made by the authors to give credit to the originators of material whether it be written or pictorial. However, the search for such originators sometimes proved fruitless. Should anyone not be included, it is solely due to the confusing maze of claims and counterclaims to copyrights.

THE MIND AND PERSONALITY OF ADOLF HITLER

ATOMIC BOMB

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION?

WHY THE BIG UFO COVER-UP?

FORWORD

Ever since the fall of Berlin and the unconditional surrender of the German armed forces in 1945 one continually reads of Adolf Hitler's possible or definite escape from Berlin and Germany. Hitler has been reported to be living in several inaccessible spots in South America, in some well-guarded Shang-ri-la surrounded by S.S. Guards armed to the teeth. He is supposed to have spent some time in a monastery in Spain and other reports have him as a "prisoner" in Russia, itself.

Millions of words have been written and spoken to this effect. Over 100,000 books have been written about Hitler and W.W. II in most major languages of the world. Most of them were more or less fictional accounts and re-hashes of the official propaganda lines and clichés of the military victors of W.W. II. None of these studies were deep or exhaustive enough to be considered conclusive. Many very important facets were not covered at all or were only touched upon the fringes.

The book that is before you, is to the knowledge of the authors, their collaborators and to the publishers as well, the first attempt to cover some of these fringe issues in more depth. Consequently, they have drawn some very different conclusions to those already written on this vast and complex topic.

In order to start on a sound footing, and ultimately to do it justice, Hitler, the man is examined. Hitler, the thinker, the statesman, the politician and above all, Hitler the founder of the National Socialist Ideology (Weltanschauung) is examined in greater detail and in a more dispassionate manner. To only write about the technical aspects and ratifications of the UFO mystery, of the UFO's purely military potential, would, of necessity, lead to incorrect conclusions

To separate the totality of Hitler's control and influence over the production and eventual use of the UFO's and over every other secret development of the II Reich would be stupid. Without Hitler's backing or his knowledge of their potential uses, no weapons, not even the UFO's would have been developed; they would have been condemned to the "planners' morgue" or the junk piles.

Hitler knew about the research work being done on UFO's by his scientists, just as he knew about the other incredible secret weapons they were feverishly working upon in their bomb-proof laboratories. Many of these highly sophisticated weapon systems represented scientific breakthroughs of great importance. Many of these devices fell into Allied hands and they are pictured here for the first time and to the best of our knowledge. Others are re-created from engineering drawings or from testimony given to the Allied interrogators.

There is a whole array of jet and rocket-powered aircraft, both fighters and bombers. There are T.V. guided missiles and torpedos. There are plane and submarine-based rockets. Also there are wind cannons and many other devices.

In order to understand all aspects of this vexing problem we have to examine the governmental set-up of National Socialist Germany, especially war-time Germany. Unlike any other state in recorded history, Hitler's Germany was literally run by one man, much in the shape of a pyramid, with the chain of command moving down and out. In Hitler's hands ended all the strands; from his pinnacle of absolute power emanated all orders. From Hitler came the final orders of the scrapping or the production of any kind of weaponry. He alone was capable of making available the vast amounts of money for the research and production of what was needed to win the war. He alone could delegate the sweeping powers and set the orders of priority of one weapon system over any other.

All attempts to clarify this or that aspect of the German war effort, of diplomatic or military moves, which do not take fully into account this pyramidical structure of the decision-making process in Nazi Germany, are doomed to dismal failure. This structure of National Socialism is the very foundation of the movement, it is the "Führerprinzip" — leadership principle — in action. It is the failure or deliberate unwillingness to understand this basic principle, that has been the undoing of 95% of the writers, historians and media people of the world. By ignoring this simple principle in action and its effect on all things the origins of the UFO's (Krautmeteors), their current whereabouts and status, as well as Hitler's fate, have been shrouded in mystery and often contradictions.

The author of this book and his friends started to delve into the UFO mystery. They circulated their findings over the years to an ever-increasing number of friends and contacts around the world, but only as a basis for discussion and further study. Whenever more reports of UFO crews speaking German (Kearny Report) and behaving like German soldiers (electricity blackout Eastern States), or of sightings and documentation (French T.V. showed a UFO landing gear imprint in a clear swastika shape), reached the authors, they took a closer look. There now appeared a distinguishable pattern, in proper time and date sequence, that hinted at a possible connection between the appearance of UFO's in large numbers and Hitler's possible survival and escape from Berlin.

A book was born. Many publishers were contacted, all thought the material had merit, but none dared to publish it in its entirety. Many wanted to publish only the UFO developments. All would have loved to reproduce the hither-to unpublished engineering drawings and illustrations of prototypes of the German UFO's and the many other secret weapons but the authors insisted it was to be all or nothing.

So the manuscript made the rounds for years and years. Eventually it lay buried. Then one day, excerpts fell into the hands of a group of individuals who decided to collect money amongst themselves and publish the manuscript. With the help and active participation of the authors and their collaborators the book is now before you.

Against threats and persecution this courageous group of individuals composed of diverse ethnic backgrounds, has stood firm. We ask of the reader only to reserve judgement until he has thoroughly read through the book to the very last page. This book is not an easy book to read. One could almost call it an unnerving study of a very unusual and extraordinary man, his ideas his actions, his motivations and his ultimate goals. It also gives one a glimpse of German inventiveness and their capacity to suffer punishment and to be able to rise Phoenix-like from the ashes of "total defeat". This book also shows

Hitler’s opponents in a new light; in the light of truth and not propaganda. The book can further serve the unprejudiced individual as a catalyst to study and re-examine many events from a new perspective. Now that many Allied documents are being de-classified, a new search will produce new and startling insights and conclusions.

We believe that the open-minded reader after studying this book and after delving into the many reference and source materials listed, will never again look at the world with the same eyes.

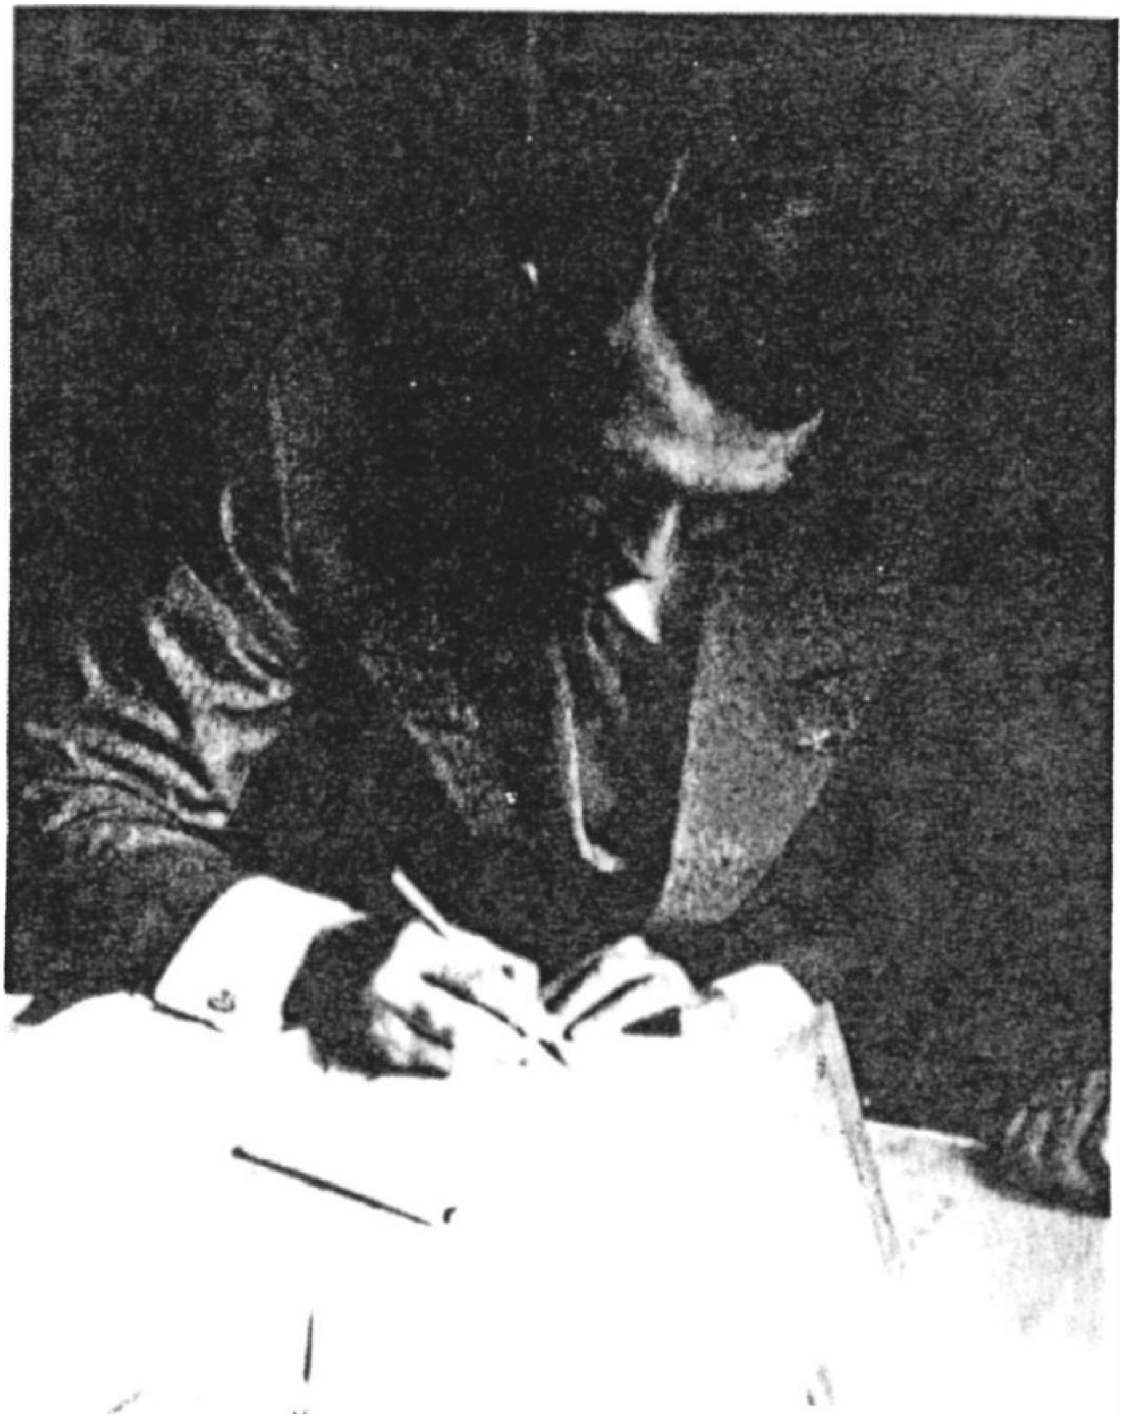
The publishers

P.S. Those of you fortunate enough to be able to speak and to read German will find a considerable difference between the English and German editions. The reasons are simply:

1. Difficulty in finding translators for such a deeply philosophical work.

2. The English-speaking readership is used to material in this lighter vein.

For the above reasons, this is not a true translation of the German version but rather a book about another book.



Hitler planning

THE MIND AND PERSONALITY OF ADOLF HITLER

The non-German world has a rather sketchy and fragmentary picture of the mind of Adolf Hitler; how he thought, felt and what motivated him. Lacking accurate knowledge, no one can possibly claim to understand the personality of this extraordinary man. Consequently, we will try to condense into a few paragraphs, what has taken historians volumes and volumes of books to describe.

Adolf Hitler was above all else, an intuitive, artistic human being, capable of accurately sensing situations and of grasping them with the clarity of an extremely orderly mind. He believed in the absolute supremacy of the spirit over the material, and this was borne out by his now-famous statement that for him, and for a National Socialist, two words did not exist in the dictionary — impossible (unmoglich) and never (niemals).

Let us look at his own life as a case in point. An early orphan, poor, with incomplete education, a stateless citizen in Germany with a sickly physical constitution, and, after the First World War, penniless and without a job or trade. He was just one of the many millions of Germans in similar desperate straits at that time in history. He had, one has to admit, not a chance to be anything other, even if lucky, than a manual labourer. Impossible, one would have to concede, that this man could ever become Mayor of Munich let alone the Chancellor of the largest, most populous, best-trained and educated country in the heart of Europe. Never — not in his circumstances!

Impossible? Never? Well, the entire world is witness to the fact that not only did the impossible become possible, it actually happened and in a very short period of time. The never and impossible were stricken from his and from history's dictionary.

Here enters the very first and most important component in understanding Adolf Hitler, and through it, the partial solution to the U.F.O. riddle.

Nothing in National Socialism was ever allowed to seem an impossible task or an unattainable goal. With Adolf Hitler it was always mind over matter. The belief then held by aircraft designers that the human body could not survive space flight and faster-than-sound speeds was scornfully put on one side by Hitler and it was his challenging of this belief that brought forth the U.F.O.'s.

Let us now return to the other facets of Hitler's mind in order to get an even clearer picture.

Hitler felt, based on his studies and an enormous amount of reading, that there existed a very definite plan by a small, but immensely powerful group of Jewish bankers, financiers, industrialists and others, to take control of the entire world. It is important to remember that he lived in Vienna during a time when a very noisy battle was raging between Zionist Jews, (who wanted to be a separate race, religion, nation and culture with their own state, Israel), and the assimilated elements amongst the Jews, (who wanted to be part of the cosmopolitan establishment of the Austrian Empire), with all the privileges and power their immense wealth bestowed on them. Hitler's appraisal of the Jews can best be summed up as contained in "The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion". This is a very important aspect of the whole U.F.O. story, because in it, we find the seeds for many far-reaching decisions made 30 years later. Hitler saw in this actual or imagined Jewish drive for world domination, a very definite danger to his own work and plan.

From now on we must look at every problem from this vantage point. Hitler would undoubtedly double-check each major question by this criterion: "How would I act in this case if I were a Jew bent on world conquest?" Now we have the two most important keys to understanding the functioning of his mind.

There is, however, another very important fact, and this is motivation. What motivated this man? Why should this penniless and jobless vagrant, (often disparagingly called a paperhanger) act the way he did? Millions of words have been devoted to this question. All, or most of them, completely misrepresented him, and this is especially true in the non-German world where he is portrayed as some power-mad maniac, seeking power solely for destructive reasons. This kind of thinking might have been justifiable as propaganda during war time, but the truth requires a long over-due reevaluation, and the truth is simple.

The artistic, sensitive soul in this man rebelled at what he saw taking place around him. Since no single person, no group, no party and no ideology at that time expressed his feelings, he started expressing his own frustrations and ideas at the meetings of others. To his complete amazement he found that others listened and they listened in ever-increasing numbers. Thus, Hitler the agitator, the motivator, was born. There is no motivator without motivation and it was the concept of National Socialism that was his motivation.

It is neither the intent nor the desire of the authors to rewrite "Mein Kampf" and we shall restrict ourselves to the very barest of outlines to clarify his motivations. This is necessary to solve the U.F.O. riddle and can best be summed up in the 24 points of the N.S.D.A.P. Party Programme and also are reflected in a study Hitler made of the political situation for the army in Munich, where he was "Political Information Officer".

THE PROGRAMME OF THE PARTY

> THE Programme of the German Workers' Party is limited as to period. The leaders have no intention, once the aims announced in it have been achieved, of setting up fresh ones, in order to ensure the continued existence of the Party by the artificially increased discontent of the masses.
> 1. We demand the union of all Germans, on the basis of the right of the self-determination of peoples, to form a Great Germany.

2. We demand equality of rights for the German People in its dealings with other nations, and abolition of the Peace Treaties of Versailles and St. Germain.

3. We demand land and territory (colonies) for the nourishment of our people and for settling our surplus population.

4. None but members of the nation may be citizens of the State. None but those of German blood, whatever their creed, may be members of the nation. No Jew, therefore, may be a member of the nation.

5. Anyone who is not a citizen of the State may live in Germany only as a guest and must be regarded as being subject to the Alien laws.

6. The right of voting on the leadership and legislation is to be enjoyed by the citizens of the State alone. We demand, therefore, that all official appointments, of whatever kind, whether in the Reich, the provinces, or the small communities, shall be granted to citizens of the State alone.

We oppose the corrupt Parliamentary custom of the State of filling posts merely with a view to Party considerations, and without reference to character or capacity.

7. We demand that the State shall make it its first duty to promote the industry and livelihood of the citizens of the State. If it is not possible to nourish the entire population of the State, foreign nationals (non-citizens of the State) must be excluded from the Reich.

8. All further non-German immigration must be prevented. We demand that all non-Germans who entered Germany subsequently to August 2, 1914, shall be required forthwith to depart from the Reich.

9. All citizens of the State shall possess equal rights and duties.

10. It must be the first duty of every citizen of the State to perform mental or physical work. The activities of the individual must not clash with the interests of the whole, but must proceed within the framework of the community and must be for the general good.

We demand therefore:

11. Abolition of incomes unearned by work. Abolition of the thraldom of interest.

12. In view of the enormous sacrifice of life and property demanded of a nation by every war, personal enrichment through war must be regarded as a crime against the nation. We demand therefore the ruthless confiscation of all war profits.

13. We demand the nationalization of all businesses which have (hitherto) been amalgamated (into Trusts).

14. We demand that there shall be profit-sharing in the great industries.

15. We demand a generous development of provision for old age.

16. We demand the creation and maintenance of a healthy middle class, immediate communalization of wholesale warehouses, and their lease at a low rate to small traders, and that the most careful consideration shall be shown to all small purveyors to the State, the provinces, or smaller communities.

17. We demand a land-reform suitable to our national requirements, the passing of a law for the confiscation without compensation of land for communal purposes, the abolition of interest on mortgages, and prohibition of all speculation in land.

On 13 April 1928, Adolf Hitler made the following declaration:

"It is necessary to reply to the false interpretation on the part of our opponents of Point 17 of the Programme of the NSDAP.

"Since the NSDAP admits the principle of private property, it is obvious that the expression 'confiscation without compensation' refers merely to the creation of possible legal means of confiscating, when necessary, land illegally acquired, or not administered in accordance with the national welfare. It is therefore directed in the first instance against the Jewish companies which speculate in land."

"(Signed) ADOLF HITLER."

"Munich, April 13, 1928."

18. We demand ruthless war upon all those whose activities are injurious to the common interest. Common criminals against the nation, usurers, profiteers, &c., must be punished with death, whatever their creed or race.

19. We demand that the Roman Law, which serves the materialistic world order, shall be replaced by a German common law.

20. With the aim of opening to every capable and industrious German the possibility of higher education and consequent advancement to leading positions the State must consider a thorough reconstruction of our national system of education. The curriculum of all educational establishments must be brought into line with the requirements of practical life. Directly the mind begins to develop the schools must aim at teaching the pupil to understand the idea of the State (State sociology). We demand the education of specially gifted children of poor parents, whatever their class or occupation, at the expense of the State.

21. The State must apply itself to raising the standard of health in the nation by protecting mothers and infants, prohibiting child labour, and increasing bodily efficiency by legally obligatory gymnastics and sports, and by extensive support of clubs engaged in the physical training of the young.

22. We demand the abolition of mercenary troops and the formation of a national army.

23. We demand legal warfare against conscious political lies and their dissemination in the Press. In order to facilitate the creation of a German national Press we demand:

(a) that all editors and contributors to newspapers employing the German language must be members of the nation;

(b) That special permission from the State shall be necessary before non-German newspapers may appear. These need not necessarily be printed in the German language;

(c) That non-Germans shall be prohibited by law from participating financially in or influencing German newspapers, and that the penalty for contravention of the law shall be suppression of any such newspaper, and immediate deportation of the non-German involved.

It must be forbidden to publish newspapers which do not conduce to the national welfare. We demand the legal prosecution of all tendencies in art and literature of a kind likely to disintegrate our life as a nation, and the suppression of institutions which militate against the above-mentioned requirements.

24. We demand liberty for all religious denominations in the State, so far as they are not a danger to it and do not militate against the morality and moral sense of the German race.

The Party, as such, stands for positive Christianity, but does not bind itself in the matter of creed to any particular confession. It combats the Jewish-materialist spirit within and without us, and is convinced that our nation can achieve permanent health from within only on the principle: the common interest before self-interest.

25. That all the foregoing requirements may be realized we demand the creation of a strong central power of the Reich. Unconditional authority of the politically central Parliament over the entire Reich and its organization in general.

The formation of Diets and vocational Chambers for the purpose of executing the general laws promulgated by the Reich in the various States of the Confederation.

The leaders of the Party swear to proceed regardless of consequences—if necessary at the sacrifice of their lives—towards the fulfilment of the foregoing Points.[1]

MUNICH, February 24, 1920.

In a meeting held in the Circus Krone on 18 September 1922 Hitler formulated "some fundamental demands of the Party":

"1. We must call to account the November criminals of 1918. It cannot be that two million Germans should have fallen in vain and that afterwards one should sit down as friends at the same table with traitors. No, we do not pardon, we demand—Vengeance!"

"2. The dishonouring of the nation must cease. For betrayers of their Fatherland and informers the gallows is the proper place. Our streets and squares shall once more bear the names of our heroes; they shall not be named after Jews. In the Question of Guilt we must proclaim the truth".

"3. The administration of the State must be cleared of the rabble which is fattened at the stall of the parties".

"4. The present laxity in the fight against usury must be abandoned. Here the fitting punishment is the same as that for the betrayers of their Fatherland".

> "5. We must demand a great enlightenment on the subject of the Peace Treaty. With thoughts of love? No! but in holy hatred against those who have ruined us".
> "6. The lies which would veil from us our misfortunes must cease. The fraud of the present money-madness must be shown up. That will stiffen the necks of us all".
> "7. As foundation for a new currency the property of those who are not of our blood must do service. If families who have lived in Germany for a thousand years are now expropriated, we must do the same to the Jewish usurers".
> "8. We demand immediate expulsion of all Jews who have entered Germany since 1914, and of all those, too, who through trickery on the Stock Exchange or through other shady transactions have gained their wealth".
> "9. The housing scarcity must be relieved through energetic action; houses must be granted to those who deserve them. Eisner said in 1918 that we had no right to demand the return of our prisoners—he was only saying openly what all Jews were thinking. People who so think must feel how life tastes in a concentration camp!"
> "Extremes must be fought by extremes. Against the infection of materialism, against the Jewish pestilence we must hold aloft a flaming ideal. And if others speak of the World and Humanity we say The Fatherland—and only the Fatherland!"[1]

Hitler's "Study of the Jews" — for the army

In so far as the danger with which Jewry threatens our people today finds its expression in an undeniable aversion experienced by the majority of our people, the cause of that aversion is not generally to be found in a clear awareness of the Jews' systematically destructive effect, whether conscious or unconscious, on our nation as a whole, but arises mainly from personal intercourse and the impression made by the Jew as an individual... . Thus antisemitism all too easily takes on the character of a mere manifestation of emotion. And that is wrong. As a political movement antisemitism cannot and must not be determined by emotional motives but by a recognition of the facts...: To begin with, Jewry is incontestably a race and not a religious community. And the Jew himself never describes himself as a Jewish German, Jewish Pole or, say, a Jewish American, but always as a German, Polish or American Jew. In no case has the Jew ever . . . assimilated very much more from other nations than their language. . . . Even the Mosaic faith . . . is not the final word on the question of Jew or non-Jew. . . . By a thousand years of inbreeding, often occurring within a very small circle, the Jew has generally kept his race and type more sharply defined than the peoples among whom he lives. The result of this is that we have in our midst a non-German, foreign race neither willing nor able to sacrifice its racial characteristics or to renounce its own way of feeling, thinking and striving and which nevertheless has just the same political rights as us. If the Jew's very feelings are concerned with the purely material, how much more so his thinking and striving. The dance round the Golden Calf becomes a merciless struggle for all those possessions which to our way of feeling ought not to be the only and ultimate things worth striving for. The value of an individual is no longer determined by his character, by the importance of his achievements to the whole, but exclusively by the size of his fortune.... A nation's stature is no longer to be reckoned > by the sum of its moral and spiritual forces but only by the profusion of its worldly goods. From this feeling there arises that thinking, that striving after money and after the power to protect it, which leads the Jew to be unscrupulous in his choice of methods, and pitiless in applying them.... In an autocratically governed State he whines to gain the 'majesty's', the prince's, favour which he abuses [by battening] on his subjects like a leach. In a democracy he goes whoring after the favour of the masses, crawls before the 'majesty of the people' and knows only the majesty of money. He destroys the prince's character by Byzantine flattery, and national pride – the strength of a people – by mockery and the shameless promotion of vice. His weapon is public opinion . . . which he guides and distorts by means of the Press. His power is the power of money which in his hands proliferates unceasingly and effortlessly in the form of interest.. .. Everything that induces men to aspire to higher things, be it religion, socialism, or democracy, is to him only a means to an end – that of satisfying his lust for money and domination. He acts on the peoples like racial tuberculosis. And as a consequence antisemitism arising out of purely emotional reasons will find its ultimate expression in the form of progroms [sic]. Antisemitism based on reason, however, must lead to a systematic and legal campaign to deprive the Jew of the privileges which he alone of all the foreigners in our midst enjoys (Aliens Legislation). But its final goal must always remain the removal of the Jews as a whole.

It could be said that we are a little far off the U.F.O. problem but without this groundwork it is not possible to unravel this very complex story. We now have a clear picture of the basic working of Hitler's brain. We know how he felt about "his enemies", real or imagined, and we also know what motivated him in his political moves and decisions.

To sum up:—

1. Hitler never thought anything impossible; he never accepted defeat. Hitler did not believe that even death was the end and thought of death only as a transition, after which the struggle continued only on a different plane. This can be clearly seen in his words "Und Ihr habt doch gesiegt" — "And you were victorious in spite of death" — often repeated during memorial speeches while honouring those of his supporters who fell during the march on the Feldherrnhalle on November 23rd, 1923 in Munich. This same thinking permeates his last two public speeches broadcast January 10th, 1945 and February 25th, 1945 in which he re-affirmed that Germany would still win the war — " . . . and the Last Battalion will be ours".

2. Hitler saw a world-wide conspiracy of Jews and their Allies, (democrats, liberals, social democrats and marxists) in a concerted, well-planned drive for Jewish world domination. He argued vehemently and convincingly to untold millions of Europeans that there was a struggle taking place for a Jewish world in which all non-Jews were to be mere work slaves, with Jewish rulers, similar to those forming the Communist government in the Soviet Union, e.g., Trotsky (Bronstein), Litvinoff (Finkelstein), Kanganovich (Cohen), Ehrenburg and Berija, or for an Aryan world where the white man played a forceful dynamic role in global affairs, based on self-determination but within strict limits of a larger white world or what the Germans call "Abendland".

3. Hitler’s motivating force was an unusual synthesis, (never before or since attempted), of the best features of Socialism and of Free Enterprise as opposed to multi-national corporations, (then called monopoly or state capitalism) on the one side, and Nationalism (based on ethnic origin and adherence) versus universalism or internationalism on the other. Hitler’s synthesis worked and it was eminently successful all over Europe, providing full employment, financial stability (zero inflation) and introducing the greatest worker-benefit programmes of any modern, industrial state. It was never defeated as an idea but only destroyed (by military power), as a system.

An idea can only be superseded or defeated by another, better idea. Germany was only defeated militarily in 1945 but the idea of National Socialism is still as strong as ever and is flourishing around the world, but by necessity, underground.

The above three factors must constantly be kept in mind as we move from chapter to chapter and from event to event in the following pages.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ESPECIALLY IN THE AIRCRAFT FIELD IN N.S. Germany

When Germany sent unmanned guided missiles, in the form of the V.1 and later the V.2 (the V standing for Vergeltungswaffen or Revenge Weapon), crashing into England as payment for England’s, treason against Europe, a weapon was thus introduced to the astonished world that up to that time had only been written about in Science Fiction magazines. Again, the “impossible” had been realised. There was no defence in England against the V.2 and there would have been no defence against the A.9 and A.10 (America Rockets) which were destined to rain on New York and Washington in the Fall of 1945. These rockets were intended as revenge for the aimless and merciless killing of German civilians by the saturation fire-bombing of German cities by the U.S. Air Terrorists.

The breakthrough in the rocket weapon field by Germany so astonished the Allied leadership that Winston Churchill, fearing panic would break out in England,, contemplated germ warfare against Germany. It was only a lack of germs that prevented such action. However, the rocket breakthrough came too late to turn the tide for Germany. Conventional mass-bombing and mass-killing by the Allies took such a heavy toll that the war ended before all the new technology developed by German genius could be brought into the war. It was the knowledge that it was quantity winning over quality that had driven the hopelessly outnumbered German soldiers to despair, and the new technology gave them a feeling of relief plus the knowledge that only for a space of time had mass overwhelmed spirit.

Secret Weapons

General Eisenhower wrote in his book “Crusade in Europe”: “It seems likely that if the Germans had succeeded in perfecting and using these new weapons six months earlier than they did, our invasion of Europe would have proved exceedingly difficult, perhaps impossible. I feel sure that had they succeeded in using these weapons over a six month period, particularly if he (Hitler) had made the Portsmouth-Southampton (landing) area one of his principle targets, Overlord (the invasion) might have been written off”. Those were the “conventional” V. I and V. II rockets mentioned by Eisenhower with such awe.

Winston Churchill spoke of the “miracle weapons” that Goebbels had promised the Germans, and that if they had come half a year earlier Hitler would have driven the allies out of Europe!

It is interesting to speculate about what weapons these two allied war leaders were referring to. Some were undoubtedly the remote controlled missiles, V.I and V.ll already mentioned. But there were others. There were ground-to-air missiles, some radio-controlled, some heat-seeking, some radar-guided and others even more sophisticated.

Long Range Rockets (ICBM) The “Amerika Rocket” at extreme left was to be operational by Fall-Winter 1945. (Note size of man in relation to size of rockets). Some of the German jet planes on the drawing boards and in the test stage. The experienced observer can trace most “modern developments” to these ancestors. Germany was at least a generation ahead of the rest of the world in “conventional” aircraft design

In April 1945, Germany had, in fact, over 130 different types of missiles and rockets. We reproduce here a' cross-section of the most important types. Please note their size relative to the size of a man. All the ones pictured were operational types. Many others were just days or weeks away from combat use. Amongst them were the devastatingly successful R.4-M, air-to-air missiles which were mounted under the wings of an aircraft. A ME-110 could carry 48 R.4M's and Germany's new jets carried 24 of these murderously effective weapons.

Luftwaffe Lieutenant Werner Schneider, a German Wing-Commander, flying a F.W.190, attacked on allied bomber formation near the town of Schweinfurth in April 1945 and reported after his landing, "We were about a mile away when we received our directions from the control centre. 'You are close enough' a missile expert told us. 'Hold that range. Just point your noses forward towards them and pull the switches.' With a hissing sound the missiles blasted away. The result was beyond our wildest expectations. The missiles equipped with proximity fuses, some also with acoustical detonators, sent forty bombers to the ground within minutes."

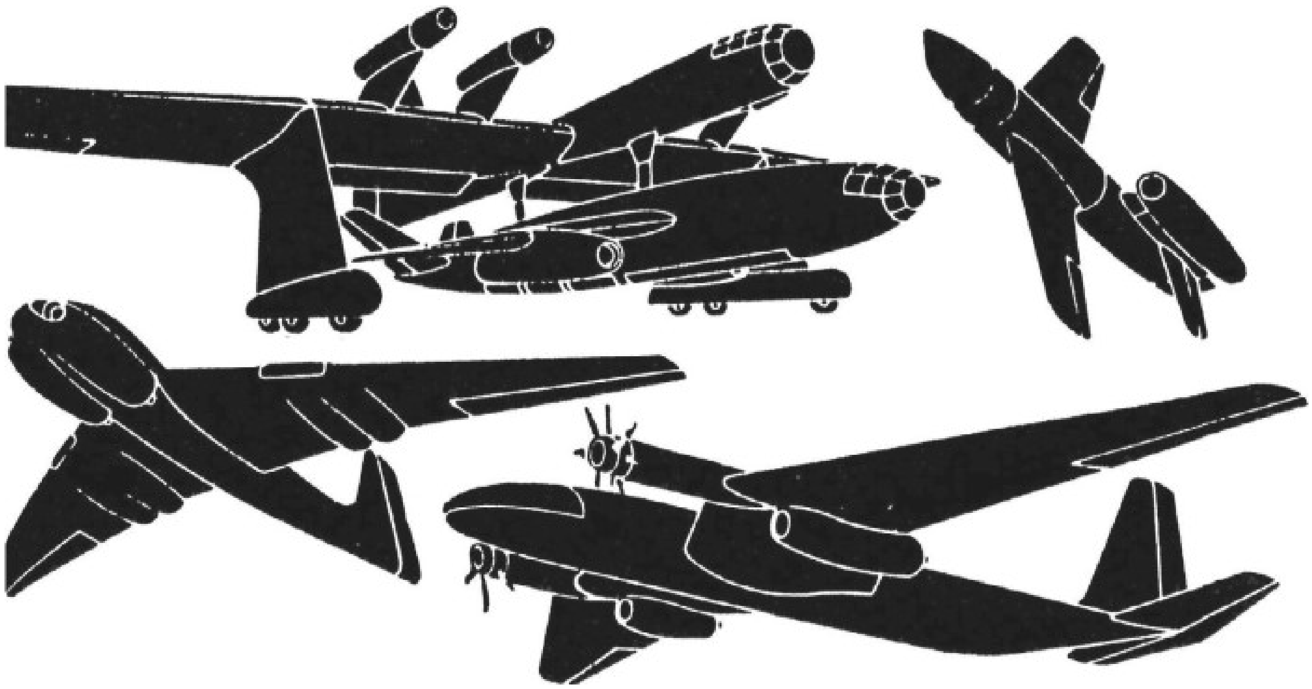
Before the war ended, Germany had produced over 20,000 of these missiles of the R4M type in underground factories in the Sudetenland. Allied sources have put bomber losses at the hands of the R4M to over 500 in a few weeks. However, since aircraft were in short supply at that time, greater emphasis was placed on ground to air missiles. To mention but a few, there are the Enzian (Gentian), Hecht (Pike), Feuerlilie (Firelily), Schmetterling (Butterfly), Rheintochter (Rhine maiden), Wasserfall (Waterfall) and the Taifun (Typhoon). The last one had an acceleration of an incredible 45 G's.

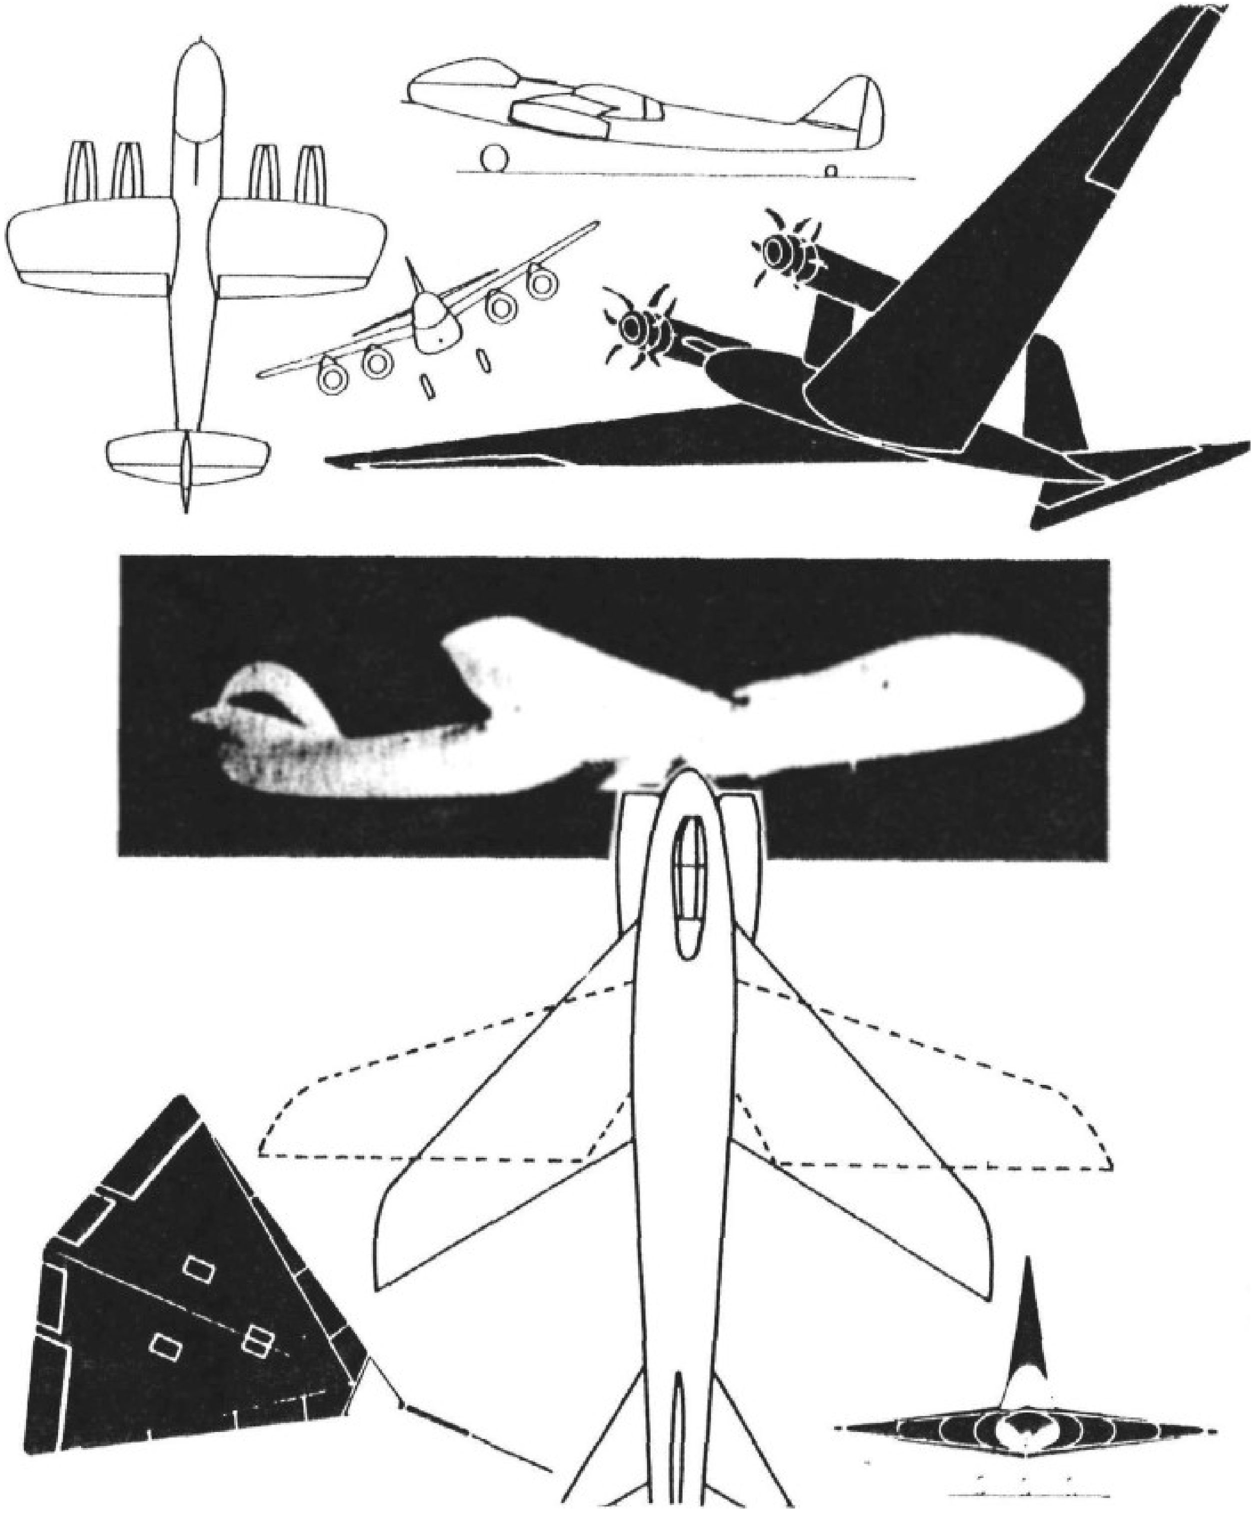
Wasserfall could reach 50,000 feet and was later improved upon. It was equipped with an infrared guidance system which sent it in a beeline for any Allied bomber — and was 100% accurate. The Butterfly was another step in the V (Vengeance) weapon programme. In April 1945, 3,000 were produced; in June it was to be 10,000 missiles of this type alone.

When V.E. day came around, on May 8th, 1945, many expert analysts amongst the victors expressed the opinion that not a single allied plane would have been able to penetrate the borders of the German Reich after May, 1945. Germany's defence curtain of anti-aircraft missiles would have been 100% fool proof. Not even the atomic bomb would have been able to be "delivered", not to mention the fact that London and Washington were by that time within range of existing Germany long-range rockets and jet bombers. But there are other weapons to be mentioned here.

There was the “Lafferenz Projects” which was just completed at the time it permitted the firing of missiles from submerged U-Boats. Attacks were planned on cities such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Washington and even far-off Detroit.

Tests had been completed using small-scale subs and rockets (Lake Topliz, Austria) and large V.ll’s towed behind a submarine off Cuxhaven on the North Sea. Then there were flying bombs with built-in computer-controlled T.V. cameras, controlled by pilots who could be hundreds of miles away. There were long-range jet bombers, with 12,000 mile range, jet aircraft — aircraft carriers, transport planes that carried other smaller planes (12 of them) piggyback to their target area and then let loose their cargo of death and destruction. There were ram jets, jet fighters, bombers, transports and there was even an SST transport capable of flying four times the speed of sound.





T.F.X. Jets and S.S.T. airliners; their origins can clearly be traced to Germany's Research labs.

Also there were passenger jets, a few of which are reproduced here. These plans had already progressed to the stage where models were being tested in the wind tunnels. It is interesting to see that the Americans adopted the German engine mountings on their later aircraft, but most startling of all is the Jumbo jet shown in these pages. Many of the Allied postwar developments originated right here in Germany’s laboratories, as is evidenced by the following excerpts photographically reproduced from “America’s Aircraft Year Book,” an official publication. It speaks for itself.

> As part of its comprehensive research program to exploit former enemy aeronautical developments, the Air Materiel Command’s Technical Intelligence agency was using the services of some 86 top-flight German aviation scientists of World War II. Working side by side with American military and civilian aeronautical engineers in the laboratories of Wright Field, these German experts were being used, as were tons of captured enemy materiel, documents, blueprints and microfilm, to save American engineers the time they would devote to problems already investigated by the Germans. Their knowledge also helped the Americans to catch up and improve upon Germany’s wartime advancement in such phases of aeronautical developments as rocket and jet power. Similar groups of former enemy technicians were employed in other parts of the country by various branches of the armed forces. At Fort Bliss, Texas, one group was working in connection with research on German V-2 rockets and other guided missiles. Others were working with the Army ordnance and engineer experts, and still others were working for the Navy in several fields of applied war research and development.
> Among those in the German group at Wright Field were Rudolph Hermann, Alexander Lippisch, Heinz Schmitt, Helmut Heinrich, and Fritz Doblhoff and Ernst Kugel. Hermann was attached to the Peenemunde Research Station for Aerodynamics, where Germany’s V-2 rockets were hatched and launched against England. A specialist in supersonics, he was in charge of the supersonic wind tunnel at Kochel in the Bavarian Alps. He also was a member of the group entrusted with Hitler’s futuristic plans to establish a space-station rocket-refueling base revolving as a satellite about the earth at a distance of 4,000 miles—a scheme which he and certain high-ranking AAF officers in 1947 still believed to be feasible.
> In order to break down the language difficulties in deciphering captured German documents, prominent educators were working with the AAF in compiling a new 75,000-word German-English dictionary intended to clarify German aeronautical terms and phrases. Supervising the project was Dr. Kurt I.. Leidecker, on leave from the Behr-Manning Corporation and Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, where he was assistant professor of modern languages and instructor of scientific German. Nearly half the contents of the new dictionary were to be new words. The Germans had nazified aeronautical terms formerly having classic roots, and had coined many new terms not found in any existing dictionary. Material for the dictionary was being extracted from broken enemy codes and from 250 tons of captured German air documents. Considerable value was attached to the widely heralded German ZWB (Central Organization for Scientific Reports) Index which contained important scientific documents. Included were many of the newer aeronautical terms and some applications of older words, which served as an aid to the project translators. Also helpful were German translations of American and British aeronautical terms found in captured documents, and the arbitrary words and phrases applied to German prototypes and equivalents of Allied equipment and accessories.
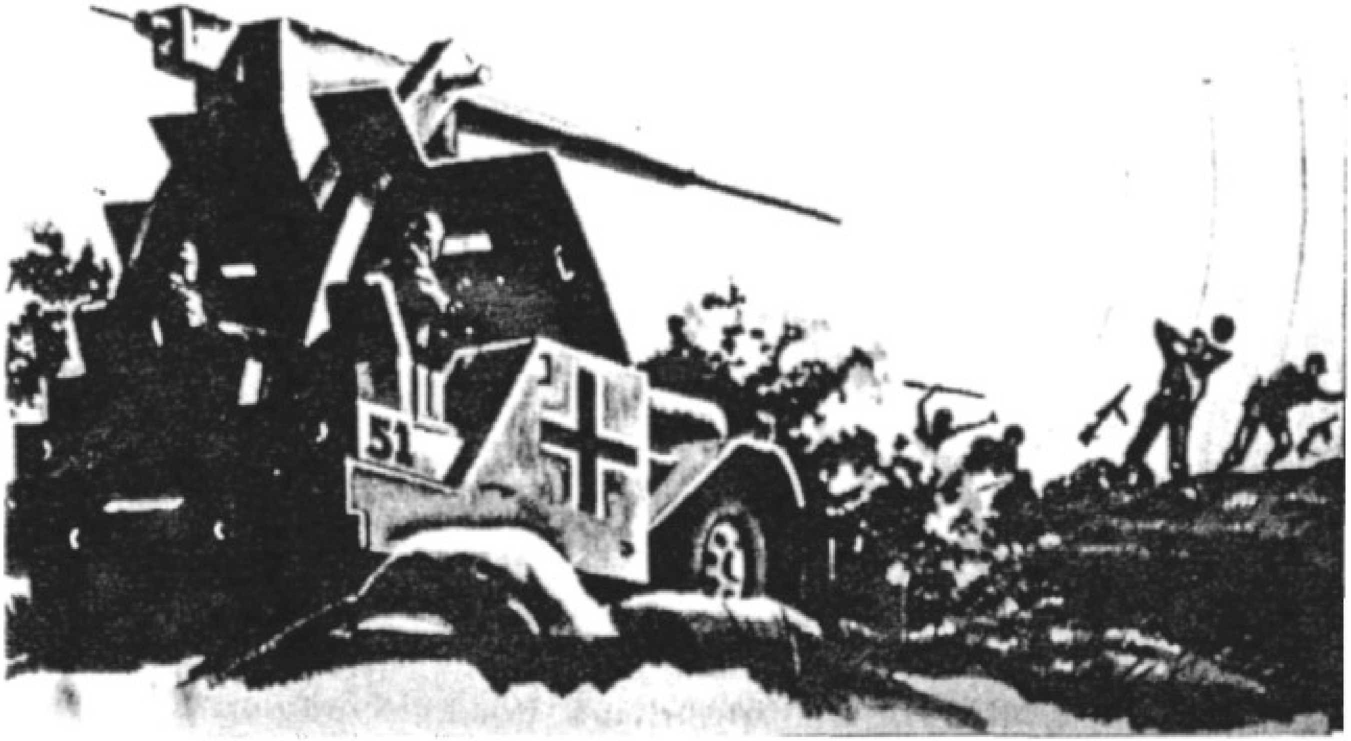
> The German scientists worked voluntarily at Wright Field under special contracts as alien civilian employees of the War Department. Their salaries ranged from $2.20 to $11 a day, and were paid to their banks or families in Germany.

There are other developments never mentioned in any official book, namely the UFO and other even more devastating weapons. Why is no mention made of them officially? Is it because they were not found? Or that they were destroyed?

However, before proceeding with the UFO’s there are a few more secret developments which must be covered and which, perhaps, you have never heard of before, — the death rays, the sun cannon, Pandora’s Box and the Aeolus Bag.



ART BY FRANK BOLLE

The Sound Cannon

Once again, we find Hitler steering his scientists towards using nature, not opposing it. He had them harness two important elements, namely the power of the air and the power of the sun.

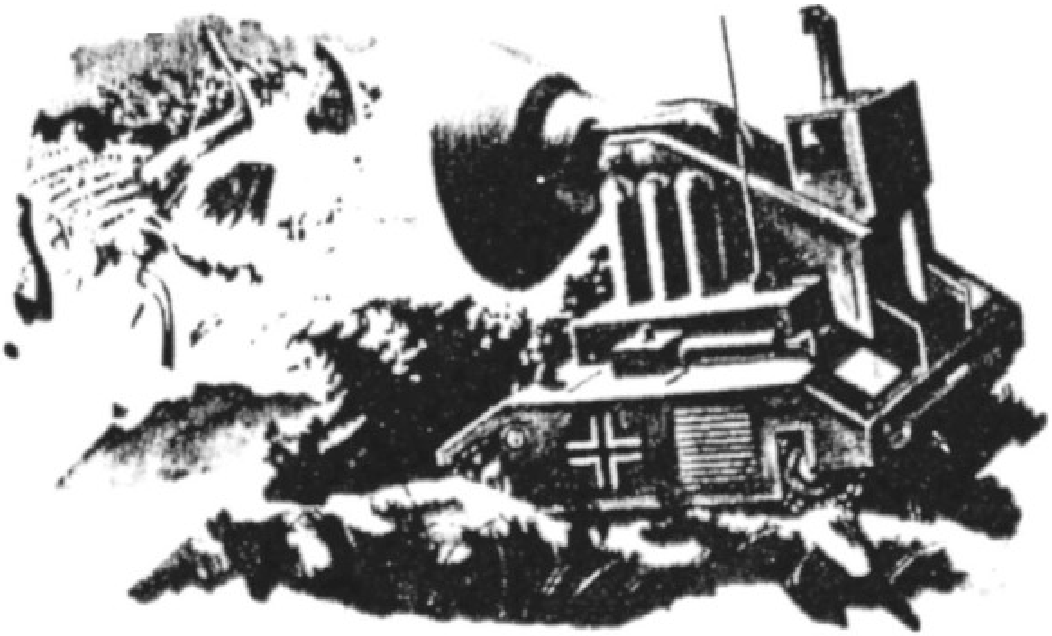
The first experiments started as early as 1943, on a lonely, rarely-visited mountain plateau in Tyrol. For a number of weeks scientists and specialists from the Reichsluftfahrtamt in Berlin (Office of Aeronautics) — of which Major Lusar, who reported about the German UFO programme, was also a member, had been busy setting up a camp, or more appropriately, a base. They were busy unpacking and assembling some odd-looking pieces of equipment. Huge crates arrived by truck from various parts of the Fatherland. Significantly again, many factories which were involved in this project were located underground in what is now Czechoslovakia. When all was assembled, there stood on that lonely, bleak plateau, high in the mist-shrouded mountains of Austria, a most fearsome weapon — the Sound Cannon. (see photograph reproduced here). It looks like a weird longish platform with an angular smoke stack that can be turned into horizontal positions and a fire place or boiler seems to be at the base of it. In actual fact it is a rigid steel combustion chamber in which methane and oxygen can be ignited under high pressure, with the ultimate aim of creating a series of powerful explosions at rapid intervals. The shock waves created by these explosions were to be directed, via the conical smoke stack against any aggressor, with a devastating force. The whole infernal principle was based on the knowledge that the shock waves of sound, generate a certain pressure upon objects which may be in their path. Thunderclaps with their earth-shaking after effects served as the father of thought, in this particular case.

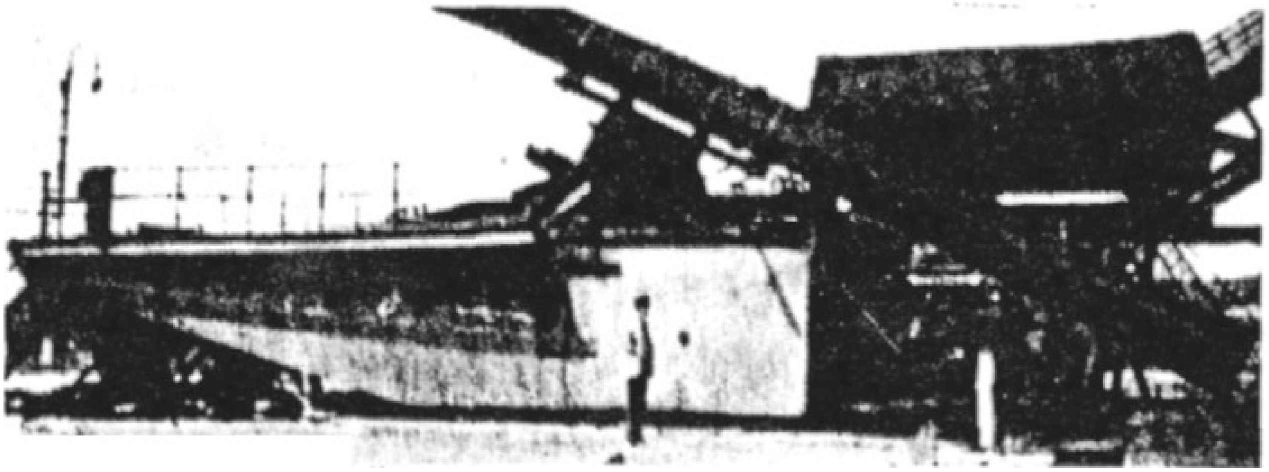
Sonic booms as created by fast and high-flying jet aircraft can, in effect, damage buildings and burst ear drums. Sound, therefore, if strong enough, can kill. And so the reasoning went behind these tests. Why were they testing this device way up in the Alps? To the peasants below and around, it sounded like a thunderstorm and so created little suspicion.

The scientists had had hundreds of dogs and pigs trained to take the place of attacking Russian infantry. The animals were trained, Pavlovian style to run in a certain direction for their daily fodder, about 400 yards away. The day the experiment was started, they were once again headed for their troughs. The Sound Cannon had been erected behind some bushes. First came the dogs, then the pigs. There were no eaters at troughs that day; not one animal survived that 400 yard dash.

The dogs came first; at 150 yards distance the first salvo was fired, there was a terrific bang and then followed the shock waves. The dogs stood as if frozen to the ground. Suddenly they let loose a heart-rending howl and raced towards the troughs only to be hit by another round. The dogs had come within 50 feet of the sound cannon and not one of them survived that second shot. The pigs, still 100 yards away were paralyzed for hours. All suffered from disorientation effects, causing them to run helter skelter in each and every direction. None of them made it to the feeding troughs.

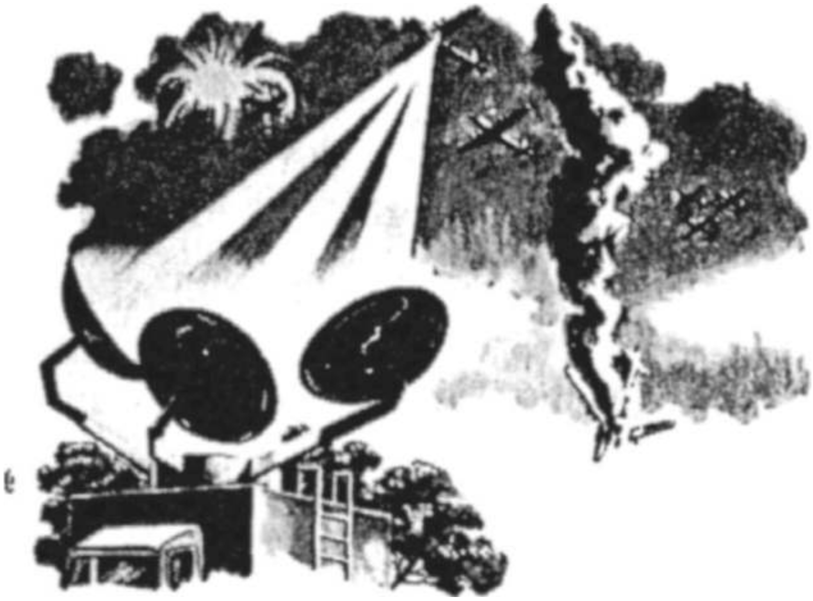
The sound cannon was used operationally against the Russians on the approaches to the Elbe River and against American aircraft close to Passau on the Danube — with the same results. (One wonders did Admiral Byrd suffer the same fate as the pigs when he gave orders to abort that Antarctic overflight after all his orientation instruments went haywire in 1947?). Illustration shows artist’s conception of the Sound Cannon.





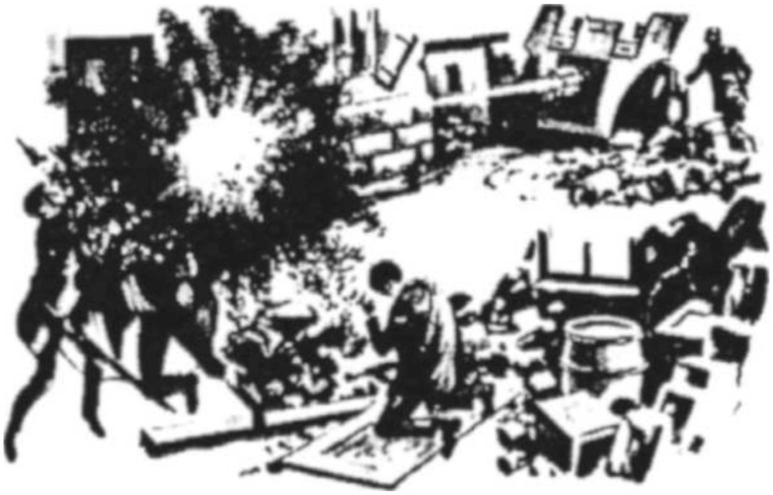
The Aeolus Bag

This New-Age weapon was used to fight off the seemingly endless hordes of Mongolians that were spewed forth from Asia’s vast steppes. It used oxygen and hydrogen for combustion. The weapon’s function was similar to an air compressor, commonly found on construction sites. If you have ever witnessed the concentrated power of pressurized air from a pneumatic tool or drill you will be able to appreciate the potential impact of the Aeolus Bag. It could stop a truck or a plane dead in its track before disintegrating it.



The Sun Cannon

Very early in the war, the Germans, well-versed in Greek mythology, built another contraption of note. This silent weapon consisted of a huge truck-mounted mirror able to be rotated at will. The sun's rays were to be collected, concentrated and sent back towards the sky, blinding enemy pilots and gunners, and so giving to the German fighters very easy pickings. Due to weather conditions over northern Europe, the weapon was seldom used "at home". However, a member of the Africa Corps reported it used on the ground on some occasions and with excellent results.



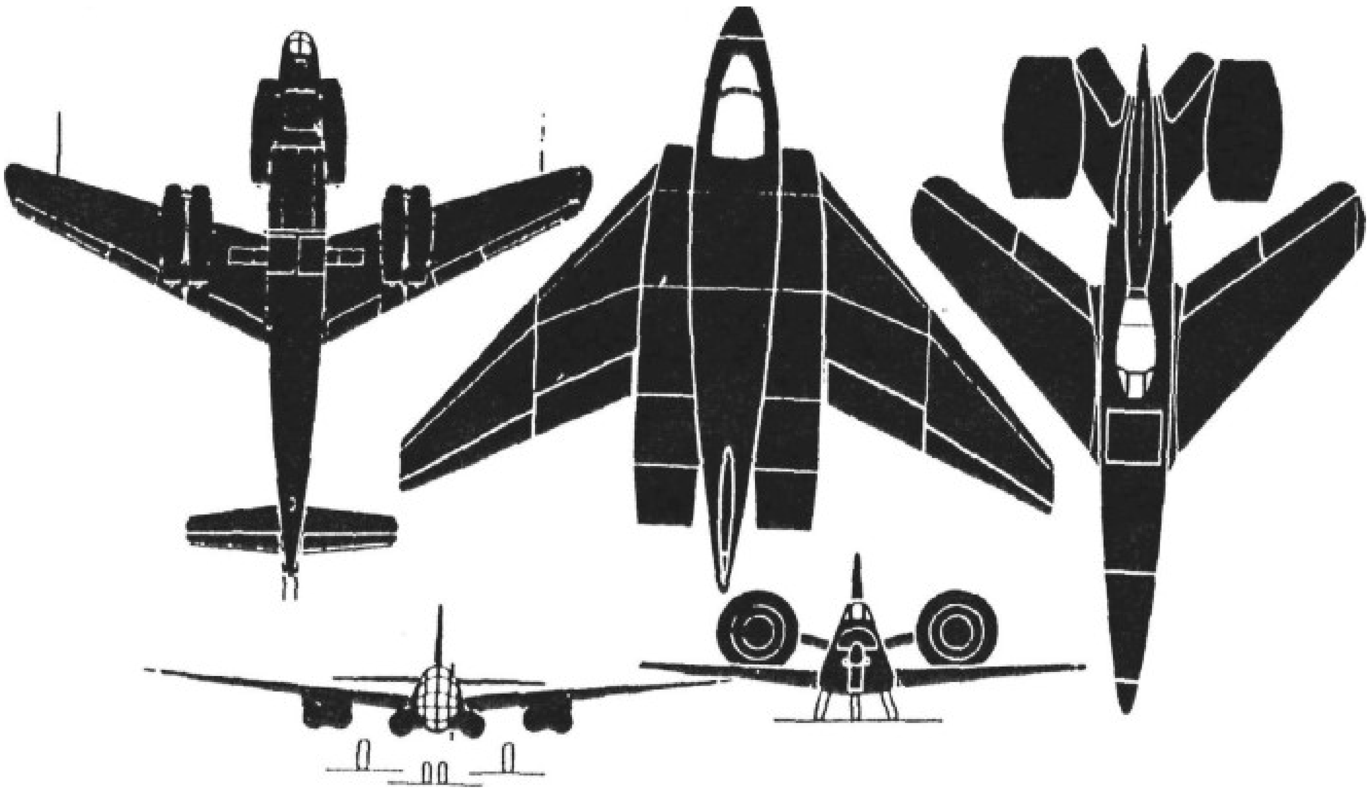
Pandora's Box

When first conceived Pandora's Box was thought of as an anti-aircraft weapon, but it proved to be most devastating on the ground. The SS used it against the Jewish, uprising in the Ghetto of Warsaw.

The inventor was, in civilian occupation, a mining engineer. He simply re-created the dread of all coal miners — an underground coal dust explosion. The explosion literally razed any building from its foundations. (See illustration). None of these weapons were ever used by the allies in any of the 50 wars since the end of W.W. II. One could safely assume therefore that these weapons did not fall into allied hands, since every other German invention has been reproduced; from missiles to space flight and satellites, and each has been always loudly heralded as some scientific breakthrough by either Russia or Uncle Sam.

This brings to mind a glaring example of the "Brain Drain". Recently it was announced with great fanfare that a U.S. paint company had perfected a superb camouflage paint capable of absorbing radar waves or make them unintelligible. They must have either "re-invented" a German invention which had been long in U.S. hands, and probably at great expense to the U.S. taxpayer, or else they just pocketed the money for going through Hitler's files, for it was nothing more than the paint used on German planes at the end of the war.

There were also other fantastic developments in the purely conventional aircraft design. Reproduced here are a few of the planes on the drawing boards when Germany surrendered. The famous B.M.W. plant in Munich produced for Hitler the world's first supersonic jet bomber only 12 months after Hitler had requested it. It's range was to be 10,000 miles. Six jet engines were to give it the speed of sound at an altitude of over 50,000 feet. The plane's code name, the Horten XVIII, would have been rolling off the assembly lines in the summer of 1945. It was to have carried 8,000 pounds of explosives to America and Russia and was designed to give the native population of these continents a taste of what it felt like to be at the receiving end of the "Liberators".



Hitler was an ardent believer in the teaching of Clausewitz and despite having under his control all of the above advanced technology and the atom bomb, he realised the necessity of having a certain amount of physical force to be able to occupy and control any given land-populated area. This Hitler lacked in April 1945 and hence his strategic withdrawal from Berlin.

Positions in February, May 8th, 1945

With the advancing allied armies came teams of scientifically trained specialists, whose sole jobs were to hunt for German scientists and to ensure that their installations, laboratories and factories were not destroyed. The Americans were the cleverest and best organized in this field, capturing many “prize catches”, and this, much to the chagrin and often anger, of the British, the French and especially the Russians. This great American “brain robbery” of the defeated enemy was so mind-boggling that a special dictionary for technical jargon of the aircraft industry alone had to be created by the captured Germans. It was comprised of over 75,000 separate terms and it made possible the exploitation of the stolen German patents. Wind tunnels, whole factories, all machines, every nut and bolt, including models, drawings and prototypes were shipped to America and to a lesser degree to the other allies. Top flight scientists were “invited” to work in the U.S. for $2.20 a day while being kept prisoners. In order to get cooperation, their starvation diets were kept “supplemented”. Some were even offered citizenship as an inducement, or “war crimes” trials if they didn’t produce. They included “Wernher von Braun”!

The Russians used methods only slightly different to those used by the Americans. On one particular occasion in an extremely well-coordinated plan conducted all over Soviet-occupied Germany, 275,000 specialists with their wives and children were hauled out of their beds in the early hours of the morning.

KIDNAPPING OF GERMAN SPECIALISTS

The raid was conducted in the Soviet Zone, 21st and 22nd October, 1946, all over central Germany by heavily armed troops, working to a minutely detailed plan. The specialists were forced to sign work agreements of five-year duration. Those who refused were taken in spite of their refusal. Women, children and even babies were taken. Protests were ignored or beaten down.

With few personal belongings, they were all shipped off to Russia. German factories were awaiting them, already dismantled and crated. There these specialists worked around the clock for three bowls of borscht soup and a slice of dark bread daily. In this way they were forced to help in bringing the Soviets, first, up-to-date and into the 20th Century, and then into the space age. With the further aid of U.S. Communist spies, Rosenberg, Greenglass et al the Russians were able to produce the first atom bomb. German science allowed them to produce Mig fighter-planes which were used to kill many Americans in Korea and later, in Vietnam.

The German scientists worked in about 40 different locations all over Russia:

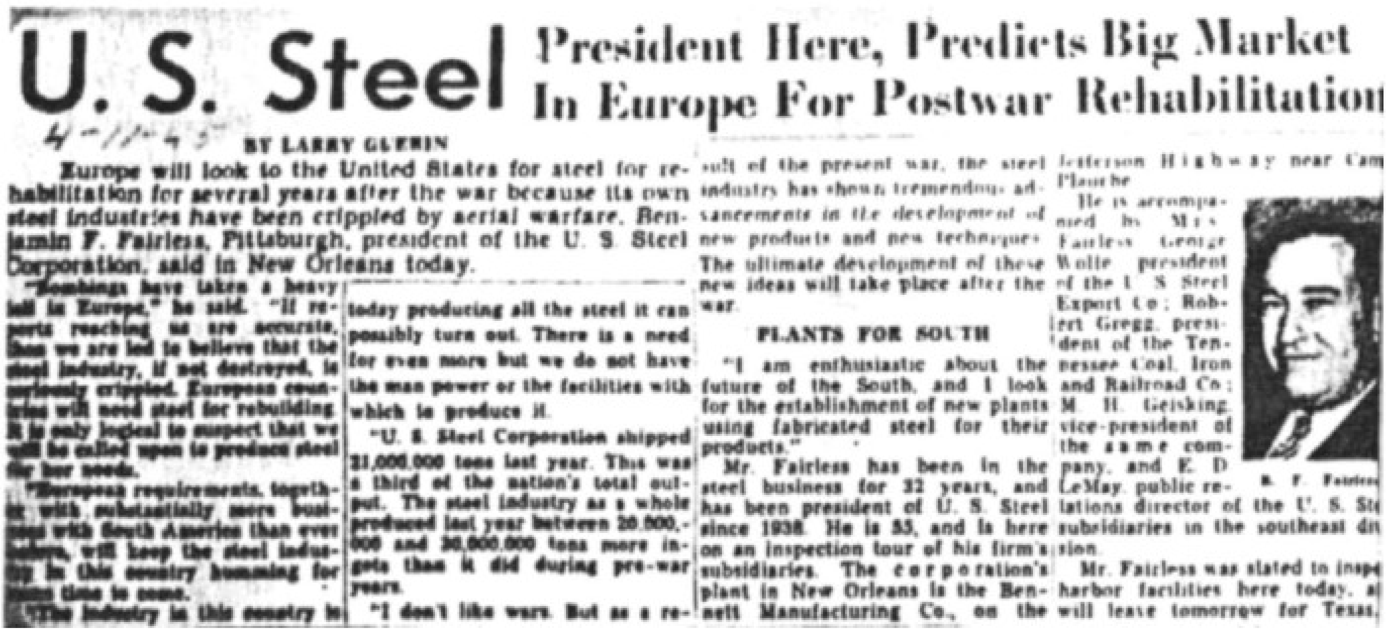
40% in Kujbyschew — aircraft and jet engineer works
31% in Podberesje — aircraft design
6.5% in Moscow — radio, telephone technicians
4.5% in Tuschinow — pipelines
3% in Ostasckleow —
2% in Suchumi — Atomic research
1.5% in Leningrad — T.V. technicians

When the Germans protested as a group, they were shown documents, in English, signed by President Roosevelt of the United States, and by Winston Churchill, granting the Russians the express right to utilize any German person as they saw fit. Apparently these democratic leaders had no regard for human rights or liberties. These were the same men, who had wailed at Nuremberg, about the Germans utilizing forced labour in concentration camps. What hypocrites.

After their five year terms had been served, during which many had died and many were condemned to slave labour camps for life — camps such as “Workuta”, the scientists were kept for another 2-3 years in quarantine, so that they would forget the projects they had worked on, no pencils, no paper was allowed them. What devils in human form. Sanctioned by the leaders of England and the U.S.A.

All submarine construction, torpedo development, tank-building and, of course, military rocket construction was performed by the forced, slave labour of the German top brains and thus was fulfilled the agreement made by the Allies, and in particular by the Americans, at conferences held in Potsdam and Yalta.

The Allies committed the greatest highjacking crime in all recorded history when they stole thirty railroad cars full of German patents. Stolen is the only word that fits this crime, for not a cent was ever paid to Germany in royalties or property rights. However, the true motives of both the East and West were soon revealed to the entire world. It was not humanitarian ideals that led to the “get Germany” war in 1939 but obviously it was outright theft and industrial-economic considerations. As soon as the Allies had in their hands the German specialists and had bombed their troublesome competitor (German industry) out of the world market place, (not a savoury method but an extremely effective one), (see photo copy of U.S. Steel Speech), they couldn’t have cared less about freedom. There was no freedom of the press, freedom of speech or of opinion in Allied-occupied Europe and even today, thirty years later, there is still none.



U. S. Steel President Here, Predicts Big Market In Europe For Postwar Rehabilitation

BY LARRY GUERIN

Europe will look to the United States for steel for rehabilitation for several years after the war because its own steel industries have been crippled by aerial warfare, Benjamin F. Fairless, Pittsburgh, president of the U. S. Steel Corporation, said in New Orleans today.

"Bombings have taken a heavy toll in Europe," he said. "If reports reaching us are accurate, then we are led to believe that the steel industry, if not destroyed, is seriously crippled. European countries will need steel for rebuilding. It is only logical to suspect that we will be called upon to produce steel for her needs.

"European requirements, together with substantially more business with South America than ever before, will keep the steel industry in this country humming for some time to come.

"The industry in this country is today producing all the steel it can possibly turn out. There is a need for even more but we do not have the man power or the facilities with which to produce it.

"U. S. Steel Corporation shipped 21,000,000 tons last year. This was a third of the nation's total output. The steel industry as a whole produced last year between 20,000,000 and 30,000,000 tons more ingots than it did during pre-war years.

"I don't like wars. But as a result of the present war, the steel industry has shown tremendous advancements in the development of new products and new techniques. The ultimate development of these new ideas will take place after the war.

PLANTS FOR SOUTH

"I am enthusiastic about the future of the South, and I look for the establishment of new plants using fabricated steel for their products."

Mr. Fairless has been in the steel business for 32 years, and has been president of U. S. Steel since 1938. He is 55, and is here on an inspection tour of his firm's subsidiaries. The corporation's plant in New Orleans is the Bennett Manufacturing Co., on the Jefferson Highway near Cam Plauche.

He is accompanied by Mrs. Fairless, George Wolfe, president of the U. S. Steel Export Co.; Robert Gregg, president of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Co.; M. H. Geisking, vice-president of the same company, and E. D. LeMay, public relations director of the U. S. St subsidiaries in the southeast di sion.

B. F. Fairle

Mr. Fairless was slated to insp harbor facilities here today, a will leave tomorrow for Texas.

War and its aftermath always mean big profits for big business

It was also the victors who introduced at Nuremberg the "democratic" order that "Might was Right" and so hanged Europe's elite for alleged crimes, which similar crimes the victors were still committing daily, such as employing slave labour (P.O.W.'s), establishing and running concentration camps, (Dachau, Buchenwald, Auschwitz etc., but now with Allied guards), and expelling millions from their ancestral home lands, to name a few.

However, despite all the stealing, one prize catch eluded both the east and west. Germany's U.F.O. research scientists could not be found. At first, drunk with victory, this important factor was overlooked but as the hangover from booty hunting, rape and conquest came to an end, it was too late. That some key scientists were obviously missing became clear, and although some plants and their installations were located, the staff with their machinery and prototypes had disappeared. Even the test pilots had vanished.

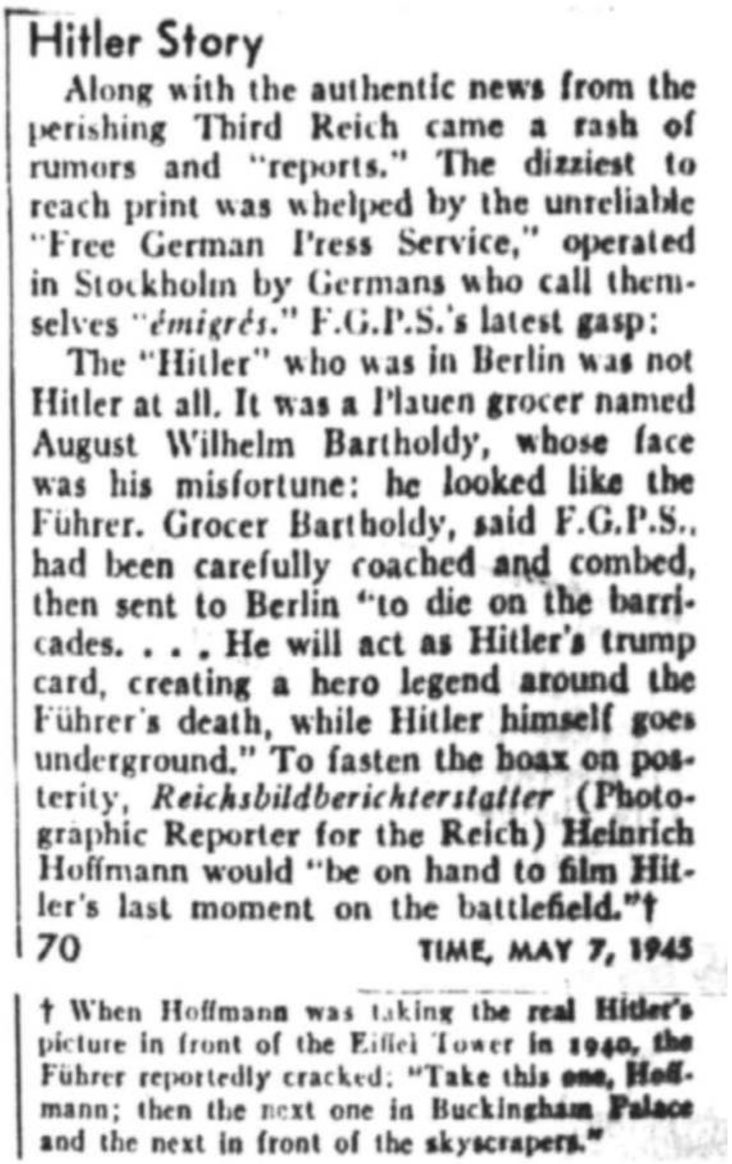
The Allied Intelligence networks again became active, but now the singleness of purpose — to kill the Krauts — was missing. The Allies began to suspect and accuse each other of having captured the "last secret". They had agreed to divide the loot "honestly". Each Ally was to receive microfilm copies of each and every German patent and secret document, regardless of whom had captured them, and since each stated they had kept their side of the bargain, a deadlock was reached. This controversy, which took place in the utmost secrecy and on the highest level, suddenly took a new and alarming twist.

From Northern Europe, and especially from neutral Sweden, came reports of Flying Saucers, called by the Swedish Press, "German Secret Weapons". This caused a sensation not only in Europe but in the entire world.

Stories abounded about overflights by these strange objects at speeds and in formations which the Swedes had only seen during the latter days of the war. During intense German secret weapon development, many of these weapons were being tested in the then still safe Baltic area. This U.F.O. activity (as it soon became called), occurred at just about the same time as serious European, and especially North and South American newspapers and radio networks, were carrying sensational reports about Hitler.

It was being claimed that Adolf Hitler had never committed suicide but had escaped from the Bunker in Berlin via a “hospital tank”, had been taken to Tempelhof airfield and there, with his wife, Eva Braun-Hitler, had transferred to one of Germany’s fast jets and flown first to Denmark and then on to Norway. Both Denmark and Norway were still firmly in German hands. From Norway, Hitler and a mysterious group of people, making up an entire convoy, were claimed to have left for an unknown destination. Let us now investigate!

Whilst the last paragraph reads like a story out of a sensational publication, (the type usually dealing with crime and sex), nevertheless Time magazine issue of May 7th, 1945, (one day before the war was officially ended), gave space for the following article, and this seven days after Hitler’s supposed suicide. Add to this the fact that the Press service from which this report emanated and was distributed, seems to be the same one or at least connected with, the Press service for which a certain Willy Frahm (now known as the retired Chancellor of West Germany, Willy Brandt) quite freely filed stories whilst in exile. Should this be the case then the report must be given added credence, for another of these exiles using this service was Herbert Wehner, today a top West German politician. At this time he was known as one of Stalin’s most active operators in the European underground and under constanct surveillance by the Swedish Police as a “Soviet Agent”.



Hitler Story

Along with the authentic news from the perishing Third Reich came a rash of rumors and "reports." The dizziest to reach print was whelped by the unreliable "Free German Press Service," operated in Stockholm by Germans who call themselves "émigrés." F.G.P.S.'s latest gasp:

The "Hitler" who was in Berlin was not Hitler at all. It was a Plauen grocer named August Wilhelm Bartholdy, whose face was his misfortune: he looked like the Führer. Grocer Bartholdy, said F.G.P.S., had been carefully coached and combed, then sent to Berlin "to die on the barricades. . . . He will act as Hitler's trump card, creating a hero legend around the Führer's death, while Hitler himself goes underground." To fasten the hoax on posterity, Reichsbildberichterstatter (Photographic Reporter for the Reich) Heinrich Hoffmann would "be on hand to film Hitler's last moment on the battlefield."†

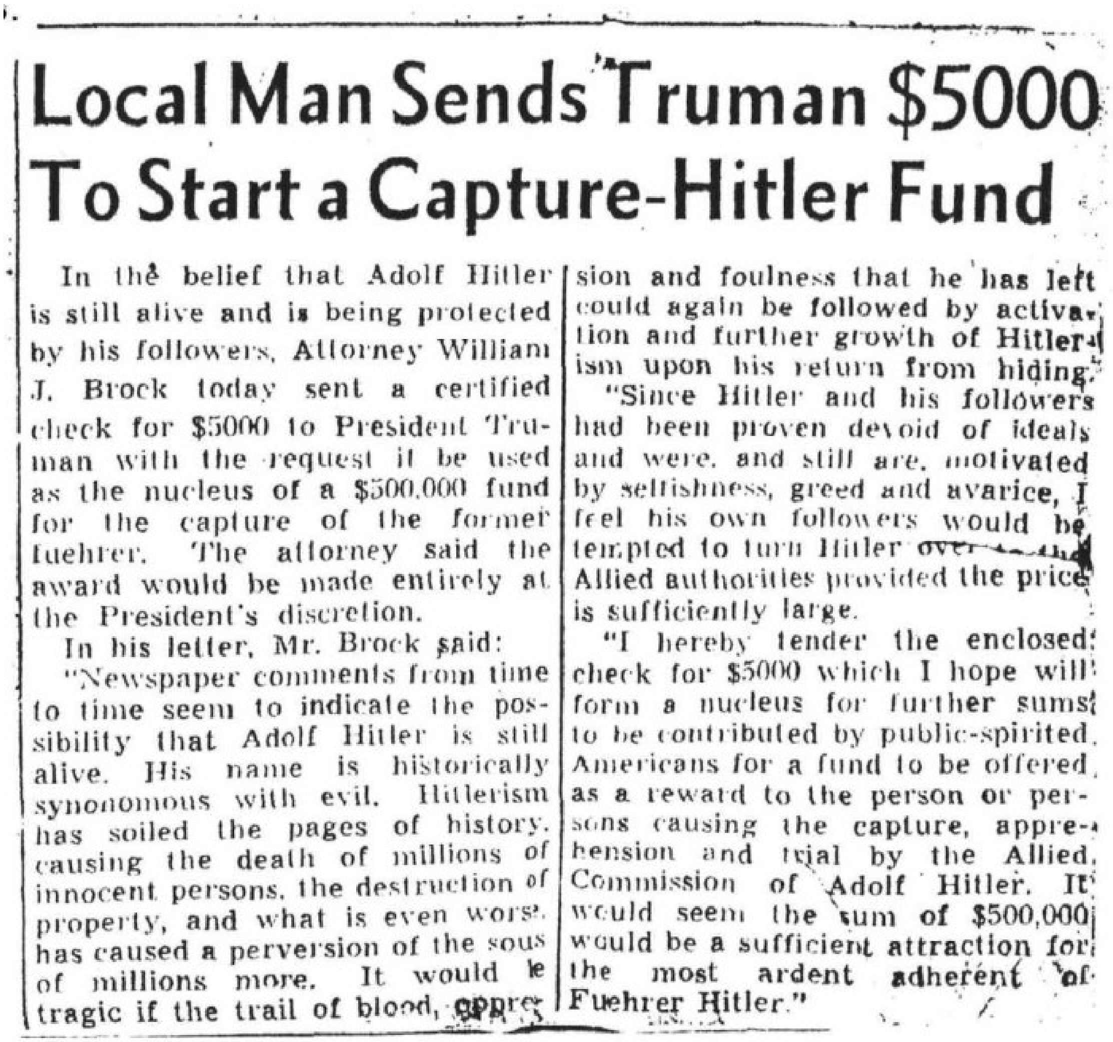
† When Hoffmann was taking the real Hitler's picture in front of the Eiffel Tower in 1940, the Führer reportedly cracked: "Take this one, Hoffmann; then the next one in Buckingham Palace and the next in front of the skyscrapers."

These types of Press services were usually the mouthpieces of communist spy rings inside German-controlled Europe. They were organized and financed by the Soviet Komintern or K.G.B. Their sources of information were from secret communist cells operating vast guerilla and spy networks which the Russians had set up even before W.W. II. Usually their information was first hand.

The Reds were waiting for the day of Germany's defeat when they could then get away with "murder" by killing all anti-Communists and conveniently calling them Nazi-collaborators.



Local Man Sends Truman $5000 To Start a Capture-Hitler Fund

In the belief that Adolf Hitler is still alive and is being protected by his followers, Attorney William J. Brock today sent a certified check for $5000 to President Truman with the request it be used as the nucleus of a $500,000 fund for the capture of the former fuehrer. The attorney said the award would be made entirely at the President's discretion.

In his letter, Mr. Brock said:

"Newspaper comments from time to time seem to indicate the possibility that Adolf Hitler is still alive. His name is historically synonomous with evil. Hitlerism has soiled the pages of history, causing the death of millions of innocent persons, the destruction of property, and what is even worse, has caused a perversion of the souls of millions more. It would be tragic if the trail of blood, oppression and foulness that he has left could again be followed by activation and further growth of Hitlerism upon his return from hiding.

"Since Hitler and his followers had been proven devoid of ideals and were, and still are, motivated by selfishness, greed and avarice, I feel his own followers would be tempted to turn Hitler over to the Allied authorities provided the price is sufficiently large.

"I hereby tender the enclosed check for $5000 which I hope will form a nucleus for further sums to be contributed by public-spirited Americans for a fund to be offered as a reward to the person or persons causing the capture, apprehension and trial by the Allied Commission of Adolf Hitler. It would seem the sum of $500,000 would be a sufficient attraction for the most ardent adherent of Fuehrer Hitler."

Another very interesting article was one which appeared in many U.S. newspapers announcing the formation of a "Capture Hitler Fund"! This is only second to an incredible book written by one of America's senior diplomats, former Secretary of State Jimmy Byrnes, in which he reveals a lengthy conversation he had with Stalin about the touchy subject of Hitler's disappearance from the world scene, and confirms Stalin's belief that Adolf Hitler had not died in the Bunker in Berlin.

Reproduced here is a condensed version of an article which appeared in an American religious publication entitled "The Cross and The Flag" of date April 1948, and gives Stalin's response to a direct question from Mr. Byrnes about Hitler's whereabouts. It seems that even the highest echelons of the Allied governments were not convinced of Hitler's death, for any reports of Hitler having been seen were always thoroughly checked out.

Is Hitler Still Alive?

Former Secretary of State Jimmy Byrnes reveals in his new book entitled "Frankly Speaking" that it is the opinion of Joe Stalin that Hitler is still alive. The statement of Byrnes sounds more like a belated confession than an historical account. Says Byrnes in effect: "While in Potsdam at the Conference of the Big Four, Stalin left his chair, came over and clinked his liquor glass with mine in a very friendly manner. I said to him: 'Marshal Stalin, what is your theory about the death of Hitler?' Stalin replied: 'He is not dead. He escaped either to Spain or Argentina.' "

If anyone knows where Hitler is, outside of his intimate friends, it is Josef Stalin. It will be remembered that the American troops were ready to invade Berlin first, but at the order of Franklin D. Roosevelt, acting through Ike Eisenhower, the American troops were held back in order that Stalin might have the honor of capturing Berlin. What a deal! What a betrayal of the pride and dignity of the United States Army, and what an insult to the British Army which was also ready to move in with our troops.

There are numerous theories concerning what happened to Hitler. I list them below:

1. The publicized theory is that he was burned up during the bombing of Berlin.
2. He was captured by the Russians and is now a prisoner in Moscow.
3. He was captured by the Russians, tortured and then killed.
4. He was spirited away by certain Jewish extremists who desired to slaughter him as an act of revenge.
5. He was assassinated by one of his own aides who had accepted a large sum from Hitler's enemies and promised safety.
6. He committed suicide.
7. He commandeered a military plane and escaped with a staff of trusted compatriots.

Evidently Joe Stalin believes that the seventh theory is correct. I agree with Stalin in this theory. The most sensational neglect of a news story is in the fact that when Stalin told this to Byrnes it was not flashed across the world and given sensational display in the headlines of every daily newspaper on earth. It is still one of the most sensational pieces of news to come out. I will give you my reasons for believing that the first six theores are not well founded.

1. Just prior to the capture of Berlin, Hitler was in complete command of all military forces. Why did a man as brilliant and powerful as he was crawl down into a shelter and submit himself to cremation. This is illogical and unreasonable in the light of all that is known about Hitler.
2. Hitler was hated by the Russians more than any enemy that the Soviet had. He never would have submitted to being captured by them alive, and there was no reason why he should have been captured. Escape was really easy as far as he was concerned.
3. The argument which eliminates the second theory eliminates this one.
4. There were practically no Jews in Berlin when it was captured or prior to its capture. This theory seems far-fetched.
5. This theory might stand up were it not for the fact that only a few months prior to his disappearance certain corrupted friends had planted a bomb under his chair and somehow it did not go off at the proper moment, but went off after he left his chair, injuring him but not killing him. This made him very cautious and it is reasonable to believe that he was very alert at the time of his disappearence to betrayal within his own camp.
6. This theory is exploded by the fact that Hitler was a very courageous man. He never did anything to indicate physical or moral cowardice. It will be recalled that newsreels showed him walking freely and mixing freely with the crowds. A courageous man, whether he is wrong or right, whether he is a statesman or criminal, never commits suicide.
7. This theory stands up and there is any one of five or six places where he might be today. They include (a) Argentina; (b) Spain; (c) Ireland; (d) Sweden; (e) Africa; (f) Portugal; (g) Switzerland.

Hitler was known to have many, many followers in all of these countries. It will be remembered when Stalin was about to overrun and undermine Spain, and his followers were burning the churches, that Hitler sent an abundance of help to Franco, and Franco evidently felt under lasting obligation to Hitler.

Whatever the truth may be concerning this matter, it is not to be overlooked that Hitler, Mussolini and Roosevelt left the stage of action within a few weeks of each other. Mystery still surrounds the passing of Roosevelt. Thus, these 'three rulers,' who were perhaps three of the most powerful men that ever lived, disappeared from public life shrouded with mystery. It is now a matter of common knowledge that Mussolini was hanged by a Communist mob. The same people who hung Mussolini and spat upon him and rolled his body in the gutter in such a barbaric manner that the church authorities protested — it is now a matter of common knowledge that the same people and leaders who lynched Mussolini without a trial are now the leaders of the movement to make Italy Communist and turn it over to Tito and Stalin.

To those who believe that Hitler is dead I submit the following questions:

1. Who saw him die?
2. Why hasn't someone been able to produce a piece of metal or a bone or a tooth filling that remained after his alleged cremation?
3. Why did he voluntarily wait to be consumed when he had so many opportunities for escape?
4. Why does his personal aviator admit that he flew him out of Germany and turned him over to another plane?
5. Of course, the $54 question is: Why did Stalin tell Mr. Byrnes that he was convinced that Hitler was still alive? Although Stalin is perhaps the world's biggest liar, there would be no object in his not telling the truth concerning this matter. Stalin guessed Spain or Argentina. My guess is Argentina. The Argentine people were very friendly to Germany. The Argentine has a large German population, many of whom were pro-Hitler. Peron has made it safe for Mussolini's son and now his family.

THE SATIRE OF FATE

The satire of the passing of time in the hands of fate lies in the fact that we are now in Hitler's boots in one respect. We are trying to figure out how to push back Stalin.

When the Jew lynch mob which runs the Nuremberg Court caused the top generals of Germany to be virtually lynched without an appeal to a higher court and in violation to America's sense of justice, one of the generals said, as he was about to be hanged "Some day Stalin will do this to you."

It is interesting to note that the presiding judge at Nuremberg, a high class Supreme Court Justice from Iowa, recently announced that if he had known the facts he never would have gone to Germany. He criticized and virtually condemned the whole set-up. (See editorial elsewhere in this magazine entitled "Judge Gets a Stomachful".)

We may need a knowledge of Hitler's experience some day if we are to prevent Russia from overrunning the world. We need to know why Hitler failed to stop Stalin in order that we may profit by his mistakes.

As the truth comes out we begin to discover reports being made by the most conservative journalists that the war could have been avoided and that by a statesmanlike manipulation Hitler and Stalin could have weakened themselves on each other without destroying all of Europe and without involving us in a debt which now threatens inflation and depression. Strange enough, England and France, our two chief allies, are suffering almost as much as Germany, although they were, along with us, alleged victors.

If Hitler is still alive I hope it will some day be discovered and he will be permitted to tell his experience. Some experience! It could be that both Franco and Peron are profiting by his mistakes. They have established governments strong enough to eliminate Communism, free enough to give opportunity to the people, and sincere enough to protect the churches. Let us hope and pray that a strong central government will never be necessary in the U.S.A., but if we have to choose, may it be God's last will that as between a strength dedicated to Stalin and a strength dedicated to Jesus Christ, it may be the latter.

Oberst Skorzeny was a famous German Commando leader and a personal friend of Hitler. Hitler entrusted him with many daring missions, such as the rescuing of Mussolini from his mountain-top prison, and the arresting of Vice-Regent Horthy of Hungary from the Castle in Budapest, at a time when the Castle was surrounded by thousands of Hungarian elite troops. Skorzeny was repeatedly interrogated by the American C.I.C. and even as late as 1947-48, about his alleged role in the escape of Hitler!

Did Hitler and some of his closest men indeed survive the Third Reich? This question is of world significance, and it is with this in mind that the following articles are quoted, and some are reproduced in photo copy form for those readers who are multilingual.

Of all the articles and the versions of Hitler's escape from his embattled bunker in Berlin, the following seems the most plausible: In the German-language book "Das Ende des Hitler Mythos", page 339, reference is made to a series of events which completely negate the claims of the suicides of Hitler and Eva Braun. These suicides are usually stated to have happened at the Fuhrer Bunker, Berlin, April 30th, 1945, 3.30 p.m. In the above book it is claimed that Hitler was seen at 4.15 p.m. on that same day. Eyewitnesses gave their accounts under oath. Hitler either made a Christ-like resurrection, three quarters of an hour after his "death" or he had left the Bunker alive and with a plan.

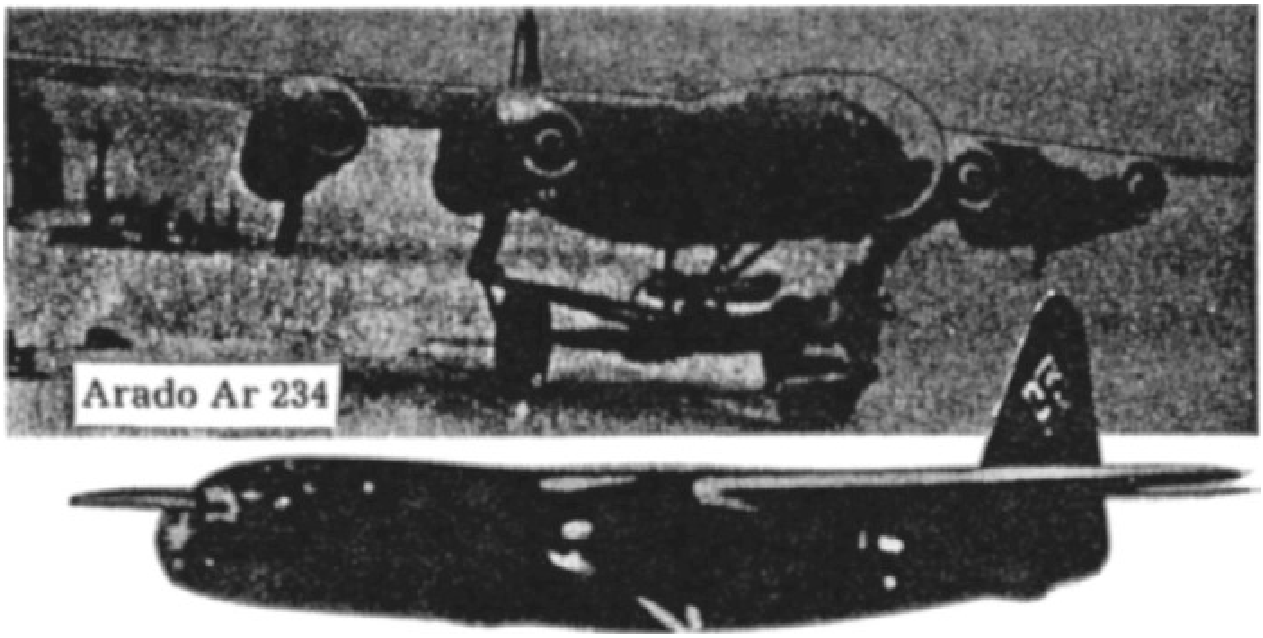
¿HITLER EN DINAMARCA?

Durante el proceso que se realizó en la ciudad de Varsovia, el capitán Peter Baumgart declaró que había llevado en su avión a Hitler y a un grupo de amigos de éste a Dinamarca, el día 28 de abril de 1945, poco [illegible] pués de los aliados. [illegible] vanta vuelo en el Hohenzollerndamm y aterrizó a 19 kilómetros del río Eider, en Dinamarca. Según su declaración, el Fuehrer le entregó al aterrizar un cheque por 20.000 marcos. Baumgart aparece en esta fotografía con uniforme de aviador, tal como se presentó en el juicio que se le sigue en Varsovia en su condición de miembro de la organización hitlerista de las S. S. —iniciales con que se designaba a la "Schutz-Staffel", la fuerza organizada y férreamente disciplinada por Heinrich Himmler para la protección del Fuehrer.

Spanish newspaper reports about Hitler's escape

According to further evidence contained in press reports emanating from Munich and appearing in the pages of "Diario llustrado" of Santiago, Chile issue of 18th January, 1948, "on 30th of April, 1945, Berlin was in dissolution but little of that dissolution was evident at Tempelhof airfield. Ground support organizations, such as radio, radar as well as harbour and riverboat direction were functioning at peak efficiency. Takeoffs and landings were handled smoothly. The airspace was crowded. Every six minutes a plane landed and ten planes took off every hour, and all of this with a city under siege. Highspeed German fighters and jets could be seen circling about to secure airspace and consequently Tempelhof runways had received only minor damage. The sound of machine-gun fire could be heard in the distance. Radio operators had received reports that the Russians had advanced to the Koch and Oranian Strasse. Contact to the city's centre had been interrupted. Two alternatives remained, escape by air from Tempelhof or capture by the advancing Soviet troops".

"At 4.15 p.m. a JU52 landed, and S.S. troops directly from Rechlin for the defence of Berlin disembarked, all of them young, not older than 18 years. The gunner in the particular plane was an engineer by the name of B......... whom I had known for a number of years and for whom I had endeavoured to get exemption from military service. He sought to tank up and leave Berlin as quickly as possible. During this re-fuelling interval Mr. B......... was suddenly elbowed in the ribs by his radio operator with a nod to look in a certain direction. At about 100-120 metres he saw a sleek Messerschmitt Jet Model 332. (The reporters must have made a mistake here, it could only have been an ARADO 234 — a mistake not difficult to understand since secrecy was the hallmark of the Nazi Regime. This Turbojet had a range of 4,000 km.) Mr. B........ and the radio operator saw and without any doubt whatsoever, standing in front of the jet, their Commander in Chief, Adolf Hitler, dressed in field-grey uniform and gesticulating animatedly with some Partyfunctionaries, who were obviously seeing him off. For about ten minutes whilst their plane was being refuelled the two men observed this scene and around 4.30 p.m. they took to the air again. They were extremely astonished to hear during the midnight military news bulletin, some seven and a half hours later that Hitler had committed suicide".



Arado Ar 234

It was during this military news broadcast that Admiral Donitz announced that he was taking over as the new Commander-in-Chief. This same bulletin was broadcast over the German civilian radio network and Dr. Goebbels reported that the Fuhrer had entered Valhalla, (that mystical place in ancient Nordic sagas where heroes dwell after death).

Upon questioning, the engineer Mr. B........... denied the possibility of error on his part and reiterated that on April 30th, 1945 at 4.15 p.m., whilst refuelling his plane at Tempelhof airport, and in the bright light of the setting sun he saw Adolf Hitler, and at a time when it was no longer possible to reach the Reichskanzlei (Hitler's Bunker). When Mr. B......... first heard the news reports he concluded that Hitler had died in an airplane crash." This particular report by Mr. B........ with all the sensational content, was never published in the English-speaking press.

The Soviet Information Office reported on May 3rd, 1945, that Hitler's servant, Fritsche had been captured and interrogated by the Soviets and had stated that Hitler, Goebbels and the new Chief of the General Staff, General of the Infantry, Krebs, had committed suicide. Lt. Heimlich of the American C.I.C., whose responsibility it was to check all rumours and reports, all sightings and evidence regarding the whereabouts or the death of Hitler, reached the conclusion that Hitler, Eva Braun and Martin Bormann were still alive and that there existed not one iota of proof that Hitler had actually died.

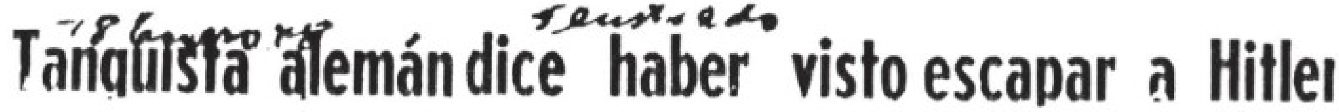
The report (INS) further stated that according to investigations by the American authorities it would have been relatively simple to escape from Berlin, whilst experts pointed to the almost impossible task of burning a corpse in the open air by just dousing it with a can of gasoline and not leave behind some recognisable evidence.

It is a fact that a working party made up of American, British, French and Russian soldiers did find a ditch which produced two hats, supposedly belonging to Hitler, and also a pair of panties bearing Eva Braun's initials, but no corpses or parts of corpses.

This is where Hitler's hats and Eva Braun's panties were found. (Allied investigators)

Much has been written regarding identification through medical and dental records and Hitler has been much in the news in this respect. A recent report by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation makes interesting reading. On the programme "As it Happens" on September 17th, 1974 at 7:15 p.m., a Prof. Dr. Ryder Saguenay, oral surgeon from the Dental Faculty of the University of California at Los Angeles revealed the facts that Hitler had ordered a special plane to leave from Berlin with all medical and dental records, and especially X-rays, of the top Nazis and for an unknown destination, and that any drawings, charts and other evidence which have been presented, regarding Hitler's dental status; have been drawn from MEMORY by the dental assistant to Hitler's dentist, the latter who was himself never found.

To fully appreciate the importance of the above evidence, the situation of Germany at the end of the war must be taken into account. Planes were scarce, but apparently not too scarce for Hitler to decide it was of great importance to use one to fly medical and dental records to some unknown place. If Hitler had been contemplating suicide why would he have bothered to remove such vital evidence? To where were they flown and why did he feel it was necessary to remove all traces of such identifying material? Unless the “suicide” was a well-thought out ruse to confuse the Allies whilst Hitler was escaping.



Tanquista alemán dice haber visto escapar a Hitler

There are a few other reports from the Spanish-speaking press which deserve mention and reproduced here is one as it appeared in Editorial “Zip Zag”. Santiago, Chile, on 16th January, 1948. It seems that on April 30th, 1945, a Peter Baumgart (FlugKapitan — Flight Captain), took Adolf Hitler, his wife Eva Braun, as well as a few loyal friends by plane from Tempelhof airport to Tondern in Denmark (still firmly in German hands). From Tondern, where Baumgart landed, the Fuhrer’s party continued in a new plane with another crew, to Kristiansund in Norway, also still in German hands. There a German submarine convoy was waiting to receive its unusual “cargo”. In the meantime the Junkers which had brought the Fuhrer returned to Tondern, circled the airfield and dropped a mes-, sage to the effect that the Fuhrer had reached his destination safely. This unusual method of communicating was chosen, so as to keep radio silence and not attract undue notice. (From Mattern, U.F.O. Letzte Geheimwaffe des III Reiches page 50-51).

Another dimension is added to this story when comparing some of the statements made by Erich Kempka who had been in Hitler’s employ, as chief of his carpool since 1932. In his book “Ich habe Adolf Hitler verbrannt” — “I burnt Hitler”, page 109, he recounts that after some confused telephoned conversations with Gunsche (Hitler’s personal adjutant), Gunsche shouted at him, wide-eyed and rather theatrically — “The Chief is dead”. Kempka stated how shocked he felt and then how he asked Gunsche how could it have happened since he had spoken to Hitler just the day before when he, Hitler, was completely well and completely controlled. In the same book on page 139 there is further information which all points to a well-conceived plan. A German submarine commander had stated under interrogation by the American C.I.C. that he was under orders since 25th April, 1945, to be at constant readiness, “Besonderen Verfugung”, under immediate control of the Fuhrer. At Bremen this submarine commander declared that at least 10 other submarine commanders had received the same order! .

Further, the C.I.C. found that twelve Flight Captains had been issued a valid secret order from the Fuhrerhauptquartier (Hitler’s H-Q.) to be in a constant state of readiness for Hitler’s departure.

Gross Admiral Donitz has always figured in developments surrounding Hitler’s whereabouts, and Donitz was Hitler’s successor. The American writer, Malcolm X refers to him in his book “We Want You? Is Hitler Alive?”, page 10, and claims that Donitz knew about Hitler’s plans and was instrumental in his escape to an oasis in South America.

Mattern, in his German version of the U.F.O. Story, repeatedly quotes Donitz as playing a key role in the Fuhrer’s plans. On page 15 he reports excerpts from one of Donitz’s speeches at a graduation ceremony to naval cadets in Kiel, in 1944: “The German navy has still a great role to play in the future. The German navy knows all hiding places for the navy to take the Fuhrer to, should the need arise. There he can prepare his last measures in (“aller Ruhe”) complete quiet”.

Michael Bar-Zohar speaks of the role of Donitz — “The Avengers” page 99. Essentially, Bar-Zohar corroborates Michael X and Mattern. Excerpts below.

Michael Bar-Zohar speaks of the role of Donitz

> In 1943 Admiral Doenitz had declared: “The German U-boat fleet is proud to have made an earthly paradise, an inpregnable fortress for the Fuehrer, somewhere in the world.”
> He did not say in what part of the world it existed, but fairly obviously it was in South America.
> As far back as 1933, when the Nazi Party had come to power, the new masters of the Reich had made a special effort to spread their doctrine in South American countries. For several reasons, these countries presented a fertile field. There were large German colonies strongly established in many parts of Latin America. Several hundred thousand Germans or people of German stock were settled in Brazil, At Blumenau and Florianópolis, in the federal state of Santa Catarina, everything was, and still is, reminiscent of Germany—the countryside, the style of the houses, the appearance of the people, their speech. It was the same in several regions of Argentina. In the capital, Buenos Aires, in Tucumán, Formosa, Córdoba, and Cordier, in the Gran Chaco and the vastness of the Paraná Misiones, and at San Carles de Bariloche, a bit of Switzerland in the southern hemisphere, with its pine trees and snow-clad mountainside—at all these places German colonies had settled and expanded with amazing rapidity. In Paraguay, tens of thousands of German immigrants had cleared and cultivated virgin areas to the east of the Asnnción and had given their new towns names like Hohenau to remind them of their origins. Another wave of German immigrants had spread over the southern part of Chile, the region round the towns of Osorno and Valdivia, and the island of Chiloé, as well as settling in the capital. Santiago. Many more had gone to Peru, Uruguay, and other Latin American countries.

Having made an initial study of the mind of Hitler and having some understanding of his modus operandi we can now move into another area of this story. What are the other indications, which point to where, why, when and how? Let us examine some of the statements made during Hitler’s career.

Hitler never tied the success of his mission on the sole fate of Germany. He fully realised, and early in his career, that Germany proper could be over-run by his enemies. He said right at the beginning of the war and during the conquest of Poland, “And if our enemies should inundate (uberschwemmt) all of Germany, we shall then fight on from abroad, we will never capitulate.” And another statement from no less a book than “Mein Kampf”, German version, 1938, page 470: “The battle that rages today is for very high goals. A culture fights for its existence, that encompasses the heritage of ancient Greece and modern Germandom as well . . .”

Again, we see that Hitler saw the struggle as a global one even before the war. He had written Mein Kampf in 1923-24. On page 475, of the same volume he states further: “Certainly the world is approaching a great upheaval. It can only be around one single issue; will it be favourable to the Aryan people or will it benefit only the eternal Jew?”

In these sentences can be found a very clear indication that Hitler felt, as far back as 1923-24 that the struggle, his struggle, (which, incidentally, is the literal translation of the words "Mein Kampf") was not for Germany alone but for all Aryan man, or to put it in simple language, for the existence of the white man.

It is evident from Hitler's alliance with "yellow" Japan and his collaboration and active support with many non-white independence movements, such as the Arabs, the Caucassus tribes, the Cossacks and also India, that he was never the narrow-minded, racist bigot allied propagandists have tried to brainwash the world into believing. The German general, Beck, once said about Hitler, "This man has no fatherland". It is important we approach this entire question with an absolutely open mind, for only then will we be able to unravel this Hitler-U.F.O. connection.

Had Hitler been a narrow-minded, nationalist politician, a mustachioed dictator who experienced his thrills by ranting and raving at large crowds of cowed followers driven to mass rallies at bayonet point, then his end would seem explainable. He was far more than that, namely a prophet, with global vision much in the cast of the prophets of old who have been recorded and revered in the old Testament by both Christians and Jews. He was born into German-speaking central Europe, that's all. An accident of fate. Undoubtedly, he would have preached the same eloquent sermon had he been born in France or England.

On July 20th, 1944 Skorzeny arrived at Hitler's Headquarters bringing with him the liberated Mussolini. This visit coincided with the one and only nearly-successful attempt on Hitler's life. Hitler made to Skorzeny a most significant statement. "I begin to doubt whether the German people are worthy of my ideals". This statement again reveals Hitler's detachment from Germany and points up the mentality of a universal-thinking individual. It must be granted, that indications are present that Hitler was ready to continue the struggle from outside Germany. But how, and with what methods and weapons? Before we continue we must take another look at the suicide plot.

1. The bodies of Hitler and Eva Braun were never produced.

2. The items introduced as "evidence" are only circumstantial; two of Hitler's hats, 1 pair of panties with the initials E. B. and a few bones. (There were millions of bones lying all over Germany as the result of the mass-killing by the Allied aerial bombing)

3. The bloodstains found on the furniture in Hitler's quarters in the Bunker were not of his blood type.

4. Hitler was not suicide prone. On the contrary, only a few days earlier after he had heard of the suicide of the Mayor of Leipzig and his family, he had condemned suicide as cowardly and unbecoming to a National Socialist.

5. The most important witnesses and the men closest to Hitler have never been found, e.g. Bormann, Stumpfegger, Gunsche et al.

6. Hitler, by his very nature, and his unfailing belief in his mission, (one of global and not national dimensions), would tend to continue the struggle from elsewhere.

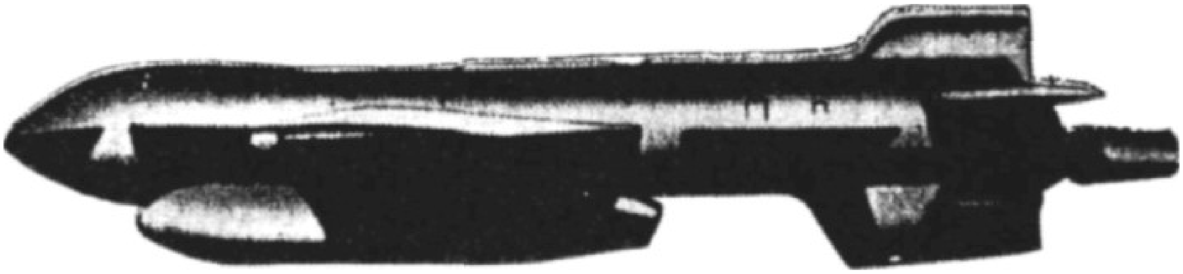
7. There are too many reports and sightings, eye witness reports and even evidence that the suicide attempt was a brilliantly-successful, carefully-staged scenario. A typical Hitler production.

In view of the above summation, we can assume that there was indeed a contingency plan.

One of the iron-clad rules of wartime Nazi Germany was to never let anyone, however high their position or rank, know more about a plan or operation than was absolutely necessary to the execution of his or her particular contribution to the overall whole. This rule applied to all and even to men like Himmler who was Chief of the S.S. and who by the end of the war, commanded vast military forces on the eastern front. Himmler had known Hitler since his earliest days and even he could not comprehend the absolute calm and certainty of final victory that Hitler displayed in those terrible last days in the Bunker in Berlin. He saw, when he tabled his ever more devastating reports about lost ground, enemy advances, bombing damage etc. how Hitler would listen attentively and quietly. This led him to speculate aloud and come to the conclusion “The Fuhrer has some kind of a plan” — reported in Trevor Roper’s book “Hitler’s Letzte Tage” on page 101.

There are other indications that even very high level military types, such as General Keitel and Jodl were not privy to all secrets. An April 22nd, 1945, these two men received orders to leave for the Obersalzberg (Hitler’s famous “Alpine Redoubt” about which we will speak later). Although loyal to the very end to their Commander-in-Chief, they did not want to die in the “Rat Trap” as they called the Bunker in Berlin. Consequently, they tried to persuade Hitler to leave with them. A heated debate ensued, according to the ever-present stenographer, Hergesell, and even a forceful abduction of Hitler to the Alpine fortress was considered by the two top generals. Finally Bormann, one of the few who apparently was in the know about the plan, persuaded them otherwise, and they left without Hitler.

Dr. Josef Goebbels, one of the most brilliant followers and exponents of Hitler, seems also to have been initiated to some degree, in the final phase. He had a three hour meeting with Hitler in those hectic last days and left the meeting calling out “Mein Fuhrer was sind Sie gross” — “My Fuhrer, what a great man you are”. A few days later in a radio broadcast he made a number of interesting statements and one in particular which referred to new Secret Weapons, so fantastic “they made my heart beat more quickly when I saw them”.



There are also some statements he made to his secretary on April 22nd, 1945, as reported in the book “Mit Goebbels bis zum Ende”, Durer Verlag, Buenos Aires “. . . We want to see if under these circumstances the Americans will shoot us in the back”. A few days later Goebbels gave a further highly-significant glimpse of what was planned when he said “May God protect our Fuhrer during the approaching danger” — reported also in the above-mentioned book. Was Goebbels referring to the underwater journey to the paradisical oasis in South America? How much clearer could we be told of what was afoot?

Maybe in Hitler’s own words? On February 24th, 1945 Hitler made a prophetic speech at the end of which he said these words:— “In this war there will be no victors and no vanquished either, but only the dead and the survivors. The last battalion however, will be a German one”. A further definition can be obtained by Hitler’s remark, towards the end of the war, that “. . . the inevitable and automatic clash between east and west will come sooner or later and we (the Germans) will then be and act as the proverbial tip of the scale”.

Should there still be some doubt in the reader’s mind as to whether there was, in fact, “something cooking” in Adolf Hitler’s fertile brain in those days when his world around him was going up in dust, flames and smoke, then read this. Germany’s legendary female flyer, Hanna Reitsch, holder of many world records, first rocket plane jet pilot, daredevil of the air and one of the Fuhrer’s favourite people, had voluntarily accompanied one of Germany’s top men — Ritter von Greim, to embattled Berlin. They flew over the Soviet lines in order to get into the beleaguered capital and were hit by Russian antiaircraft fire. Ritter von Greim was hit by shrapnel and badly wounded. Hanna Reitsch managed to wrestle the controls of the floundering aircraft out of the hands of von Greim and landed the aircraft in Berlin’s famous Unter den Linden Boulevard.

In the previously-quoted book of Trevor Roper, “Hitler’s Letzte Tage”, page 146, mention is made of a telephone conversation which took place on April 28th, 1945 at Hitler’s headquarters, between Ritter von Greim and his subordinate, General Koller, who was in Furstenberg. “It goes something like this” said General Koller “He, (von Greim) would be lost. Gen-Koller offered his condolences about Greim’s condition, his wounds, and his seemingly useless promotion to new Chief of the German Luftwaffe (after Goring’s firing). He bemoaned the state of things generally and the future of Germany, in particular. He also reiterated his doubts about being able to do anything with the Luftwaffe. Then he paused. He expected a similarly gloomy echo from the Fieldmarshall on the other end of the line. But the world was still full of surprises for Gen. Koller. Life in the Bunker Headquarters seemed even more surreal than his experiences at Furstenberg. Koller was astounded when instead of lamentation of impending defeat, he heard an optimistic analysis of the future, and even promise of an inevitable German victory. “Just wait”, said the new Chief of the hard-pressed Luftwaffe. “Don’t despair. All will be well! The presence and optimism of the Fuhrer have given me new hope. The Bunker affects me like a fountain of youth". Koller listened in disbelief and was incredulous. He just could not understand it at all.

So the optimism in Germany in these last days was spoken from the mouth of Goebbels, a brilliant doctor of jurisprudence, the Reichsminister and the hero of Berlin. The man who had wrestled the communist-controlled workers of Berlin out of the clutches of the false prophet's of Moscow and delivered them to the Fuhrer as a gift to Germany's inner healing. A level-head and a first-rate brain. Also from Heinrich Himmler, the cold realist, a top cop of Germany, holding the same position and wielding even greater power, than the late J. Edgar Hoover had held in the United States. And lastly, from Fieldmarshall Ritter von Greim's conversation with a General Staff Officer. All these men had had lifelong careers and training in the martial arts and were cool, non-emotional Prussians to the core. From the above, there can be only one conclusion and that is that Hitler did not commit suicide. Hitler did not die.

That there was a drama could hardly be denied, as evidenced by the article (reproduced earlier) from Time magazine, but weighing all the evidence, an escape from Berlin is certainly more likely than a suicide.

We have now covered almost every loose end and woven the loose strands into a more or less logical pattern. Now there remains only the how and where? Hitler escapes! Why?

Why were the secret weapons not used in the battle for Germany's survival? Many of them were, but there was a standard requirement in German military thinking that demanded that for every new weapon introduced, a defence had to be introduced with it. A sensible safety measure in case any weapon ever fell into enemy hands which could then quickly be copied and used against Germany. Thus, when radar was introduced, radar jamming devices were introduced at the same time. When fast jet planes were brought in, (200 kilometers faster than the fastest Allied planes in existence or in the planning stage), ground to air defence missiles were concurrently introduced.

It might interest the reader to have a look at this array of advanced technology, unparalleled in variety and ingenuity even to this day. The photographs shown here are of operational types only. Some of the "planned" hardware is also shown in order to give the reader a quick look at how far ahead National Socialist Germany was in 1945 compared with the rest of the world.

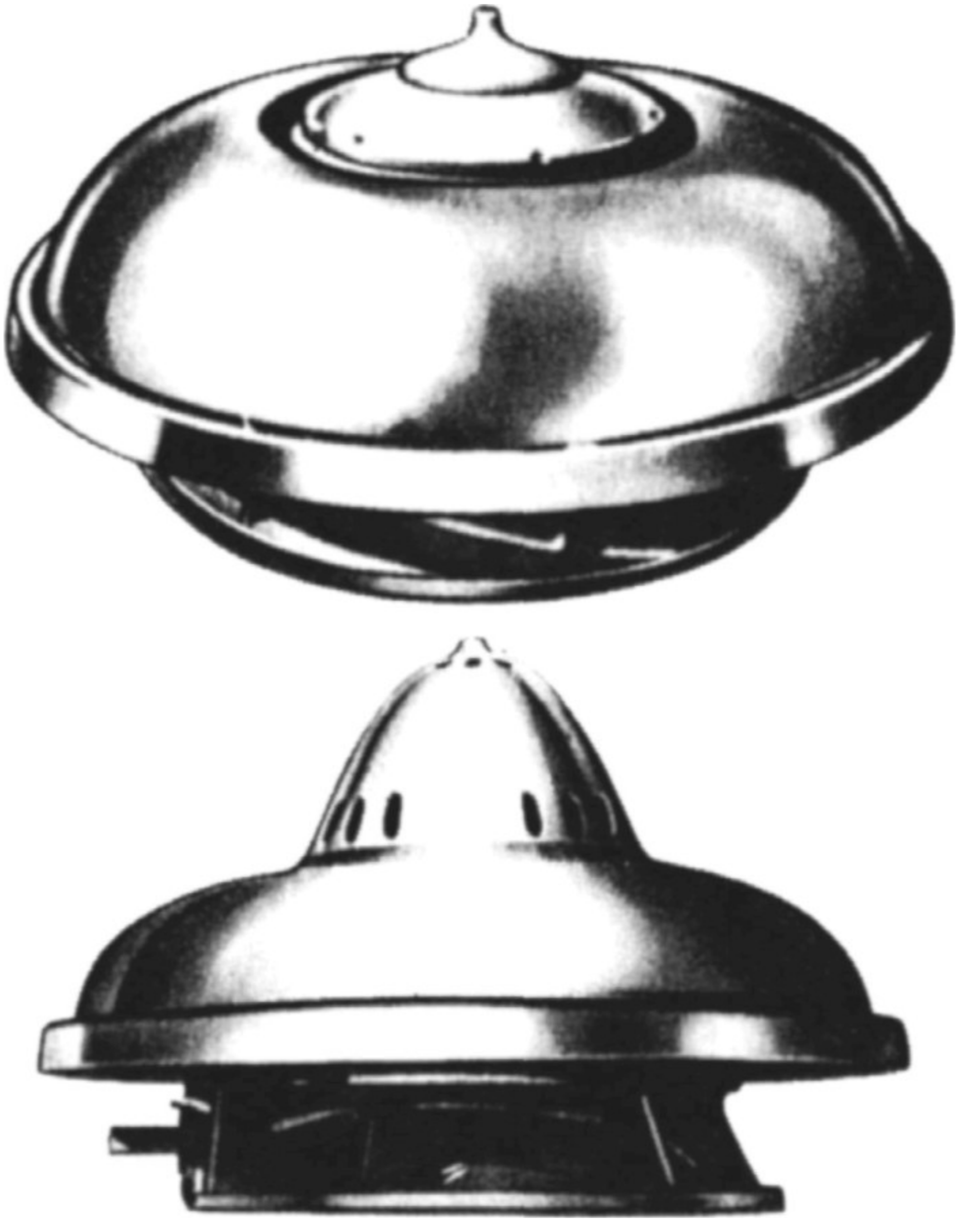
Intercontinental missiles were already a fact and although stolen by both the U.S. and Russia after the surrender in 1945 it took them another 15 years to come up to the German level, even though they were using many of the “captured” scientists. This brings us back to the actual story of the U.F.O. mystery.

Germany had U.F.O.’s as early as 1940. We find photographic proof of the existence of flying prototype models. Reproduced here are two photographs of two different U.F.O. designs, both operating on the electromagnetic propulsion method of Victor Schauberger, (also the inventor of the implosion motor), and produced by the Kertl firm of Vienna IV, which was then part of the greater German Reich.



These are the famous smokeless, soundless, Schauberger Models. Note similarity to real U.F.O. shown in A.C. Roberts Photo

Below are reproduced a series of actual photographs of a U.F.O. photographed in flight over New Jersey in 1958 by George J. Stock of Passiac, N.J., courtesy August C. Roberts Wayne, N.J. The similarity to one of the Schauberger models is self-evident and is conclusive enough proof to most people of the German origin of the U.F.O.'s. However there is more.

U.F.O.'s were seen by American and German night fighters and bomber pilots over Germany in 1943-45. The Americans called them Kraut meteors and were scared of them. Even the top brass knew about their existence, as is indicated in the book entitled "Der Weltraum Ruckt Uns Naher", Blanvalet Verlag, by Major Keyhoe the famous U.F.O. investigator, Chapter III. Major Keyhoe says the U.S. infiltrated 600 scientists into Bohemia, in tank crew uniforms, in 1945, to check over some of the U.F.O. bases.

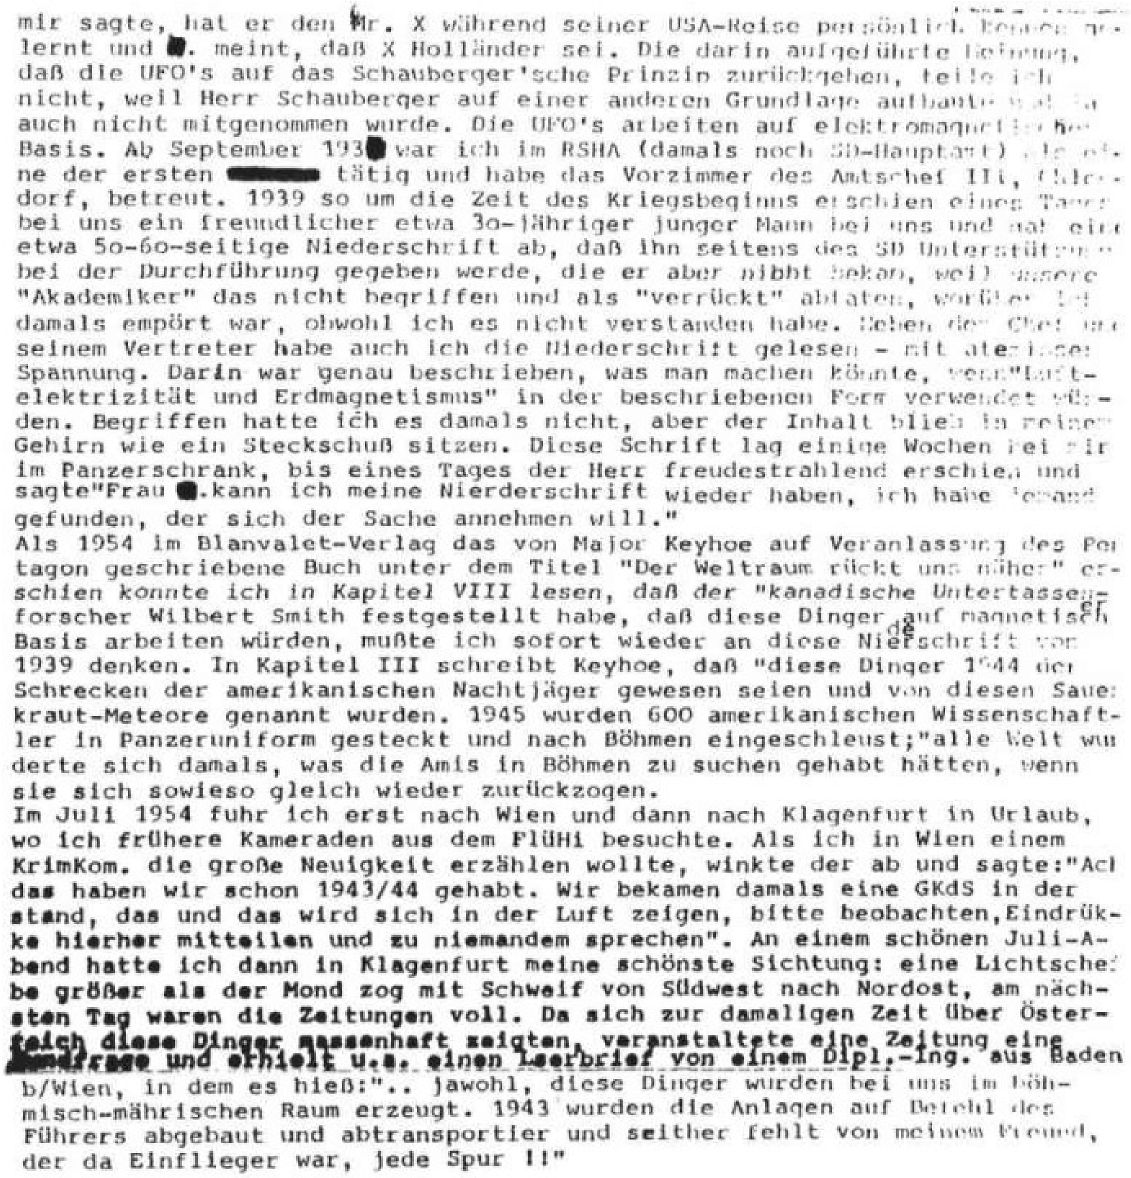
Following is a letter from a lady, still alive and personally known to the authors which we have translated into free English. The lady attests to having been one of the first and top secretaries in the S.S. Reichssicherheitshauptamt working in the anteroom of one of the most powerful men in Nazi Germany — S.S. Amtschef III Ohlendorf (the subject of many books and articles since the end of the war). The lady letter writer states that one day in 1938 a young scientist came into her office clutching a document, neatly typed and comprised of about 60 pages. The young man said that the contents were a revolutionary new approach to the aircraft propulsion problem. He proceeded excitedly to explain to the young lady some of his ideas. He said he hoped for active help and protection from the S.D. (Security Service) in doing experimental work on his project, since both Himmler and Ohlendorf were absent from Berlin at the time, she took the document into safe keeping, storing it in her safe. This document was later handed to Himmler and Ohlendorf. After reading it they contacted aircraft and propulsion experts. A number of top secret conferences were called but with no positive results. The experts scoffed at the revolutionary proposals advanced by the young man, which amongst other things, contained such suggestions as the creation of a vacuum in front of the disc shaped aircraft into which the craft could then move, without effort, at incredible speeds. Also proposed was exploitation of the earth’s natural magnetism along with a steering mechanism based on internal polarity shift.



mir sagte, hat er den Mr. X während seiner USA-Reise persönlich kennen gelernt und [redacted]. meint, daß X Holländer sei. Die darin aufgeführte Meinung, daß die UFO's auf das Schauberger'sche Prinzip zurückgehen, teile ich nicht, weil Herr Schauberger auf einer anderen Grundlage aufbaute und ja auch nicht mitgenommen wurde. Die UFO's arbeiten auf elektromagnetischer Basis. Ab September 193[redacted] war ich im RSHA (damals noch SD-Hauptamt) als eine der ersten [redacted] tätig und habe das Vorzimmer des Amtschef III, Ohlendorf, betreut. 1939 so um die Zeit des Kriegsbeginns erschien eines Tages bei uns ein freundlicher etwa 3o-jähriger junger Mann bei uns und gab eine etwa 5o-6o-seitige Niederschrift ab, daß ihn seitens des SD Unterstützung bei der Durchführung gegeben werde, die er aber nibht bekam, weil unsere "Akademiker" das nicht begriffen und als "verrückt" ablaten, worüber ich damals empört war, obwohl ich es nicht verstanden habe. Neben dem Chef und seinem Vertreter habe auch ich die Niederschrift gelesen - mit atemloser Spannung. Darin war genau beschrieben, was man machen könnte, wenn"Luftelektrizität und Erdmagnetismus" in der beschriebenen Form verwendet würden. Begriffen hatte ich es damals nicht, aber der Inhalt blieb in meinem Gehirn wie ein Steckschuß sitzen. Diese Schrift lag einige Wochen bei mir im Panzerschrank, bis eines Tages der Herr freudestrahlend erschien und sagte"Frau [redacted].kann ich meine Nierderschrift wieder haben, ich habe jemand gefunden, der sich der Sache annehmen will."

Als 1954 im Blanvalet-Verlag das von Major Keyhoe auf Veranlassung des Pentagon geschriebene Buch unter dem Titel "Der Weltraum rückt uns näher" erschien konnte ich in Kapitel VIII lesen, daß der "kanadische Untertassenforscher Wilbert Smith festgestellt habe, daß diese Dinger auf magnetischer Basis arbeiten würden, mußte ich sofort wieder an diese Niederschrift von 1939 denken. In Kapitel III schreibt Keyhoe, daß "diese Dinger 1944 der Schrecken der amerikanischen Nachtjäger gewesen seien und von diesen Sauerkraut-Meteore genannt wurden. 1945 wurden 600 amerikanischen Wissenschaftler in Panzeruniform gesteckt und nach Böhmen eingeschleust;"alle Welt wunderte sich damals, was die Amis in Böhmen zu suchen gehabt hätten, wenn sie sich sowieso gleich wieder zurückzogen.

Im Juli 1954 fuhr ich erst nach Wien und dann nach Klagenfurt in Urlaub, wo ich frühere Kameraden aus dem FlÜHi besuchte. Als ich in Wien einem KrimKom. die große Neuigkeit erzählen wollte, winkte der ab und sagte:"Ach das haben wir schon 1943/44 gehabt. Wir bekamen damals eine GKdS in der stand, das und das wird sich in der Luft zeigen, bitte beobachten,Eindrükke hierher mitteilen und zu niemandem sprechen". An einem schönen Juli-Abend hatte ich dann in Klagenfurt meine schönste Sichtung: eine Lichtscheibe größer als der Mond zog mit Schweif von Südwest nach Nordost, am nächsten Tag waren die Zeitungen voll. Da sich zur damaligen Zeit über Österreich diese Dinger massenhaft zeigten, veranstaltete eine Zeitung eine Rundfrage und erhielt u.a. einen Leerbrief von einem Dipl.-Ing. aus Baden b/Wien, in dem es hieß:".. jawohl, diese Dinger wurden bei uns im böhmisch-mährischen Raum erzeugt. 1943 wurden die Anlagen auf Befehl des Führers abgebaut und abtransportier und seither fehlt von meinem Freund, der da Einflieger war, jede Spur !!"

To the young secretary all this seemed very difficult to comprehend and only because it was so totally out of her usual line of work does she remember all of the above details. The closed minds of the consulted experts annoyed her, it was their arrogant impossible and never which stuck in her mind. Being a convinced National Socialist, she had known of the Fuhrer's abhorrence of the stuffy traditionalists and reactionaries with which Germany, especially, seems to be plaqued? The project was still being discussed when the young man re-appeared, and in a very happy frame of mind asked for the return of the documents. He told our correspondent that he had found someone else to support and finance his research and experiments, even with plant facilities to produce them.

Years later, after the war, when the U.F.O. sightings were the topic of the day, she mentioned the above to a friend, a man, who had been a Kriminal Kommisar (Criminal Commisar similar to the American G man of old) in Austria during the war (then a part of the greater German Reich). He was not at all surprised but on the contrary he remembered having received a top secret telex order, issued by Berlin Headquarters, requesting that the people's reactions to "strange flying objects" be monitored, and that these flying objects would be appearing in the skies over the entire Reich. There would be no need to sound the alarms for they belonged to Germany. The date? 1943-44. In due course, the flying objects appeared. The German fighters thought they were American, the Allies thought they were German secret weapons. The Americans nick-named them appropriately enough, “Kraut meteors”. (Keyhoe) There is one final aspect of the lady’s letter which seems particularly significant. While in Vienna she saw a letter published in a large daily newspaper by a well-known Diplom Ingenieur from Vienna’s fashionable suburb, Baden, and this letter stated:—“We built flying saucers in Bohemia and Sudetenland. My friend was one of the test pilots for these devices. One day in 1943 the entire plant was dismantled and shipped by freight train to destinations unknown. From that day to this, I have never heard from my friend, the test pilot. Incidentally, orders for this dismantling came directly from Adolf Hitler”.

A most incredible development. Were the flying saucers not used in combat because the Germans had not come up with the required anti-weapon? Or were they, perhaps, not available because of the rare metal needed in large enough quantities to make the required impact? Or were they used and so devastatingly that no survivors were around to tell the story? Once again, a letter and some suppressed books written by a German engineer, can help us fill the gap. We reproduce excerpts from a letter received by the authors from divided Berlin, Germany. The letterhead of the correspondent states he is a Diplom Ingeneur who seems to head a private spaceflight research organisation in Germany and Switzerland. He is the author of several books about spaceflight and we reproduce the cover of one. The title translated into English is: “German Spaceflight Since 1934”, with a sub-title of “A Troublesome Book”. In it are many engineer’s drawings of weird and strange-looking craft the like of which we have never seen anywhere before. Strange names are given to these contraptions. One model especially merits to be reproduced here for your evaluation. The claim is made that the author launched a rocket to the moon in the early thirties, propelled by a light conversion power plant. In other words, the rocket was propelled by sunlight transformed into energy. Certainly, a revolutionary concept.

In a series of letters we have received, Prof. Dr. Phillips, claims to have been a wartime comrade (W.W.1) of Adolf Hitler, and that they kept in close touch and that Hitler was kept fully informed about all the research and that he, Hitler himself, entrusted Phillips with critical missions, in rare cases. He further states that to this day he has in a bank safety depository a special pass of the Fuhrer giving him sweeping authority. See photocopy of excerpt of letter.

Two other points mentioned in different letters are relevant to our story. Dr. Phillips who speaks several languages, and amongst them Russian, claims to have been employed by the Russians in the very “collecting camps” the Soviets had set up for screening German scientists for use in their own weapons development. His linguistic abilities made him “Chief Screener”. If all this is true, then one can safely assume that Hitler’s friend would find ways and means to ensure that top grade scientists did not fall into the hands of the Soviets at least in this instance. Prof. Dr. Phillips claims he knows exactly who went where and many other details. Dr. Phillips also men-lions his experimental work during the war with the practical use of death rays.

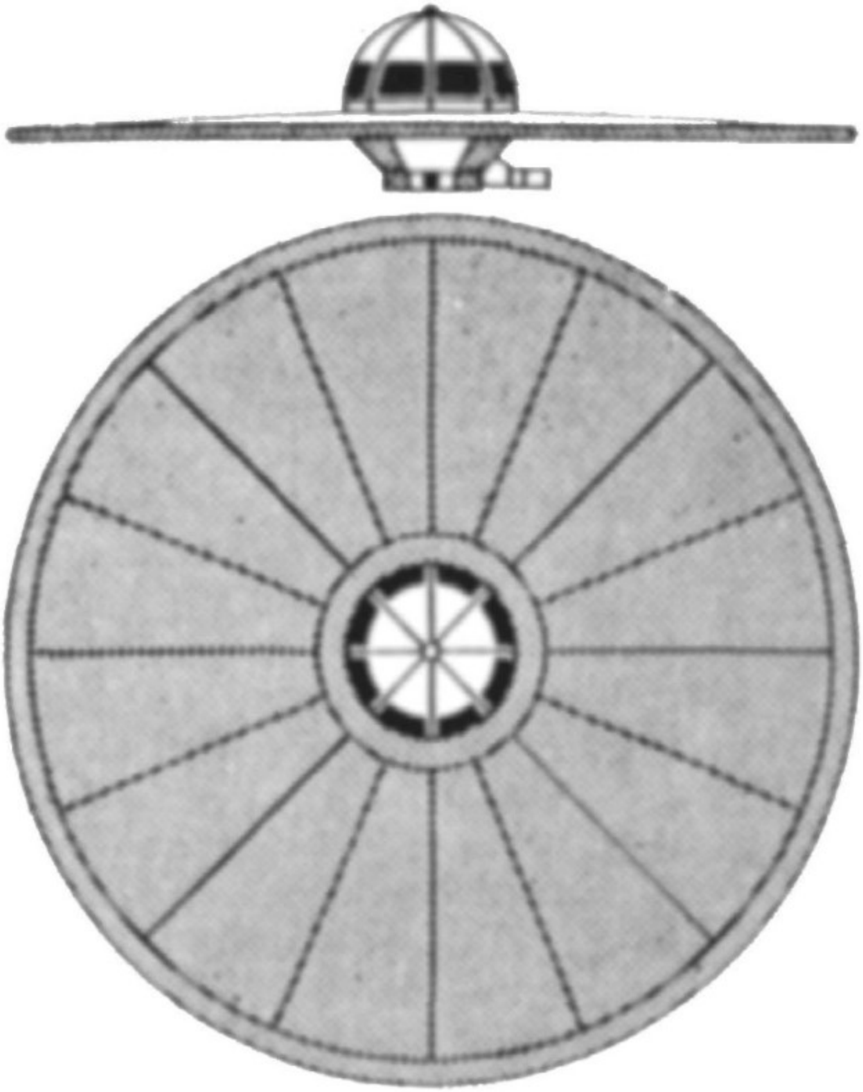
However, there are also other sources available for the U.F.O. verification. There is the best-selling book already in its 5th Edition called “Die Deutschen Geheimwaffen des Zweiten Weltkrieges und ihre Weiterentwicklung” by Rudolf Lusar, published by Lehmann Verlag of Munich, West Germany. A small English edition exists but seemingly is suppressed. One of the authors of this book obtained just one copy from the author himself. The late Rudolf Lusar had been a Luftwaffe Major, an inventor and engineer, he had been employed during W.W. II in the patent and experimental section of the Reichsluftwaffen Ministerium in Berlin. In this book Lusar describes some pretty far-out, highly-advanced technology on rocket torpedoes, submarine fired ballistic missiles, Flying People (see photo) and very detailed information on the flyinq saucer programme. Shown here are photographs of engineering drawings, top and front view, along with excerpts of his descriptions.



Flying Disc

Flying Saucers

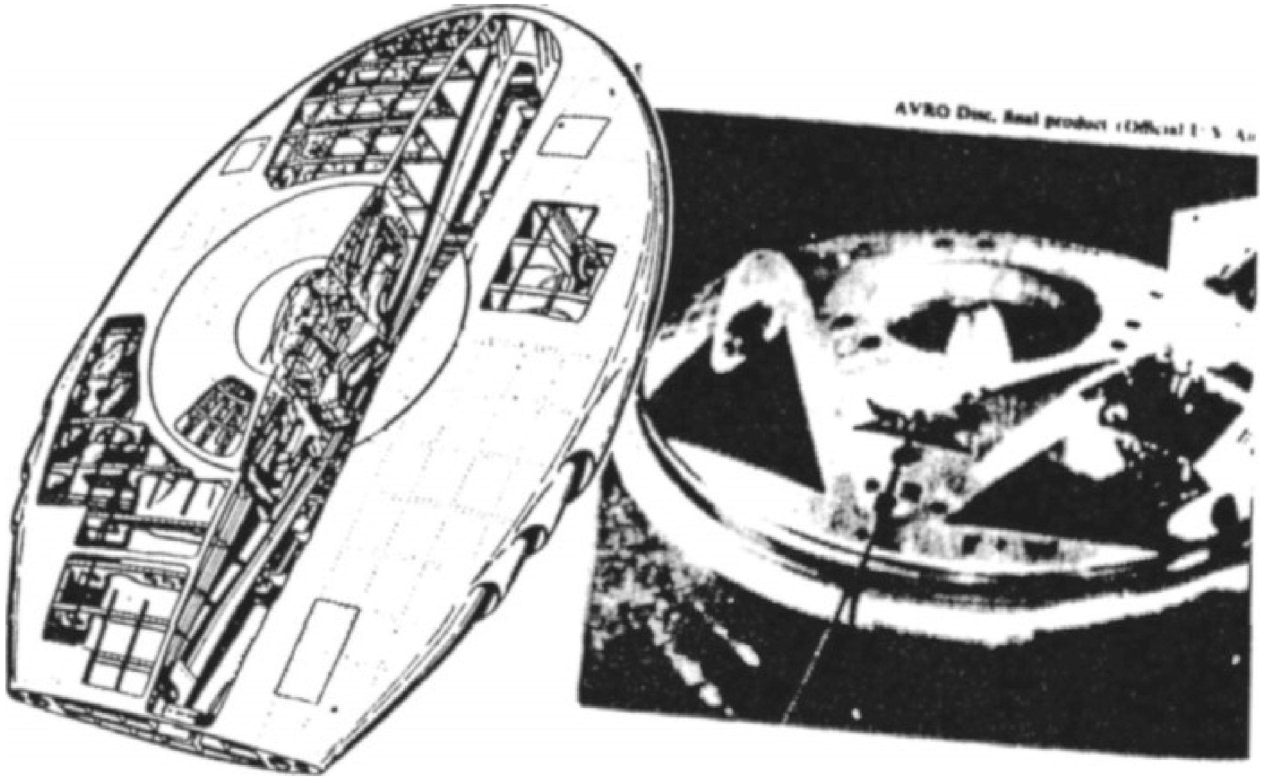
Flying saucers have been whirling round the world since 1947. suddenly turning up here and there, soaring in and darting off again at unprecedented speed with flames encircling the rim of the saucer’s disc. They have been located by radar, pursued by lighters and yet nobody has so far succeeded in establishing the existence of such a “flying saucer” or managed to ram or shoot one down. The public, even the experts, are perplexed by an ostensible mystery or a technical miracle. But slowly the truth is coming out that even during the war German research workers and scientists made the first moves in the direction of these “flying saucers”. They built and tested such near-miraculous contraptions. Experts and collaborators in this work confirm that the first projects, called “flying discs”, were undertaken in 1941. The designs for these “Hying discs” were drawn up by the German experts Schriever, Habermohl and Miethe, and the Italian Bellonzo. Habermohl and Schriever chose a wide-surface ring which rotated round a fixed, cupola-shaped cockpit. The ring consisted of adjustable wing-discs which could be brought into appropriate position for the take-off or horizontal flight, respectively. Miethe developed a discus-shaped plate of a diameter of 42 m. in which adjustable jets were inserted. Schriever and Habermohl, who worked in Prague, took off with the first “flying disc” on February 14, 1945. Within three minutes they climbed to an altitude of 12,400 m. and reached a speed of 2,000 km./h. in horizontal flight (!). It was intended ultimately to achieve speeds of 4,000 km./h.

Extensive preliminary tests and research were necessary before construction could be started. Because of the great speed and the extraordinary heat stress, special heat-resisting materials had to be found. The development, which cost millions, was almost completed at the end of the war. The then existing models were destroyed but the plant in Breslau where Miethe worked fell into the hands of the Russians who took all the material and the experts to Siberia, where work on these “flying saucers” is being successfuly continued.

Schriever escaped from Prague in time; Habermohl, however, is probably in the Soviet Union, as nothing is known of his fate. The former designer Miethe is in the United States and, as far as is known, is building “flying saucers” for the United States and Canada at the A. V. Roe works. Years ago, the U.S. Air Force received orders not to fire at “flying saucers”. This is an indication of the existence of American “flying saucers” which must not be endangered. The flying shapes so far observed are stated to have diameters of 16, 42, 45 and 75 m. respectively and to reach speeds of up to 7,000 km./h. (?). In 1952 “flying saucers” were definitely established over Korea and Press reports said they were seen also during the NATO manoeuvres in Alsace in the autumn of 1954. It can no longer be disputed that “flying saucers” exist. But the fact that their existence is still being denied, particularly in America, because United States developments have not progressed far enough to match the Soviet Union’s, gives food for thought. There also seems some hesitation to recognise that these novel “flying saucers” are far superior to conventional aircraft—including modern turbo-jet machines—that they surpass their flying performance, load capacity and manoeuvrability and thereby make them obsolete.*

According to Lusar, of the many scientists who worked on U.F.O. projects only one of these was found, a man named Miethe, and he was from the team who worked outside Prague. His whereabouts and movements are known. He worked in the early fifties for the A. V. Roe Company in Malton, Ontario, a suburb of Toronto, Canada. This man Miethe is the originator of a genuine flying saucer, which was produced by Avro on contract to the U.S. Air Force.

See photograph below — compare similar shape and concept with Lusar’s drawings. Of particular interest is the propeller fan blade arrangement. The craft pictured above was shown to the press on the ground only, not in flight. However, we reprint a photograph or what is purported to be a photograph which originated with the Royal Canadian Airforce in Ottawa, Negative File No. T.P. 1256C, unit 2 Rd. The craft looks similar to the Miethe-designed Avro saucer, that has never been seen air borne by anyone. This was reprinted by the now defunct Toronto Telegram, once the second largest daily newspaper in Toronto.



AVRO Disc, final product (Official U.S. A

The much-maligned Avro Disc, built with the collaboration of the German scientist, Miethe. Because it has never been seen "flying" does not mean it has not "flown" when the press were not around. Design clearly employs the "Vertikalzugschraube" experimented with by Miethe and his colleagues in Germany, or at least elements of the idea.

Dear Sir:

This is to thank you for your letter dated 12 June, 1974.

Our research department has checked our files and made inquiries at various other photo departments in the Ottawa area, but unfortunately they have been unable to locate the negative that you asked about.

We regret we are unable to assist you with your request, but if we may be of any assistance to you in any future quest, please do not hesitate to write us.

Yours truly,

J.A. Young

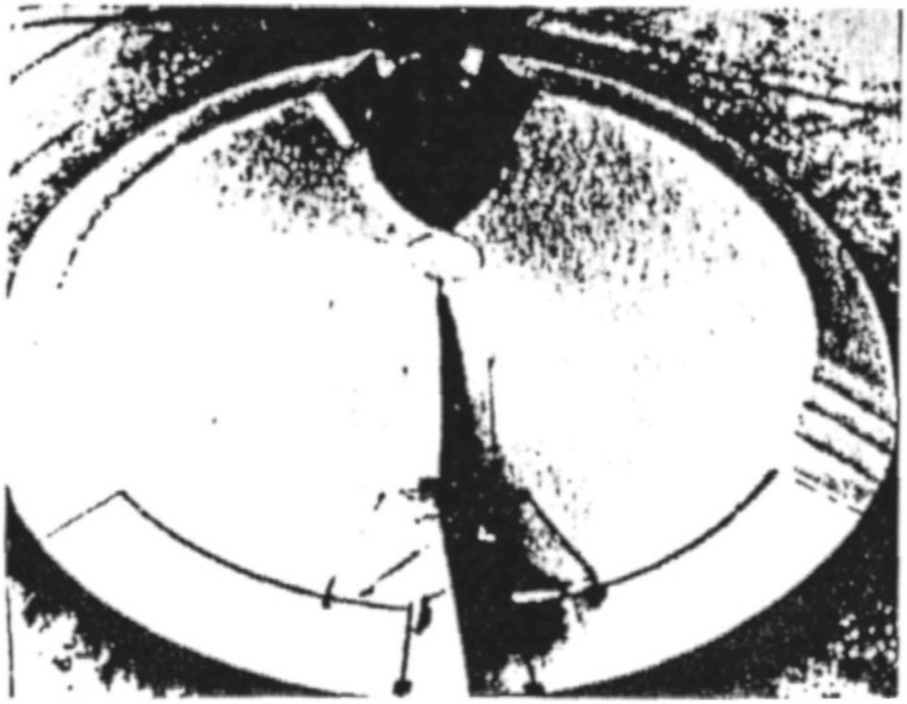
The authors contacted the defence department in Ottawa for permission to re-print the photograph. The file was missing and it was reported that no trace could be found of anything, negatives or prints. So that leaves the big question — why didn't Miethe's saucer fly? Or did it fly and we were not told the truth? Or, was Miethe a victim of the previously described German policy of only letting an individual know as much as he needed to know, to fulfill his task? No more and no less! Did he purposely sabotage the American Flying Saucer? Of greater importance, where is Miethe today? I doubt that we will ever know.

The A.V. Roe aircraft company was driven into bankruptcy in 1958-59 by the then Prime Minister of Canada — John Diefenbaker. Thousands of top flight scientists were overnight out of work and the cream of them were quickly hired by Boeing, General Dynamics and others. Miethe and the flying saucer he helped to build have vanished without a trace!

The Soviets too got into the act during the height of the UFO craze in the late 50's and early 60's. Since the Communists have ruled Russia, they have invented everything or reinvented everything, from gunpowder to spaceflight! To assure that credit goes where it is due, reproduced here is the Soviet flying saucer. A poor photograph of a canvas-covered circular-shaped wingless aircraft, the type the Germans experimented with around 1935 and in concept similar to the United States all-wing bomber. Surely, if the Soviet's had captured, as had been feared for some time, the German UFO teams and their factories, they could have come up with something a little better! And so again, we must conclude there is a missing link.



Where are the flying saucer teams now? Or better still, to where did they go after they left Germany? It is almost a certainty that they did leave Germany. There are a number of possibilities, but all point in the general direction of the Southern Hemisphere.

"The Avengers" page 110 111 Excerpts below.

> When the fighting ended in Berlin, some men of the Russian Fifth Army came across a burned-out tank at Spandau, and lying near it was the body of a man wearing a long leather jacket In one of the jacket pockets they found a small book which turned out to be the diary of Martin Bormann, the Fuehrer's deputy and one of the most astute of the Nazi Party leaders.
> The dead man was not Bormann—this was very soon verified—but an entry in the diary, in Bormann's handwriting, said "May 1, attempt to break out."
> A telegram that the Reichsleiter had neglected to destroy was found in his office: "April 22, 1945. Agree with proposal of dispersal in southern zone beyond the ocean. Signed, Bormann."
> These two sentences clearly conveyed Bormann's intentions to flee to South America and showed that he had begun to put his plans into effect on May 1.

There was Peron, Hitler's admirer, in power in Argentina. It is a well known fact that huge tracts of land had been bought up by Nazi money and interests. An interesting aside is that Germany's top fighter-bomber pilot Hitler's favourite, (Stuka divebomber ace with over 2,500 sorties and over 500 tanks and 140 planes to his credit), Hans Ulrich Rudel, worked on secret aircraft development schemes for Juan Peron after the war. He met Peron personally on several occasions and the team around Rudel, Tank and Horten did produce a very fast jet fighter plane for Argentina. See photographs. From this fact it is possible to deduct that both the facilities as well as the talent were available and did not lay idle. Rudel by the way has made over 75 trips to South America since then!!! What for?

German scientists produced this jet for Peron.

Peron and the German experts

So we have seen Berlin fall. We have looked into the suicide drama, we have seen Hitler leave Berlin for Denmark and Norway. We have double-checked every angle, even Hitler's mind and motivation. We have traced his thinking back to as early as 1920 right up to 1945 and gleaned from his own book "Mein Kampf" and from his various speeches right up to the last days in Berlin and all are valuable insights, having a direct bearing on the solution to the UFO mystery.

Now we must follow the U-Boat convoy that allegedly has Hitler and Eva Braun aboard on its secret underwater journey — to where? Will it be possible to break out of the ring of steel and fire the seemingly all-conquering allies have thrown around the crumbling Third Reich? The first indications come from a captain of the British Navy. His cruiser was part of a large allied force which engaged the Fuhrer's convoy in a battle. The allies were obviously not aware of the significance of this particular convoy, but must logically have expected some isolated break out attempts by a select group of top political and military leaders from fast-sinking Germany. They had thrown up a virtual blockade around the entire North Sea, stretching from the polar region down to the Spanish coast.

The Fuhrer convoy was detected and promptly engaged by all available allied units in the general area, and with unexpected and devastating results. It would seem that the secret weapons, which Goebbels had spoken of in such glowing terms only a few days previous, were now put to use for the first time in an actual battle situation. The result, was one sole survivor from a British destroyer and it was from this, the captain, that the words were uttered: "May God help me, may I never again encounter such a force". The report of the captain's words was carried in El Mercurio, Santiago, Chile and in "Der Weg" a paper published by exiled Germans living in Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Michael X in "We Want you — Hitler is Alive" mentions that the great mediaeval seer and prophet, Nostradamus prophesied Hitler's escape from Germany, and in a submarine, and we quote him as follows:—

> "The leader who shall lead an infinite number of people,
> Far from their home land to one of strange manners and language,
> Five thousand in Candia and Thessaly finished,

The leader escaping, shall be safe in a barn on the sea”.

But there is another verse, even more explicit, mentioning an “iron cage” — a clear reference to a submarine.

Wild beasts for hunger shall swim over the rivers,
Most of the land affected shall be near the Danube
Into an iron cage he shall cause the great one to be drawn
When the child of Germany shall see nothing”

The wild beasts are obviously the raping, all-devouring Allies, fording the Neisse, Elbe, Rhine Moldau, Danube, that’s where it all ended in April 1945. Or did it?

Michael X also involved Donitz and the German submarine fleet, and speaks of a paradisical oasis in Latin America. There is even more weightier evidence of the submarine escape of Hitler and Eva Braun. On July 10th, 1945 a sensational news report made headlines around the world. (A world that was busy getting ready for the sell-out conference of Potsdam where a final stamp of approval was given to the Bolshevik armies allowing them to rape, plunder and drive from their ancestral homes, millions of Germans beyond the Oder Neisse line, who were now defenceless since the German soldiers, beaten, disarmed and starving were performing unpaid slave labour in England, France and America. The Soviet methods were even more indescribable than those of the rest of the Allies.)

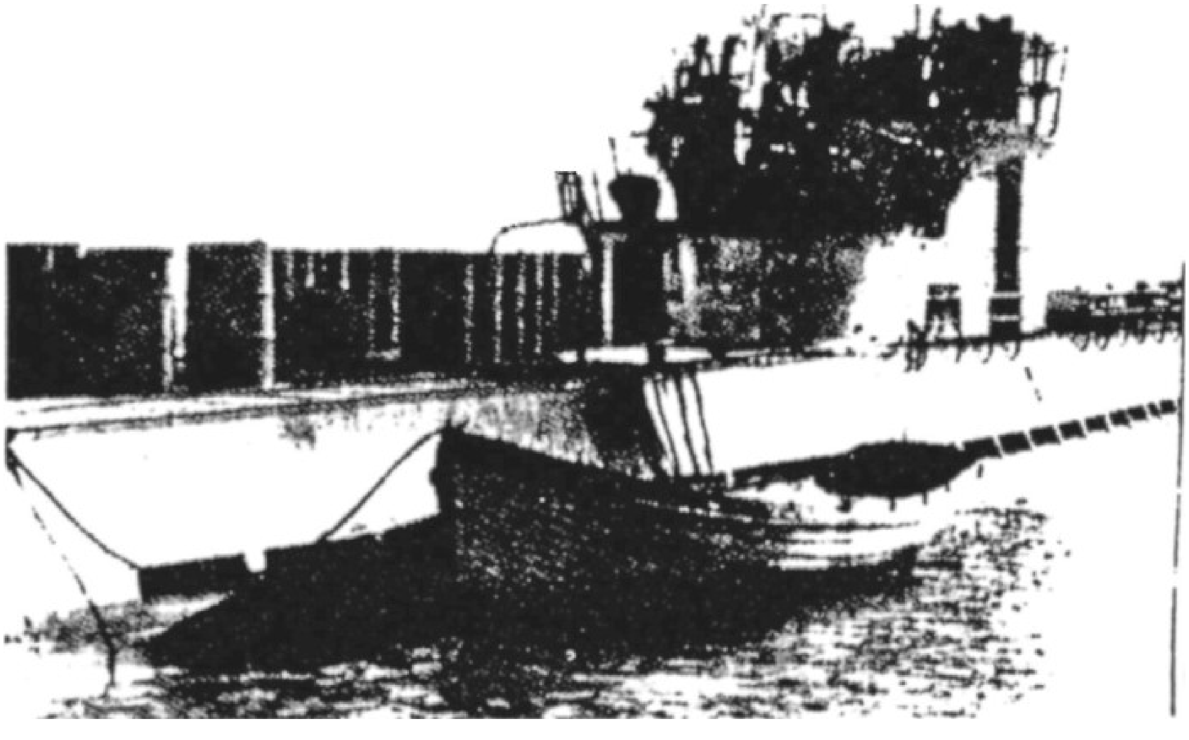
A German submarine, of the latest design, “U-530”, had given itself up to the Argentine authorities, but not before all scientific instruments and weapons on board had been destroyed. The U-boat had calmly slipped into the harbour of Rio de la Plata. The Commander’s name was Otto Wermoutt. The world was stunned and electrified! What was a German submarine doing all the way down there in South America more than two months after the war had officially ended? Why had they not surrendered earlier?

The U.S. government immediately demanded internment and extradition of the entire crew to the United States. As per usual in Yankee dealings with South America, the colonial master whistled and the Latin dog had to wag its tail. In order to save face the Argentinian authorities “studied” the request just long enough to question the officers and crew about the why and where of their surrender unusual. Since Washington became very insistent, the prisoners were turned over to the U.S. authorities. Special planes had been dispatched to Argentina and the men were shipped off to the United States for interrogations. An icy silence settled over results obtained and also about the whereabout of the crew. Rumours have it that the entire crew answered all questions put to them with similar answers so that the impression remained that they had been prepared for this eventuality.

Apparently little useful information was obtained from officers and crew about the intended purpose and final destination of their U-Boat. However, the Argentinian investigators did find that the U-530 was part of a larger submarine convoy which was travelling entirely underwater and under strict orders to keep absolute radio silence, a measure usually employed only during extremely sensitive and highly-secret missions, for this type of movement risks the loss of cohesion of the convoy and therefore the possible loss of U-Boats and crews to the watchful enemy. Obviously, whoever had planned this mission was willing and capable of losing some boats. The precautions taken in order to safeguard the secret of the final destination are extraordinary.

It was later revealed in a news report that James Forrestal, then U.S. Secretary of the Navy, (who later supposedly jumped to his death from a 13th storey window while in the Walter Reed Army Hospital) had stated that the U-530 was chiefly a transport submarine and had only carried a few torpedoes. They were of a new type called “torpedoes-arana” or “spider torpedoes”. In effect, they were wire guided underwater missiles and remote controlled and they never missed their targets. Due to the devastating effectiveness of the secret weapons carried by the convoy, there apparently were few Attack U-boats in the convoy.

Two things, however, aroused the suspicions of the interrogators. The U-530 carried a crew of 54 men aboard. The usual German crew size was only 18 men. There were also unusually large food stocks on board. However, the real surprise was 540 large tin cans or barrels, all hermetically sealed and upon opening were found to contain nothing but cigarettes. This was especially unusual since all crew members turned out to be avowed non-smokers. Now what was a German U-boat of the very latest and very largest design doing, cruising around South American waters two months after the end of the war? And with a triple strength crew; carrying a cargo of nothing but cigarettes?



Photograph of U-530 after surrender In Argentina. Note “tin cans” on submarine — mentioned in text

The average age of those 54 men turned out to be less than 25 years, with the exception of the machinist who was 32 years old. The commander himself was only 25, and the second officer an incredibly 22 years young. (Photograph shows the extreme youth of the crew. Shown with them are the tin cans on the deck of the submarine.)

Faces of crew clearly reveal how young they are. Close up photos for more detail.

Extensive checks and cross checks were conducted by the American and the Argentinian authorities with the files at the German Naval Headquarters in Kiel, and another mystery was brought to light — there was no record of a Captain by the name of Otto Wermoutt as commander of U-Boat 530; he along with several others of the U-530 had similar mysteries surrounding them. Interrogation by the allies brought forth from Otto Wermoutt and his crewmembers the same response — "We are alone. We have no living family relations". Apparently, their wives, parents, brothers, sisters and sweethearts had died in air raids or had been killed in some way or another during the war.

Soon the world forgot about U-530 and its fate and was busy listening to radio reports of the sudden arrest of Rear Admiral Karl Donitz, whom Hitler had designated as his successor as military leader of Germany — significantly enough not as the new Fuhrer but as military leader of Germany. Donitz was arrested and with his entire cabinet was shipped off to Nuremberg for war crimes trials. Germany thus became a country with its entire government behind bars.

Donitz after his "arrest"

In the meantime, Allied Naval Intelligence Units were engaged in endeavouring to locate Hitler's monster submarines which had been built on the insistence of Hitler and whose success once led him to remark "I am of good mind to scrap all surface vessels — the future belongs to the submarine". Not one single operational submarine was found. It was not until the surrender of Japan that a number were turned over to the Americans. Occasionally, stories were heard of mysterious submarines appearing and disappearing, mostly alleged to be of Soviet origin, or more often, of unknown identity.

Typ XXVI (Entwurf 1944)

On August 17th, 1945, five weeks later, another sensational submarine surrender took place and again at Rio de la Plata. A German U-boat, U-977 under Commander H. Schaffer gave itself up to the Argentinian authorities, and this, three months after the end of the war in Germany. This time the crew consisted of only 32 men, but this was still fourteen above the average crew number. It was soon learned that another 16 men, all of them married and with families in Germany, had been dropped off "on orders", on the Norwegian coast. It would certainly seem that whoever was in charge of this operation was completely in control and knew the smallest detail right down to an individual crew member's family and marital status. From the logs of both submarines, the U-530 and the U-977, it was found that they had left Kristiansund, Norway, on May 2nd, 1945; none other than the exact same spot where earlier reports stated the Fuhrer had been taken after his departure from Berlin.

The fact that Captain Schaffer had waited another five weeks before giving himself up in the same manner and in exactly the same spot as the U-530 can only mean that he had waited, in the hope that he was to be picked up by a search party. He must have known of the fate of the U-530 since radio reports were regularly monitored. Captain Schaffer wrote a book about his experiences called “U-977” in which he supplies these details. “We were whisked out of Argentina with great haste. However, not before every square inch of the U-Boat, even floor boards, walls and corners had been painstakingly examined and probed for a trace of the Fuhrer — In the clear knowledge that the Fuhrer was still alive”.

Map taken from the Spanish book "Hitler esta vivo?" — "Is Hitler Alive?", showing the Fuhrer convoy route and the deviation of U-530 and U-977 (broken line)

Less well known, but equally significant, is the report supposedly originating with the British Admiralty. On June 5th, 1945, five weeks before the surrender of the U-530, the 47 crew members of a German submarine had surrendered to the Portuguese authorities, opposite Leixoes, after they had scuttled their heavily damaged submarine. One can certainly assume that this submarine also belonged to the Fuhrer convoy. Time and direction certainly seem to coincide. Perhaps the submarine which had been abandoned had been damaged during the allied blockade force attack?

THE STORY OF U-859

On April 4, 1944 at 4:40 a.m., the German submarine U-859 under Kapitanleutnant Jan Jepsen left Germany for a mysterious mission which was to come to an abrupt end several months later, at a place half way around the world. The unusually large crew of 67 men had not the faintest idea where they were heading. For several months they cruised around Africa then Arabia and India and finally they ended up in the area of Sumatra, Indonesia. During this time they sank some freighters and an Allied troop transport.

Just outside Penang in the Straits of Malakka, fate caught up with U-859. The U-boat was sunk by a British submarine and most of the crew lost their lives. Not in itself an unusual event in wartime, and therefore soon forgotten by the world. Almost forgotten that is. One of the survivor's mentioned on his deathbed, almost 30 years later that U-859 had taken a treasure to its watery bed. He insisted that welded into the bow and holds of U-859 were 33 tons of mercury, all in glass bottles and sealed again in watertight tin crates.

Since mercury is a very expensive item, even today, an expedition was organized to investigate the rumour. After months of effort U-859 was indeed located, and just where the dying sailor had indicated his comrades' large steel coffin would be found. Divers went down into the shark-infested waters and started to cut open the hull with the latest of underwater blow torches. After several months of very difficult work the divers found large black tin crates which were hauled to the surface and opened with blowtorches. The dying man's story was found to be true in every detail. Packed in neat rows, none the worse for their 30 years at bottom of the ocean was 33 tons of mercury.

Again the question must be asked, what was a German U-boat doing with an incredibly large crew of 67 men, carrying a secret cargo of war-vital mercury half way around the world? To where was the U-boat heading? For whom was the cargo intended? And for what use was the mercury to be put to? Obviously the British did not know the real mission of U-859.

The Mercury Treasure of U-859 after it was salvaged

Here again, was that remarkable loyalty and discipline of the German displayed — this secret had been kept for 30 years, almost unto death. It is interesting to speculate how many more submarines, similar to U-859, were on mysterious missions and to ponder as to where they now may be.

Still more reports of mysterious German U-Boats arriving in South America can be found in "The Avengers", page 105, written by Michael Bar-Zohar, published by Hawthorne Press. Excerpts reproduced here.

> Two more U-boats, according to reliable sources, appeared off an uninhabited stretch of the coast of Patagonia between July 23 and 29, 1945. Two sailors from the Admiral Graf Spee, Dettelman and Schulz, who were sent to Patagonia by Captain Kay with several of their shipmates, later described their "mission." They were lodged at an estancia belonging to a German-owned firm, Lahusen. From there they were taken to a deserted part of the coast and saw two U-boats surface. The Graf Spee men went aboard the U-boats and collected some heavy crates which they ferried ashore in rubber dinghies. Then the crates were quickly loaded on eight trucks and taken to the estancia, but very soon afterwards the trucks set off again with their load, heading inland. The rubber dinghies also served to bring about eighty people ashore, a number of whom were in civilian clothes. Judging by their manner of giving orders, they were obviously important people. They got quickly into cars waiting for them with engines running, and were driven off.

There has been a great deal of speculation about the size of the Fuhrer convoy. An assumption can be made that it must have been considerable, for otherwise the loss of three boats, with large crews, would have prompted "rescue attempts", an easy enough task in the quiet waters off the South American coasts during that summer season. If Hitler had indeed set up some refuge in South America, we might ask ourselves with how many people. No definite answer can be supplied but again, by deduction, we can arrive at an approximate number.

Perhaps unknown to many north American readers, is the fact that in Europe, there exists a registration obligation for each member of a community. Precise and detailed records are kept of where a person lives, number of children, sex, age etc. and also place of work. Also noted, are details of closest relatives. In Europe, therefore, it is relatively easy to trace and locate anyone and at short notice. True, there was a temporary breakdown in the last few months of the war due to heavy bomb damage and the refugee problem, but conditions soon returned to the usual bureaucratic precision. The Allies found these exact records to be extremely useful in the job of ferreting out “Nazi war criminals”. They soon discovered that 250,000 persons had disappeared. Taking into account, casualties and deaths from all causes, this number of 250,000 has remained relatively constant and has been a continual source of speculation. To where could so many people disappear in densely populated Germany? Could the answer be found in a new “Third Reich” located in some far away place? Were select individuals withdrawn, over a long period of time, and re-located somewhere? Were they the “last battalion” to which Adolf Hitler referred several times In his prophetic speeches towards the closing days of the war? Are they the cream of the crop — saved for the day — that inevitable day when east and west shall meet in mortal combat and WE, as Hitler put it in several speeches, “will be the tip of the scale”? Will they hold the balance of power? How? With what? Will their Secret Weapons be the disappeared “Kraut meteors” the “Fliegenden Scheiben” or the flying discs? With what will they be armed? The death rays spoken of by Prof. Dr. Phillips?

* According to a Washington report at the end of 1955, the United States Air Force was then shortly going to test aircraft models whose appearance would fully correspond to the conception of the “flying saucer”. Secretary of the Air Force Donald Quarles has stated that these models are disc-shaped and able to take off vertically. They will do without expensive runways (see “German flying discs”).

ATOMIC BOMB

The great guessing game as to whether Hitler had or did not have the atomic bomb can be answered rather conclusively. The German scientists whom the western Allies scrounged together after V.E. day who were working on the atomic bomb revealed they had reached a critical point in their research. They were part of the teams who had done research work near Berlin and at the Max Plank Institute. Later on they worked at Haigerloch, a little Swabian town in the south of Germany.

The scientists were imprisoned after the war in Farm Hall, an English maximum security prison. Their rooms and cells were bugged with microphones. During the night of Aug. 6th, 1945, when the American A-Bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, the British "listeners" found out how far Hitler's atom bomb had progressed. Apparently it was ready. Prof. Oppenheimer is reported to have said that the bomb dropped on Hiroshima was made in Germany.

Germany first started atomic research when Hitler was sent a letter by Prof. Dr. Harteck. Hitler's order was signed Sept. 26th, 1939. Dr. Esau was put in overall charge. With the capture of Norway there was available to Germany a source of heavy water which had previously been lacking. Production was ordered to be increased by 5,000% at the heavy water plant at Vermork. This plant was the repeated target of frantic Allied bombing raids and a favourite source for "commando raids". Some were very damaging and did hamper Germany's efforts. Apparently one tanker full of heavy water had not been accounted for to this day. It was presumed lost or sunk by a mine. An interesting question would be — "Did it get sent to some place else for later use?"

It is interesting to note that Hitler sent Field Marshall Erhard Milch to the Gottow laboratories near Berlin, where atomic research was also being carried out in 1945, to do an inspection. He also was given wide powers to supply the scientists with anything they might need. During the inspection Milch asked Dr. Werner Heisenberg: "How big would a bomb have to be in order to destroy New York or London?" Heisenberg told the Fuhrer's envoy: "About as big as a pineapple, and we will have a basketful for the Fuhrer by Christmas . . .!" Heisenberg was later tried and the above statements were introduced by the allied prosecutors as evidence!

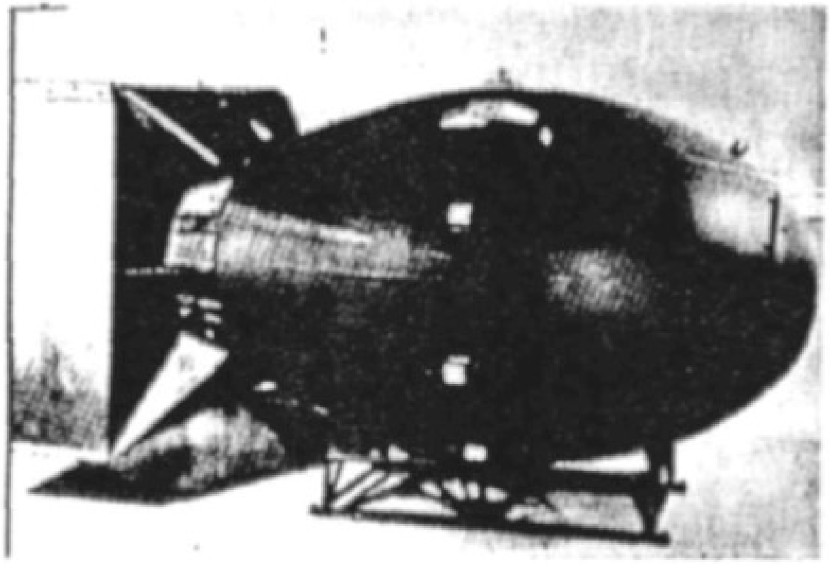
Hiroshima Bomb — Made in Germany?



Haigerloch Atomic Research Lab

As a passing note, it may be of interest to the reader to know that America's atom bomb effort took 125,000 workers and cost well over two billion dollars. It was later betrayed to the Russians by communist spies, Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, Nobel, David Greenglass, Fuchs and other Jews.

Was Wernher von Braun and his staff of conventional rocket experts deliberately sacrificed to put America on the obsolete track of wasteful fire-cracker rocketry while the Nazis perfected the superior U.F.O.’s somewhere in South America?

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION?

The following story was made available to the authors by a British businessman who has requested to remain anonymous. The identity of the nurse and hospital are known to him. We include it without commentary.

Letter is unedited. Punctuation and spelling as in original

I have been a night nurse in charge of a terminal geriatric ward for many years and as you can guess have seen some pretty horrible sights, but still met some interesting people, the one who was really fascinating was this German chap I mentioned to you some time ago, the poor chap was a terminal case, a terrible carcinoma of the stomach, he was in a side ward by himself as he rarely got more than a couple of hours sleep a night even with the huge injections of heroin we gave him, but he never complained and was always ready to have a chat, and many a night when it was quiet I would take him in a cup of coffee and sit with him and chat for an hour or so. He spoke English well, with a marvellous German, American accent which he had picked up in America, he had been with us over a year, when one night I was sitting talking about my service in the navy and the conversation got on the Flying Saucers . . . he then went very quiet and gave me an odd look, I laughed and said:

“Do I sound mad talking about Flying Saucers?”

He said no, and then said, I might think he was mad as he had flown in one, anyway I had to leave then but the next night we continued the conversation, for the first time he told me he had been in the Luftwaffe, a security officer, attached to somewhere called Rechlin, where they were experimenting with all manner of almost science Fiction type weapons, he mentioned a wind gun, rockets and laughed and said Germany had all these long before the rest of the world had even thought of them and that given another year or so, the war would have had a completely different ending, and that even now things could still happen engineered by the Reich that could alter the world’s future.

I laughed, and he continued, on and on about the progress that had been made during the war years, a lot of things I had heard about but some that seemed way out of this world . . . heat rays, queer new explosives and new type flying vehicles, then he went on about the saucers, how they began with quite small open ones with one man cockpits then on to bigger and bigger ones.

Later they moved to another base, and here for the first time he heard about the so-called “Neuer Deutschland” in the Antarctic, pre-war there had been rumours but never many details, there were many scientists at the new base and flying took place only by night as allied planes were continually flying over, and there were continual attacks, as time went by and the outcome of the war became more apparent the work was speeded up more and more and late in 1943, the first of the big saucers was flying and then came the news that certain specialists were being chosen to go on a special trip to a secret base where the war was to be continued from, he flew in planes on several occasions to bases in the North of Norway, escorting men and women scientists equipment, files, specialised machinery and weapons, all of this was taken direct to long range U-Boats and put straight on board, the weapons were all very modern and he described them as brand new automatic rifles that later were known as MP 44s, there was also a large amount of explosive.

The saucers flew continually and as soon as a new one was built and tested it was loaded with equipment and crewed and when night fell they took off and did not return, as time went by stories of the U-Boats coming and going taking out masses of supplies and people, not just scientific personnel but also administration and military, security, cooks, and amongst them a fair contingent of women.

As the end of the war came near organisation began to break down and supplies ran short they were being bombed and strafed daily by Allied fighter bombers, when the last saucer left, the base was abandoned, he flew on in one of the last planes to leave the base a Heinkel III, they were attacked by a Russian fighter and damaged and landed eventually just outside Oslo. Norway was in chaos at this time but he got a lift in a car with an SS officer, he explained he was heading for a U-Boat base and a possible way out, the SS man had no better ideas and they went North, they reached the base two days later and found two U-Boats refuelling and restocking for their final trips, there were not as many people wishing to use the vessels as most wanted to go home after the war, in fact the cargo carrying boats were even short of crews, they were full of supplies of all sorts, the day after they arrived there was a raid by American bombers a lot of buildings were damaged but the boats were not. . . they sailed that night.

They reached the Antarctic base after a long trip, by sea and across the ice cap, but after a couple of weeks he went back to the coast to carry on his security work with some last minute arrivals on a U-Boat, he then left with instructions to meet another boat in the Atlantic, things however went wrong and his vessel was damaged and sunk by a patrol boat, he was rescued and was made a P.O.W., his captors did not realise who he was as he had got rid of his papers and was wearing naval cold weather gear.

He was held as a P.O.W. in America, and after his release was repatriated to Germany, when he saw the way things were going there under the occupation he got himself some new papers, Polish and managed to get to Britain as a refugee, he settled down, married, his wife died in the late 1950’s, and he was having treatment for cancer, radium treatment was tried but slowly things got worse and he was eventually admitted to hospital where he died.

End of letter

Whatever the merits of this dying man’s story are, one thing we can be very certain and that is of one terrible weapon at the Fuhrer’s command and of which Hitler spoke towards the end of the war when he clearly made reference to the atom bomb — “May the heavens forgive me, if I should reach for that final terrible weapon still at my disposal! We are today already able to blow up half the planet”.

Another startling fact proving quite definitely that W.W. II did not end on 8th May, 1945 is the following account in “France Soir”, a serious paper (not a scandal sheet):— “Almost 1½ years after cessation of hostilities in Europe, the Islandic Whaler, "Juliana" was stopped by a large German U-boat. The Juliana was in the Antarctic region around Malvinas Islands when a German submarine surfaced and raised the German official naval Flag of Mourning — red with a black edge.

The submarine commander sent out a boarding party, which approached the Juliana in a rubber dinghy, and having boarded the whaler demanded of Capt. Hekla part of his fresh food stocks. The request was made in the definite tone of an order to which resistance would have been unwise. The German officer spoke a correct English and paid for his provisions in U.S. dollars, giving the Captain a bonus of $10 for each member of the Juliana crew. Whilst the food stuffs were being transferred to the submarine, the submarine commander informed Capt. Hekla of the exact location of a large school of whales. Later the Juliana found the school of whales where designated. This is the direct quote from "France Soir". Added to this must be a wire service bulletin releasd by France's own Agence France Press on the 25th Sept. 1946, which further clarifys the above: "The continuous rumours about German U-boat activity in the region of Tierra del Fuego (Feuerland, in German), between the southernmost tip of Latin America and the continent of Antarctica are based on true happenings".

Putting all these details into proper sequence and perspective a clear picture emerges. Selected segments of the Third Reich survived the collapse of Germany proper and obviously did not surrender to the allies as they were supposed to have done under the "Unconditional Surrender" signed by Donitz on behalf of the German people.

There must be rather large secret Nazi bases where work continues on the UFO's and other secret weapons. Investigation shows that huge amounts of money were clandestinely invested by Nazi Front men all over the world, but especially in South America. An incomplete, but nevertheless surprising statistical compilation of these funds appeared in the newspaper "Zig-Zag" in Santiago, Chile, on 19th June, 1947. According to this compilation, Spain received 300 million dollars, Sweden 250 million, Switzerland 100 million and Portugal 50 million and this represents only about 25% of such investments.

This amounts to nearly 3 billion dollars invested in large tracts of remote jungle and pampas real estate, factories, transportation, airlines, shipping(!!!) companies,, food processing and agriculture. In the shockinly candid book entitled "The Avengers" written by Michael Bar-Zohar dealing with Jewish war and post war tactics against the Germans, we find a lot of detailed information about the transfer of German money to foreign lands. Some excerpts are reproduced here.

> A most unusual conference of German officials and industrialists was held at the Maison Rouge Hotel in Strasbourg on August 10, 1944. The proceedings of this "Red House" conference are known from the shorthand report, which fell into the hands of the American OSS at the end of the war. A Lieutenant Revesz showed it to Simon Wisenthal, who took a photostat and published it some years later.
> Among those present at this conference were representatives of the Ministry of Munitions and the Foreign Office, delegates from the big industrial combines—Krupps, Messerschmitt, Rochling, Goering Werke, Hermannsdorfwerke—and several senior civil servants. The object of the meeting was to decide upon measures for safeguarding the treasury of the Third Reich. They reached two main decisions—some of the riches would be hidden away in the territory of the Reich; and German capital would be sent abroad.

The conference urged that the Nazi Party should go underground in the event of defeat, and should prepare for a return to power with the help of the treasures safely hidden away.

These decisions began to be put into effect in the following months. An “experimental station” was set up near Lake Toplitz and a number of containers packed chiefly with forged pound notes and documents were submerged in the lake, and some other containers were hidden away in old mines in the hills. Most of them were removed again when Allied forces were approaching the region. Although the Allies did not have full knowledge of these hiding places until the report of the “Red House” conference fell into their hands, some information on the Nazis’ postwar plans had reached the Allied secret services early in 1945. In March of that year a detailed report on the subject was submitted to the State Department in Washington:

“The Nazi regime has made very precise plans for the perpetuation of its doctrine and domination after the war. Some of these plans are already being put into effect.

“Members of the Nazi Party, German industrialists and Army leaders, realizing that there is no hope of victory, are presently preparing commercial plans for the postwar period, endeavoring to renew connections with industrial circles abroad in the hope of reestablishing prewar cartels. After the war, the intention is for ‘front men’ to appeal to the courts of various countries against the ‘illegal’ seizure of German industrial concerns and other German property by the Allies at the outbreak of the war. In the event this method does not succeed, the recovery of the German property would be made through figureheads possessing the requisite citizenship. German attempts to continue to have a share in the control and development of technological progress during the immediate postwar period are reflected in the phenomenal increase in German patents registered in certain foreign countries during the past two years. These registrations reached their peak in 1944....

“German capital and plans for the building of ultramodern technical schools and research laboratories are being offered on very advantageous terms, in view of the fact that the Germans will thereby be able to make and perfect new weapons.

“The German propaganda program is an integral part of this general planning for the postwar period. The immediate aim of this propaganda program will be to bring about a relaxation of Allied controls on the pretext that the Germans should be treated ‘honestly.’ Later, this program will be extended and intensified with a view to reviving Nazi doctrine and pursuing German ambitions of world domination. Unless these plans are counteracted, they constitute a constant threat to the peace and security of the postwar world.”

The American specialists had greatly extended their knowledge of this subject by the end of the war. They soon had a list of 750 firms with head offices in neutral countries, founded or bought with German capital. Switzerland headed the list with 274 firms; then came Portugal with 258, Spain with 112, Argentina with 98, and Turkey with 35. A number of firms had also been acquired in South American countries other than Argentina.

Special accounts in Swiss and Liechtenstein banks were placed at the disposal of the Argentine Government, officially to help their industrial development. Some of the accounts were made personally available to Argentine leaders.

As military defeat and final castastrophe had become more certain, the Nazi chiefs stepped up their preparations for the future—a future in which they meant to have a stake. They had deposited large sums with banks in neutral countries and salted away just as much in the portfolios of apparently respectable persons in Liechtenstein, Portugal, and Patagenia, and had hidden much wealth in the depths of old salt mines in Austria and below the dark water of the Alpine lakes. All of this hidden treasure might indeed permit a revival of Nazism one day—so long as there were still Nazis around able to draw upon it.

Added to this must be the fact that the high priority tasks of the newly elected National Socialist government in 1933, was the securing of adequate food supply for the entire population. Extensive research was immediately launched into areas of artificial food cultivation, in huge greenhouses, with everything grown only on "chemical soil" and under artificial light. Butter was apparently produced from coal and dry milk was another German invention. A method was also discovered to indefinitely preserve wheat flour. Great strides were also made in Freeze Drying all types of food and this was carried out particularly in experimental plants located in the area of Helmstedt. Hitler was keenly interested in these projects visiting them frequently. In a very short time, Germany was more or less self-sufficient and for the first time in centuries. No German ever experienced want and hunger again until the Allies burnt or robbed all the huge warehouses of their contents in 1945 and after.

Any German who lived through that dreadful time will tell you what the humanitarian liberators of Germany doled out as food rations after their victory. In the French zone of occupation it was officially 850 calories a day, in the American zone a little more, whilst the inmates of Hitler's concentration camps, (whose bony corpses you are still seeing daily on T.V. and in the newspapers), received more than double that amount of calories daily. The resultant famine and death from starvation, particularly among the elderly and infants is well remembered by the German population. They call it a "peace crime". The food supply for any secret UFO force, (which we shall call by the name Hitler himself had given it) — The Last Battalion, had already been solved. But how about necessary monies to keep such an enterprise running? Hitler had again already planned, with great foresight for this inevitability. In captivity in concentration camps such as Dachau, Buchenwald and Auschwitz, were Europe's best-known and most skilled forgers, — many of them Jews. They were geniuses at their particular craft.

The victims of the "Liberators".

One day, a secret order arrived from Berlin code-named “Operation Bernhard”. All the forgery experts were collected and were offered life and freedom if they cooperated in producing for Hitler, perfect forgeries of some of the allied currencies, but in particular, forgeries of the British pound and the American dollar. At first they refused, but one by one they cooperated and in an astonishingly short space of time, they produced what seemed to be perfect forgeries. The German government supplied from its own papermills what is usually the stumbling block to perfect counterfeiting — high quality paper. The plates and paper were perfect, but not satisfied with their own judgement, a secret agent was sent to neutral Switzerland with a suitcase full of “German-made” pounds and dollars as well as other currencies in all denominations. This agent went to one of Switzerland’s largest banks and requested to see the manager and stated: “I am negotiating a business deal with a man I suspect of being a Nazi agent, and he intends to pay me in this currency with these bills. Please test them and see if they are genuine”. The bank manager explained he could not do this right away since it was in foreign currency, so the Nazi agent left the bills with the bank manager arranging to return within a few days. Upon his return, he was told that the money was genuine, and that the bank would be pleased to accept it for exchange. The agent returned to Germany and the printing presses started rolling in Auschwitz and Buchenwald. Untold millions were printed, so much so that Britain after the war, withdrew from circulation its five pound note — a first in British history.

There is an interesting sequal to this story. Rumours persisted about operation Bernhard long after the end of the war and one such rumour was checked out. For weeks a group of Austrian government frogmen searched Lake Toplitz in Austria. Eventually they found the wreckage of a German plane, the skeleton of the dead pilot still strapped to his seat. In the hold were large metal trunks which, when pried open, revealed over 300,000 British five-pound notes, in neat bundles, perfectly unspoiled and with them, some of the printing plates. The money was confiscated by the Austrian authorities, although it was at that time useless the five pound note having been withdrawn from circulation by the British after the war.

Now remember the U-Boat captain had paid for his food in U.S. dollars and obviously had no shortage of money since each crew member of the whaler had been given a $10 bonus.

It is not generally known that the entire Reichsbank Treasure, (All of Germany’s reserves) disappeared from the bank vaults in Berlin, before the end of the war. Guinness “World Records” book lists this story under “The greatest unsolved robbery!”

During the U.S. balance of payments crisis, Time magazine carried an article about discussions taking place at the Headquarters of the World Monetary Fund in Basle, Switzerland. They found that 15 Billion Dollars were in circulation, which should not really exist. One wonders where that amount of money came from?

TOP-SECRET NAZI EXPEDITION

Let us now turn our attention to the location of the bases. Again, even in this area Hitler had planned far ahead and at long range. Obviously guided by the possible occupation and subsequent loss of Germany itself, he had cast around for land still available for colonization and found that Antarctica was, at that time, the only continent still unclaimed. With his usual dispatch, a polar expedition was organized, the preparation of which was kept secret. The force consisted of several large vessels, at least two of which were aircraft carriers, not the present-day type but rather large ships with float-equipped airplanes on board. The planes were rocket-catapulted off special ramps at the end of the ships and retrieved out of the water via a crane. This secret Nazi Expeditionary Force was headed by Kapitan Ritscher and took place in 1937-38. The force landed in the area of Queen Maud Land and established bases there. Large float planes of the Dornier-Wal type, with their unusual pusher-puller propellers were used to explore a huge area of Antarctic terrain. Over 11,000 photographs were taken for mapping purposes. Significantly, a Swastika flag was dropped every 20 kilometres to substantiate the German claim to that land, comprising over 600,000 square kilometres in all. In this way, not only was a terrain claimed by Germany, larger than Germany itself, but more significantly, for the first time, ice-free oasis (warm lakes) were found by this secret Nazi expedition. They were photographed along with Alp-like mountain ranges of over 4,000 metres in height. Naturally, the explored areas were given German names and so we have today places like “Ritscher Gipfel” — “Ritscher Peak”, named after the leader of the expedition. The hot oasis amongst the eternal ice was called “Schirmacher Seen Platte” — “Schirmacher Lake Group”. The different coloured appearances of these inland lakes were caused by alga found floating in the sweet water. The waters are warm enough to allow swimming and bathing with just bathing suits and swim trunks.

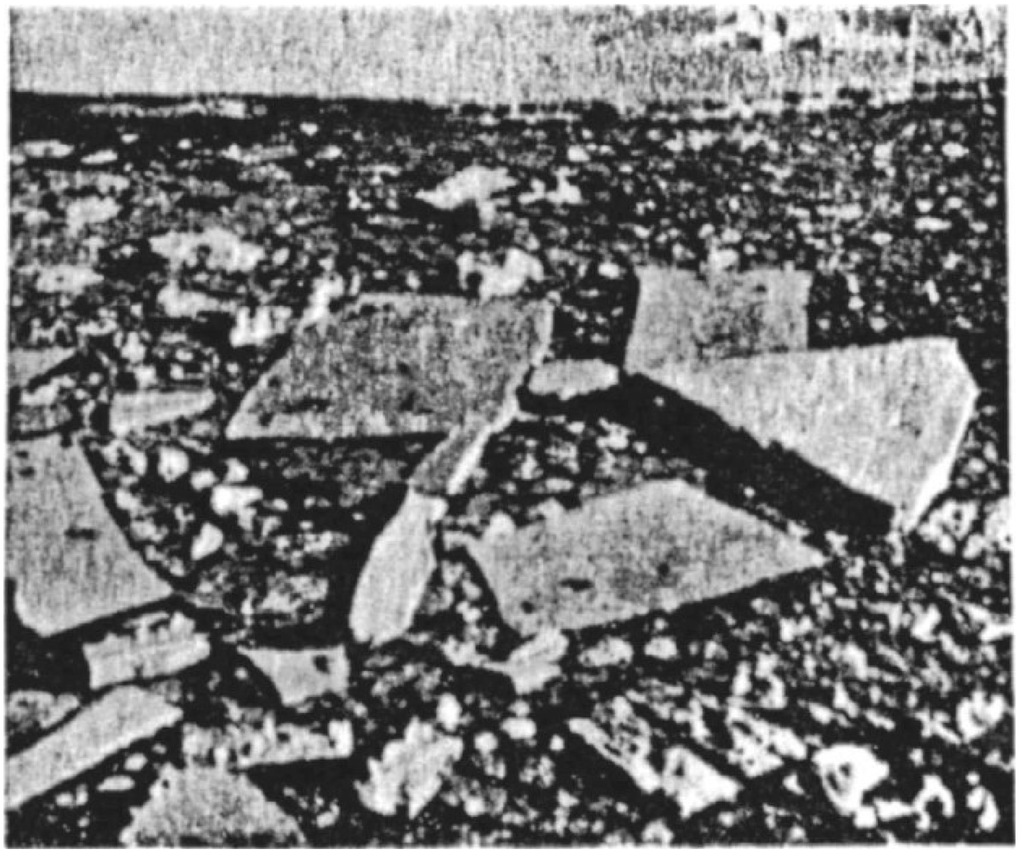
The Expedition took over 11,000 photographs, mapping approx. 600,000 square kilometres. Here is a photo of the "Schirmacher Seenplatte" — the ice-free islands, "Re-discovered" by Admiral Byrd ten years later.



The little specks on the ice are seals and sea lions weighing up to 2,000 pounds and “not too bad to eat” and very plentiful.

Added credence to the secret bases thesis can be found in remarks attributed to Joachin von Ribbentrop at the outbreak of the war. “In accordance with Germany’s long-range political strategy, we have taken into firm possession the Antarctic area, called New Swabia (New Schwabenland) to ensure a safe retreat in case of necessity.” (Taken from Mattern’s previously quoted German edition of this book).

For an exact location of the German area of Antarctica, please look at the map reproduced here, and compare the relative size of the United States with Antarctica. A huge area, indeed.

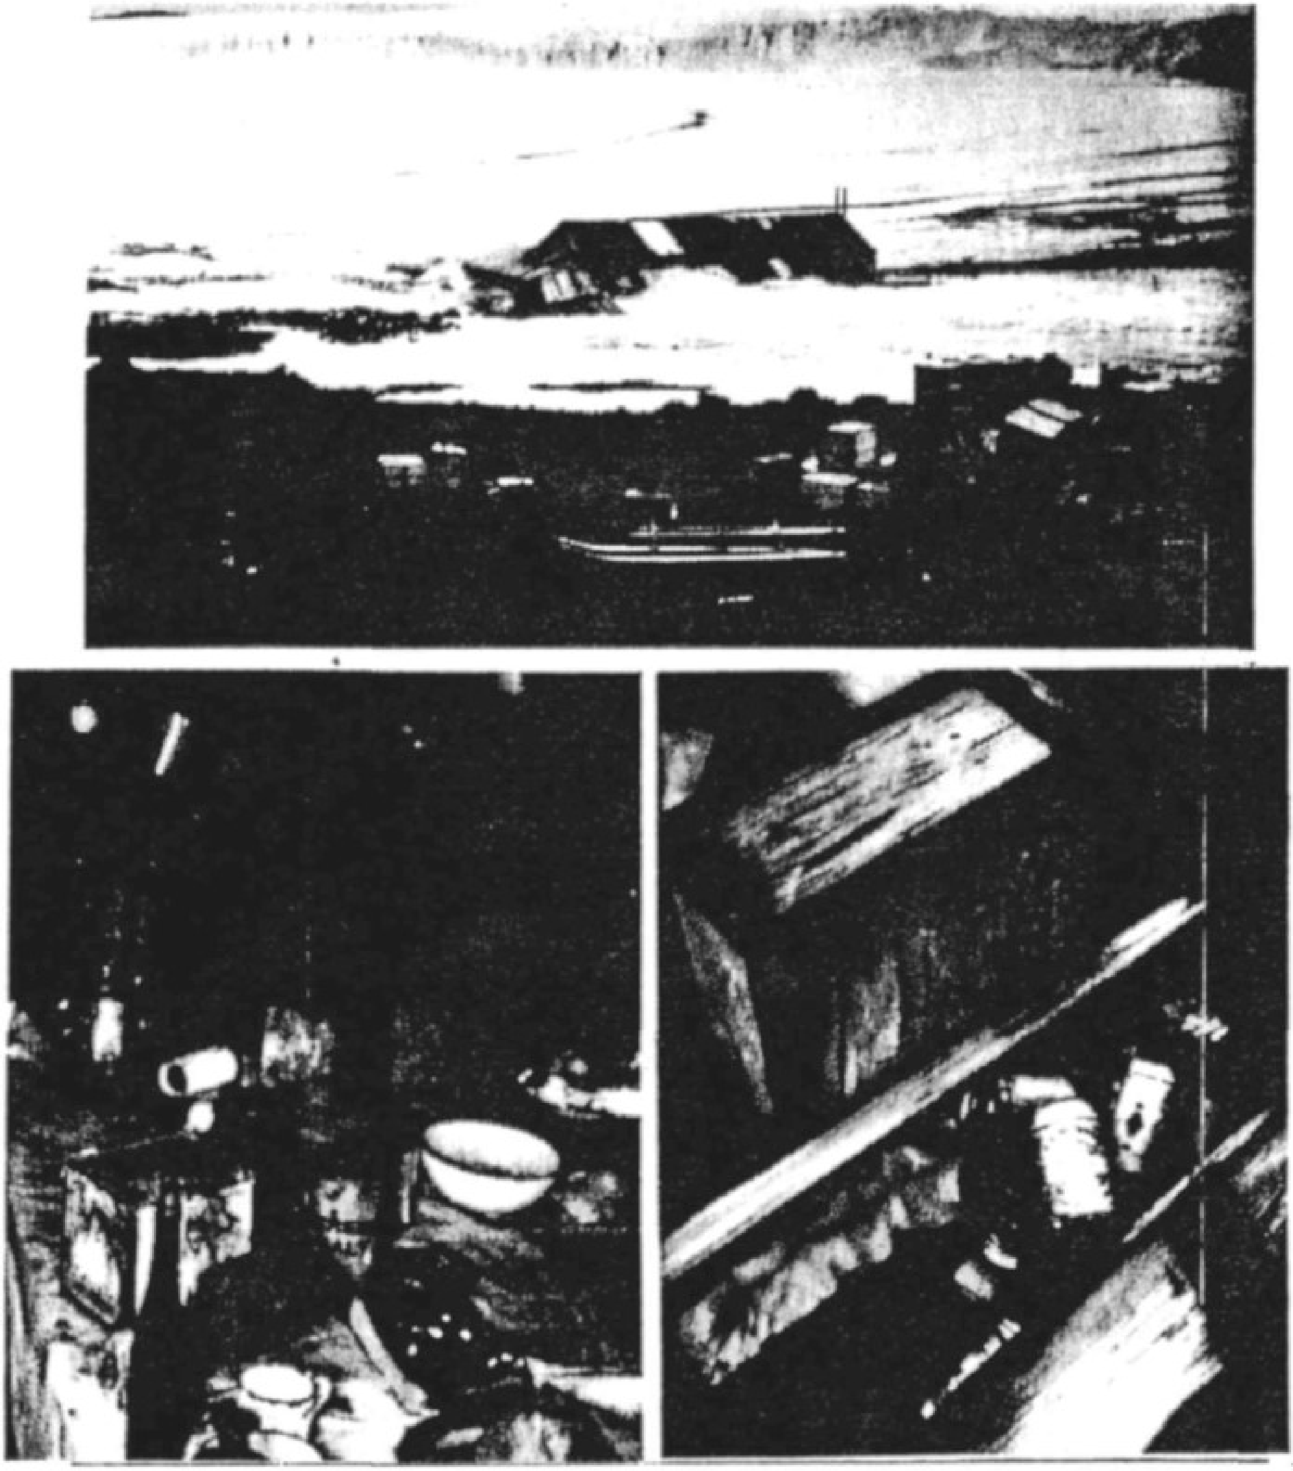
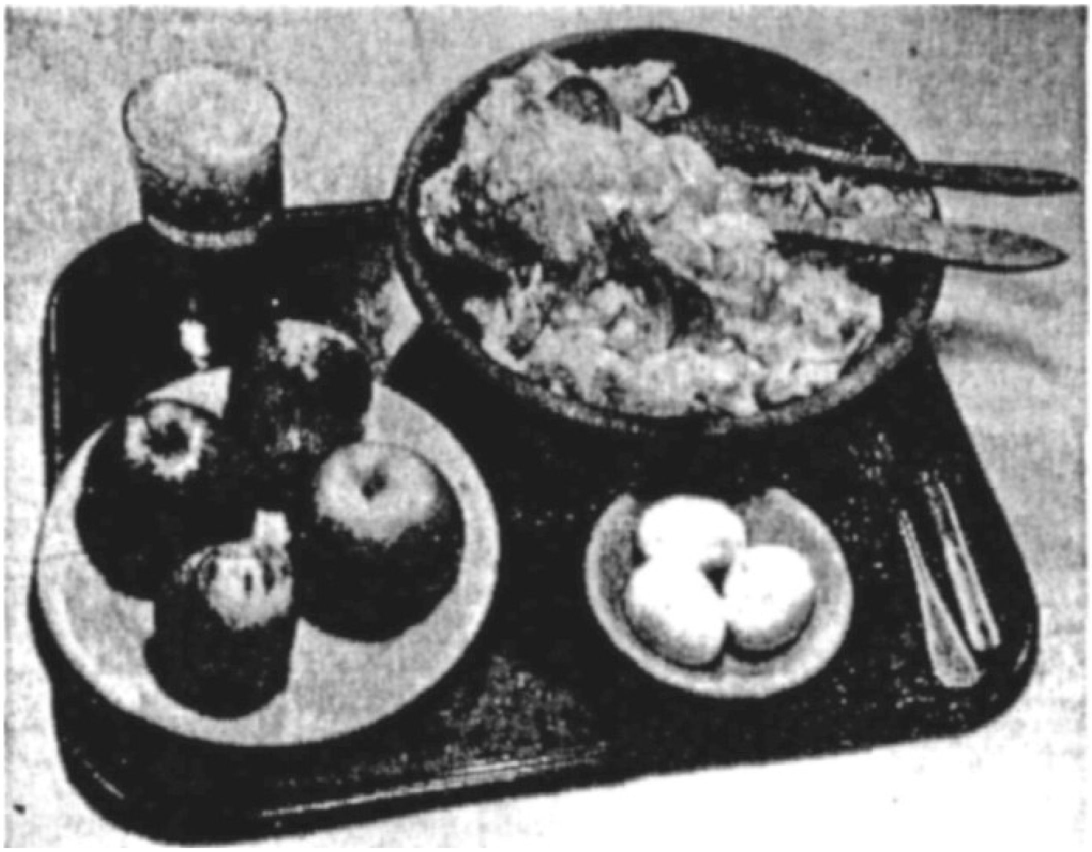
Other factors make Antarctica an ideal place for these bases. There is no rust, no germs, and consequently very little illness or decomposition. Food remains edible forever it seems, since the whole region acts rather like a giant freezer. For instance, the shed where Scott spent some months pre-W.W. I, before he launched his ill-fated antarctic expedition, was recently discovered. The food which remained in the shed, from almost 70 years ago was still as fresh and edible as on the day it arrived in antarctica, and wooden boxes, tin cans, cups, candle and paper (in fact everything), are as well preserved as if by inanimate suspension. Antarctica has no flies, no bugs, — no bacillus can survive the cold temperatures — not even the common cold can survive.

See photographs of Scott's camp.



The camp of Polar-explorer Scott, re-discovered after 60 years. Food supplies which were left were still edible. The table setting was as if just left. No deterioration.

These same non-deteriorating conditions where found in Jan. of 1947 by Admiral Byrd at the headquarters in Antarctica which he had established and lived in for months in the early 30's. From this it would seem safe to assume that human beings too would be subject to the same natural laws and therefore age much less quickly. The significance of all these factors would not have been lost to a very health conscious, vegetarian Adolf Hitler.



Health-conscious Hitler was a vegetarian. Here is a typical meal. No alcohol. No nicotine.

Now could all of this have taken place in the 20th century without detection? Hardly! What steps were taken to discover the truth? What has been done about the secret bases now that their existence has been established and established beyond a doubt? Why did the world not hear about these incredible events?

Obviously, Hitler's escape was soon discovered, otherwise the statements of Stalin and of Eisenhower and all other quoted sources would be an exercise in insanity. It has been speculated that the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials were staged, to a great extent, in the hope that the "Last Battalion" could be drawn from their impregnable, inaccessible hideouts, and thus force the Fuhrer's hand. A large armed force of elite troops surrounded the whole of the Nuremberg area during the long agonizing months of the typically-Bolshevik show trials. Perhaps there are readers who will be able to recall from newspaper pictures or newsreels the "tight security" that existed in the whole of Germany during these trials. Some S.S. men were actually caught, tried and convicted for attempting to free their leaders, but when the orgy of strangulations and torture was over, the Fuhrer was still nowhere to be found. Some UFO overflights and activities were reported but no actual armed clashes or incidents took place.

Washington, Moscow and London then decided to really “get into the act”; in fact, eight countries in total decided to do some “scientific” work and in Antarctica, of all places!! A large expedition, lavishly financed was quickly put together. It consisted of over 4,000 specially selected elite U.S. navy troops along with an eight month food supply. Thirteen ships under the overall command of Admiral Byrd made up this purely “scientific” expedition, composed mostly of military-types and very few scientists.

The U.S. Antarctic battle fleet left Norfolk, Va. on Dec. 2, 1946 — three distinct battle groups, comprised of the Mount Olympus, Admiral Byrd’s command ship, the ice-breaker, “Northwind”, the catapult ship “Pine Island”, the destroyer “Brownsen”, the aircraft-carrier “Philippines Sea”, the U.S. submarine “Sennet” and the two support vessels, “Yankee” and “Merrick”, as well as the two tankers “Canisted” and “Capacan”, an additional floatplane carrying ship, “Currituck” and the destroyer “Henderson”.

At the same time it was announced officially that a similar English-Norwegian force was operating in a support capacity in Antarctic waters around Bahia Marguerite. A Soviet contingent was also reported to be participating in the “research”.

U.S. Convoy in Antarctica

The Soviet participation is an interesting one, since Winston Churchill had already spoken of an "Iron Curtain" and felt that "they" — the crusaders to Europe had "killed the wrong pig". Obviously Churchill now realised that they should have destroyed Bolshevik Russia not Germany.

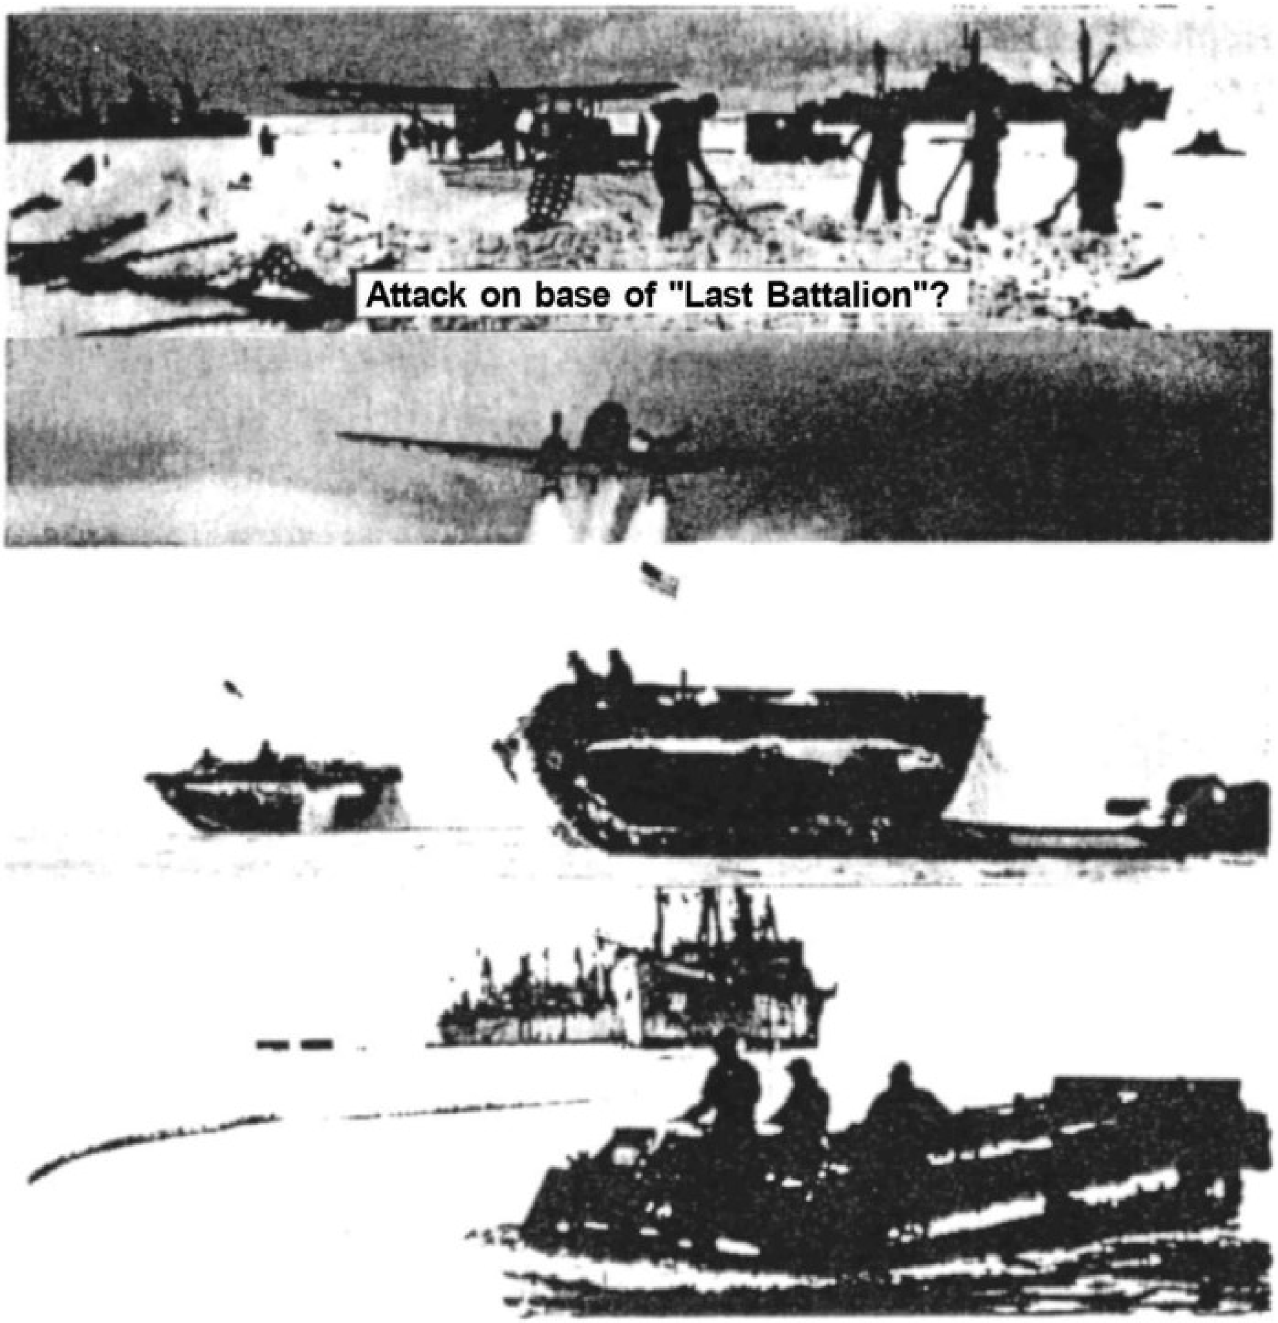
The general public was told that the "RESEARCH" mission was interested in locating uranium and studying the weather. Admiral Byrd, who had already undertaken a similar, though much smaller and speedier, investigation of the north pole was asked why he had recommended the establishment of armed observation camps. His reply, "Because the pole lies between us and our enemies" — El Mercurio, Santiago, Chile, July 7th, 1947. Further questioning as to which enemy he meant, since the Axis powers had just been defeated and had "unconditionally surrendered," brought no response.

However, it was soon learned that as well as the scientific jobs, the mission had the task of "observing the activities of a foreign power in the South Pole Region". Questioned further on this part of the expedition's activities, Adm. Byrd reportedly replied "To break the last desperate resistance of Adolf Hitler, in case we find him in his Neuberchtesgaden inside "New Schwabenland" in the Queen Maud Land region, or to destroy him".

The Spanish book "Hitler esta vivo" page 161, reports that Byrd's expedition was equipped with the very latest devices, amongst them "detectores termo magnetico" — as stated by Ladislao Szabo.

The U.S. expedition duly arrived and landed in Antarctica. With them the very latest in military gear and gadgets, from amphibian tanks to troop carriers, helicopters, floatplanes and every other conceivable military apparatus. Bases were established and quickly expanded. Observation planes were sent out all over the region. Reproduced here is a map giving a flight pattern of all the flights undertaken. Many thousands of photographs were taken and mapping missions flown. One particular flight stands out amongst all those reported and one in which Adm. Byrd, himself, was aboard. The instruments went totally haywire and the performance gauges and altimeters behaved in a most erratic manner, causing

Adm. Byrd to abort the flight and return to base on “visual” control. All instruments returned to normal as soon as open terrain had been reached.



U.S. Amphibian landing

It has been reported by papers and sources previously mentioned here, that Admiral Byrd had located the Secret Nazi Base and was approaching it when the above incident took place causing abandonment of the flight, but not before he is reported to have dropped an American flag (some reports mention a bomb) on the approximate spot of the base. Undoubtedly this was done to warn Hitler he was not entirely safe even in his “New Berchtesgaden” or, as one writer calls it, Hitler’s Shang-ri-la.

Vengeance was apparently swift and it seems the Fuhrer was not to be humoured. Within 48 hours, four of Byrd's planes had been lost, some without a trace and others without any survivors. (See crash sites marked on map). Adm. Byrd hastily abandoned all his efforts and disembarked, with all his force, for home.

German Base? German defenders? Red Alert!

On board his flagship "Olympus" he gave the following startling interview, translated from the Spanish as it was reported in the paper El Mercurio, Santiago, Chile on March 5, 1947. It appeared on the front page under the headline "On Board the Mount Olympus on the High Seas". Apparently Adm. Byrd granted an interview to Lee van Atta. "Adm. Byrd declared today that it was imperative for the United States to initiate immediate defence measures against hostile regions. The Admiral further stated that he didn't want to frighten anyone unduly but that it was a bitter reality that in case of a new war the continental United States would be attacked by flying objects which could fly from pole to pole at incredible speeds. (Earlier he had recommended defence bases at the North Pole). Admiral Byrd repeated the above points of view, resulting from his personal knowledge gathered both at the north and south poles, before a news conference held for International News Service".

Says 'saucers' seen in Far North

By JOHN LESTER
Staff Writer

Unidentified Flying Objects, more commonly known as Flying Saucers, again have been seen "maneuvering and landing" in Northern Alaska and the North Pole area, UFO authority Lee R. Munsick of Morristown told members of the Denville Rotary Club yesterday.

Speaking at a luncheon meeting at the Rockaway River Country Club, Munsick, formerly assistant director of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena, told Rotarians these most recent sightings in the Frozen North took place within the past two weeks, "as nearly as can be determined at this time."

The Alaskan sighting involved a single disc-type craft that was seen by a small party of trappers about 200 miles east of Umiat, Munsick said.

The men estimated the UFO was about two miles away when they first noticed it, Munsick reported, that it rose and descended to within a few feet of the ground several times, then flew slowly in a tight circle before disappearing.

They described it as "red colored."

Munsick attributed this to the fact that there are numerous instances on record of UFOs' glowing when in motion, a deep orange at low speeds, nearly white at high speeds.

The Polar sighting was made by two Norwegian soldiers, although no further details are available.

The Norwegian embassy, Munsick said, claimed to have no record of this sighting but added that all information on UFOs and their sightings were considered classified.

This latest North Pole sighting is at least the fourth in which members of the Norwegian military have figured as far as is known, the speaker said.

In September, 1955, he recalled, a representative of the Norwegian General Staff revealed that "special details" assigned to observe the Arctic region "are now convinced" it was being used as a base by UFOs, especially during bad weather "when we are forced back to our bases."

During this press conference the Admiral also stated that in a quickly shrinking world the United States could no longer derive any sense of security from its isolation or on the geographic distance of the poles or oceans. The Admiral affirmed once again his belief that the entire Antarctic continent should be closely watched and surrounded by a "wall of defence installations, since it represented the last line of defence for AMERICA". (These defence measures have since been taken). Admiral Byrd further stated that no one could give a more accurate accounting of the true significance of the situation than he could, since he had had occasion to employ the latest scientific developments and from what he had learned he could make comparisons. (Meaning he had encountered the effect of the secret weapons?)

When Admiral Byrd had arrived in the United States and the significance of his findings had found their way into the press, he was hospitalized. No hard information was ever unearthed but it seems his frank statements to the press in South America and on board the Olympus were not appreciated by the powers that be in Washington. Was he thus the first victim of a long string of prominent people "removed from circulation" for their honest belief in Unidentified Flying Objects, flying at incredible speeds from pole to pole?

Many definite and also very important conclusions can be drawn from the previous reporting:

1. The final outcome of W.W. II is yet to be decided. This is borne out by the late General and former President Eisenhower's statement—"The second world war has not yet ended" and corroborated by Admiral Byrd's alarming phrase "in the case of a new war". Hitler's Last Battalion is waiting for its golden opportunity to be "the tip of the scale" in any conflagration yet to come.

2. The over forty-four small wars since 1945 including Korea and Vietnam, were supposed to provoke a premature "showing of hands" by the Last Battalion.

3. Hitler has defended his secret lair as successfully against Byrd as he had his numerous headquarters in Europe, during the war against the Allies. Byrd was forced to retreat and to acknowledge the superiority of the UFO's, and their secret weapons.

4. The "New Third Reich" has maintained its crucial time — technology advantage over its W.W. II adversaries — possibly even increased it.

5. Idealism (spirit) has triumphed already over Materialism (money), since only the German state was destroyed but not the ideology of National Socialism.

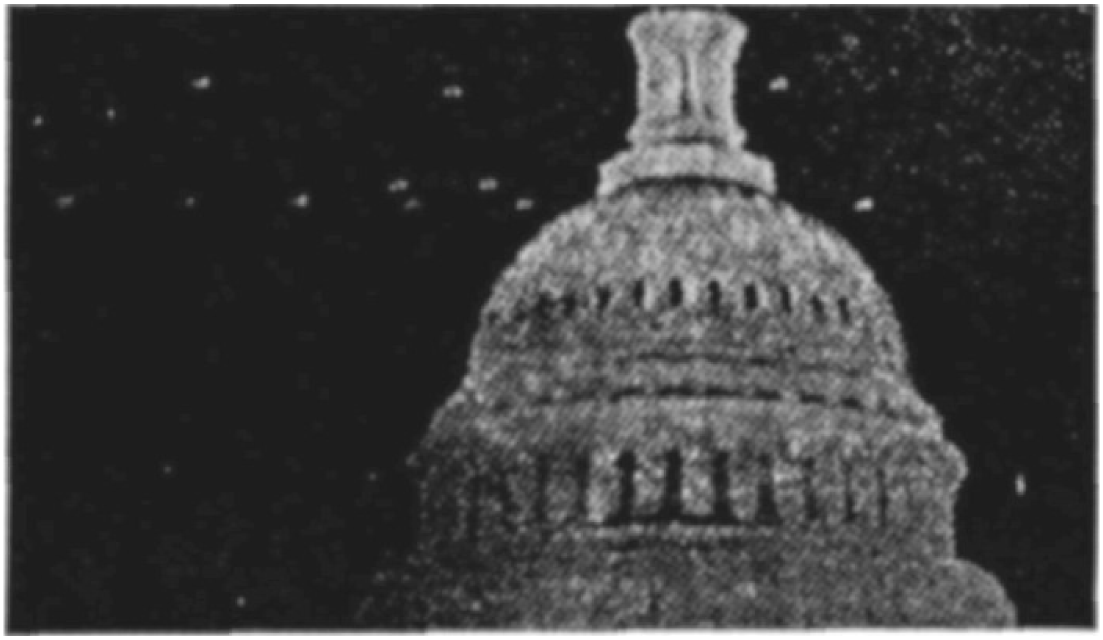
6. There has been a 30-year cover up by brain and more often by brawn, about the true identity of the UFO's or at least many of them. Their origins have been known, but deliberately suppressed by the rulers of the Unholy Alliance of 1939-45.

7. The real and only reason for the insane UFO cover up, now falling apart, is to be found in most UFO's German origin. The Allies in East and West have told so many lies about the barbaric, sadistic behaviour of the Nazis, that they now fear wide-spread panic amongst their populations, should the truth become known. After all, if the Nazis are still around, would it not be logical and natural for them to take revenge one day? With U.F.O. power!

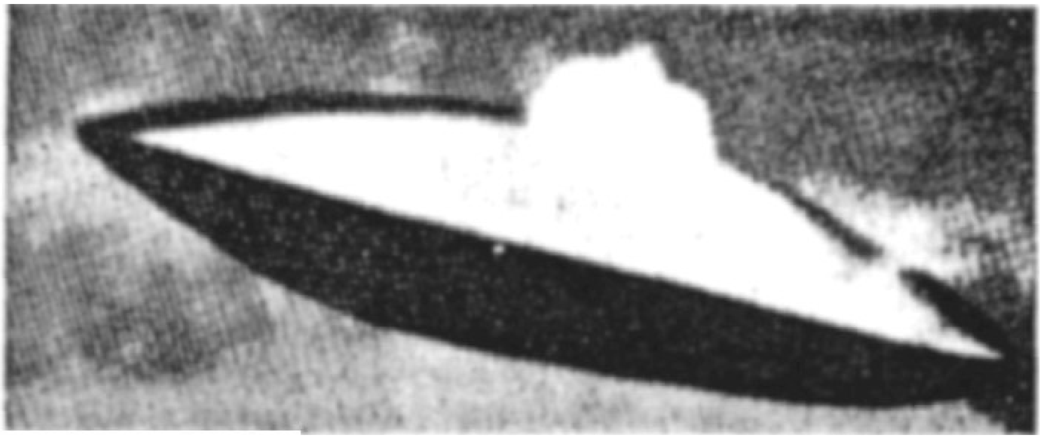
WHY THE BIG UFO COVER-UP?

For 30 years some of the world's most imaginative people have wondered about the "strange" behaviour of their governments when it came to the questions of the UFO's. If the UFO's are extra terrestrial and the humans on this planet have no "defence" against them, then why annoy these beings by orders to "shoot to kill?" It is interesting that once again we see perfect harmony of approach between the U.S. and the Soviets. Recently there was a very detailed report about the Soviet Air Forces having stumbled upon some secret UFO bases in far off Mongolia. Apparently the Soviets went in in their usual barbaric style, bombed and burned everything to the ground, as reported by Dipl. Ing. A. Schneider in the Viennese newspaper, K. Die aktuelle Serie, P.a. Sat. Sept. 14,1974. ". . . the following remarkable report reached us today from the Soviet Union: April 24, 1970 was a day that all hell broke loose. A supersonic Soviet jetbomber in a secret mission from Moscow to Vladivostok was lost without a trace over Siberia. The pilot was in voice contact with ground control stations when suddenly the transmission was interrupted. An intensive search by nearly two hundred planes was quickly organized over the area where the pilot was last heard from. Almost simultaneously a number of pilots reported to ground control "we are not alone up here, above us are flying objects, may be 25 or even more. They are huge, they are so high we cannot get near them". That same afternoon in Krasnojarsk, red alert was sounded and troops were deployed around the city because an entire formation of these silvery, silent visitors circled over the scared town. Apparently, entire salvoes of ground to air missiles were fired at hundreds of flying discs which crowded the airspace of the Sino-Soviet-Mongolian frontier area. There was a concerted action by the strange intruders against the town of Ulan Bator, where all flights seemed to emanate from and end. A spokesman for a group of touring German students said after returning from Mongolia, where they had been at the time of the "UFO invasion", that the Soviet Union had destroyed a secret UFO base of immense proportions consisting of many miles of subterranean tunnels, and dozens of pyramid like structures in the northern area of Mongolia." However no photographic proof or documentary evidence exists. The Soviets are always very secretive.

After Admiral Byrd's hasty retreat from Antarctica he not only suggested bases around both poles and a ring of armed camps, but offered this plan: Turn Antarctica into atomic test ranges where atom and hydrogen bombs could be dropped to be "tested". No sooner had the idea been advanced and announced in the press than a strange thing happened. Capitol Hill in Washington, D.C. received an official visit. There is not a UFO fan who has not seen this historic photograph of an entire "swarm" of U.F.O.'s flying over the nearby Congressional Buildings and the White House in perfect, "typically-German" formation. Many UFO researchers have been puzzled about that particular flight. Was it a demonstration of strength? Strength calculated to show that open cities such as Washington or New York, with the many skyscrapers, were far more vulnerable to havoc than the continent of Antarctica with its three to four mile thick ice cap. Interesting too, that the Antarctic test site idea was never again seriously considered. Perhaps we should score another victory of the Fuhrer's "Last Battalion"?



Many sightings took place around the world from Japan to Korea, where we have a particularly good example of a UFO de-materialising in front of the cameras. (See photo.) One must ask “Why do these UFO’s always show themselves, but why do they not land”? If one accepts the normal theory that they are extra terrestrial then the behaviour is certainly strange. Did the crews of these UFO’s travel for so many millions and millions of miles and now not be able to make up their minds to land or not to land? Hardly sensible. Surely it makes more sense to assume they are from this earth, consequently they don’t have to land since they know what earth is all about, and that they are, in fact, reconnaissance aircraft of some earthly power and have no need or desire to communicate. After all, they can tune in and monitor all radio, T.V. and telephone conversations without too much effort, and this would be “old hat” to people who have lived with this, our own technology, all their lives.



A book which makes very interesting reading is “Incident At Kearney” written by a German American who claims, and claims most convincingly, that he was taken up in a UFO on several occasions. He writes that the entire crew spoke German and behaved like German soldiers. He was taken on a flight to the pole. (Why to the Pole and not to the jungles of Africa or Brazil???) They were friendly and correct to him. No sooner had this author, Reinhold Schmidt, landed in his native America than he was put through a regular hell on earth. Soviet methods were used to persuade him to “shut up” including the K.G.B. tactic of “insane asylum” treatment as reported by Solzhenitsyn and others. One further note of interest is that Schmidt was taken up in a UFO which matches exactly the shape and design of at least two German design UFO’s. Just coincidence? I am inclined to think not.

The UFO cover up is similar in action to those other unholy alliances such as the mass murders of Operation Keelhaul, at Katyn, Dresden and Hiroshima. Let anyone dare to “not conform” with “the establishment’s” version of things and we see people being hounded, defamed and persecuted.

The same pattern that applied in politics globally, when the non-conformist Hitler threatened to upset the international applecart, is still being applied’ to the UFO cover up and has been applied for the last 30 years. Why?

Finally even N.A.S.A. seems to have caught on that rocketry is a rather old fashioned method of spaceflight and according to “Das Neue Zeitalter”, of 5th August, 1967, is now ready to “drop rocketry in favour of flying saucers for flights beyond the Sun and Jupiter”. However, not too much has materialized in that direction to this date.

It is here that another question must be asked. At the speed of our own space vehicles, the nearest “base” for visitors would be 170,000 years away. Well, that’s quite a distance. Even granting a superior technology which could increase speed ten-fold, it would mean that the saucer crews would have to have taken off 17,000 years ago, when we barely had hairy Neanderthal “ancestors” grunting their way through caves along the “corocodile” invested Rhine. At that time, we had not even invented the wheel, hardly fire, never mind rockets. The only aircraft around at that time on this planet were, at best, birds and may be a few fire-flies. The space people could hardly have been worrying about us and our atomic experimenting — not when they left their bases, so perhaps we should stop making ourselves the laughing stock of the universe. Undoubtedly there is life out there in space amongst all those lovely stars in the sky. Not to believe this would be the height of ignorance and arrogance. Most of the UFO’s we are hearing about on this planet are earthlings!

In 1959, in three separate large circulation newspapers in Santiago, Chile, it was reported on the front pages that UFO’s had been seen, had landed, and that the crew members behaved and talked like “soldados alemanos”. When the big UFO flap was on in the Catskills and in New York and in New Jersey in the early sixties, farmers repeatedly spoke of the crew members as addressing them in German or in English with a German accent. The power of the UFO’s was pretty well demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt by the great “black out”. Many people still insist the black out was the work of UFO’s. There certainly was a rash of sightings at the time over and along hydro lines and power stations.

Often, UFO fans advanced the theory that the strange flying objects come from distant planets and galaxies to check on our “atomic experimenting”, and some people state “contactees” have been told that the UFO’s would prevent an atomic war on the planet earth. Why should they? Why should they care? They certainly do not demonstrate any great desire to colonize the earth — at least not in any great numbers. However if they are from earth, this attitude makes sense.

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — (Reuters) — Argentine astronomers Sunday were puzzled over a red, unidentified flying object which sped across flattened, and red crossed the observatory's telescope range in four minutes, whereas normal artificial satellites take roughly 18 minutes.

But there are other reasons why the UFO’s will not allow atomic devastation to wreck this planet:—

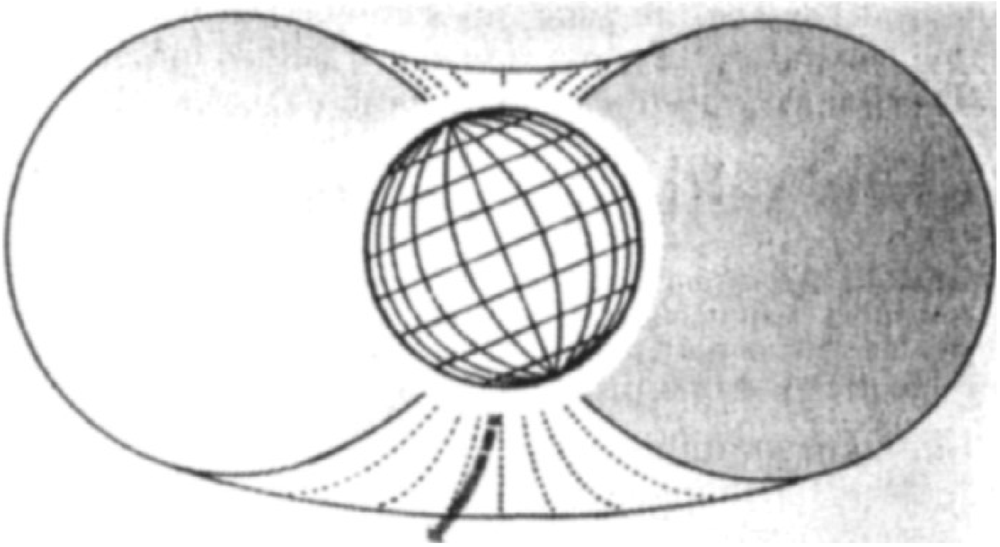
a) The UFO’s are, by this time, driven by electro magnetism, consequently all secrets surrounding electric power have been discovered. Since all modern communications and guidance systems are based on electronics, it is an easy task to “listen in”, decode and prevent the start or to re-direct whilst in flight, any vehicle or space craft, now in use by the “allies”.

b) The destructive power of atomic weapons is therefore much more of a threat to the powers who possess them and have them stored in silos, in subs, in planes or on their own soil than to those countries who do not have these weapons at all, since they could quite easily be set off by remote control from the UFO’s, before they were even launched.

c) The UFO’s will undoubtedly prevent atomic war to prevent the extinction of the White Race. At the moment the white people are outnumbered ten to one on the planet and should there be an atomic exchange the ratio would be a hundred to one in our dis-favour.

No man of the calibre of Adolf Hitler, deeply committed to the survival and resurgence of Western Culture, would ever allow this tragedy to happen to the White race.

There is an interesting aside to this UFO Antarctic business and spaceflight. Perhaps a few of our readers know that in the region of the South Pole (Antarctica), and to a lesser extent the North Pole, it is possible to escape from the earth’s magnetic pull and death through radiation because the Van Allen Belts open up, funnel-like, at both of these extremities. It is possible to launch a spacecraft, with very little radiation protection from this area avoiding enormous weight, a crew needs no radiation-protection gear.



The Van Allen Belts; radio active death belts surrounding the planet earth. They are open funnel-like at the north and south poles, permitting flight into space without heavy lead shields and protective suits.

We must also remember Hitler's feasibility studies of space stations, based on Prof. Dr. Oberth's ideal, 2-hour trajectory. An artificial satellite was to be rocketed into space in 1947 with the A9-A10 rocket, in a steep angle away from the axis of the earth, and counter to the earth's rotation. From this point it would have been possible to:

1) Observe any spot on earth within any given two hour time period.

2) Hit any spot on earth with accurate missiles, bombs, radar-guided or other gadgets such as "mirror beams" or "death rays".

Julius and Ethel Rosenberg mentioned these platforms in their testimony during their espionage trials. They called them "Warships of space". Where did they get this information about these top secret plans, not realised by the Allies until 25 years later? From the same documents that gave them the atomic bomb? But all of this is an indication that spaceflight was already known to a mysterious group of beings.

The American astronomer, Prof. Dr. James Greenacre and four of his colleagues made an astounding observation from Flagstaff, Ariz. Observatory and reported it to a Conference on "Moon Problems" in New York City in May of 1964. Because of the UFO cover-up policy still in force by the U.S. government, Prof. Dr. Greenacre was only able to give his report verbally to colleagues who were present at the Conference. Here is roughly what he said "On 29th Oct. 1963 we observed several colourful spots on the Moon, the spots moved in formation across the motionless face of the moon. One month later Prof. Dr. Greenacre observed the same phenomena. The May 1966 issue of "UFO Nachrichten" Vol. 117 reproduced what Dr. Greenacre had stated he had observed . . . "Prof. Dr. Greenacre saw on or close to the moon at least 31 space craft of gigantic size. Some were from 300 metre to 4.8 kilometres long. They were in motion while being observed through the telescopes. Also, clearly discernible were numerous smaller craft approximately 150 metres in diameter, which moved past or alongside the huge craft, the "mother craft" occasionally changing colour, as in the often-reported, pulsating style." (The distance from the earth to the moon is 384,000 kilometres). End of report.

The American Professor thought at first the Russians might have beaten the Americans to the punch but as it turns out, the workers' paradise has not managed to land even a man on the moon — last report was that they were seen improving the brand barbed wire used in their more than 1,000 slave labour and death camps on earth, not on the moon. So, who is out there in the wild blue yonder? Prof. Dr. Phillips of Berlin, Hitler's wartime comrade claims he knows! He even sent the author of this book some charts and times tables of his flights. They match!!

Before we leave this area of investigation, we have to look into the repeatedly reported "glowing" or "pulsating" lights emanating from U.F.O.'s. We find an interesting reference to this phenomena in the previously-mentioned book "We want You" — "Is Hitler Alive?". On page 17 the author reports about a brilliant German metallurgist who had created "a metal harder than diamonds" called appropriately enough "Impervium". This metal glows alternately in the colours of the rainbow when heated to a high degree. This seems to tie up another loose end. Again the timing is interesting. The metal was used for the first time commercially in 1935-36. The laboratories were located not at Schramberg as Michael X reports, but at Starnberg and Starnberger See. However, this could be a simple spelling error by someone not too familiar with the German language.

Now it is time for us to get deeper into the state of actual German UFO research and development. Some is based on hard evidence, other areas have to be pieced together from bits and pieces.

German research and science were once the envy of the world. Every time Nobel prizes were awarded, one could find half a dozen Germans amongst those honoured. That was for achievement, real honest effort; recently, the only Germans so honoured were for betraying the interests of their country, usually to the Reds, in the east. When German scientists were given proper encouragement, sufficient funds and lofty goals their creative output was truly amazing. In the few short years from the time Hitler achieved power, the Germans graduated from W.W.I-type airplanes to jets. The first all jet-powered plane was aloft in 1938 — a Heinkel. Since Germany was forbidden by the Treaty of Versailles to build large planes or military planes, research and development was taking place clandestinely in Russia for a time, but Russia being the type of country it was and still is, this work did not amount to very much.

In National Socialist Germany as soon as Hitler gave the directive, things got rolling. A tremendous amount of experimental work was carried out in several fields of development, namely:

a) conventional propeller-driven planes, usually all metal skin.
b) experimental, all-wooden, to scale delta wing airplanes, and all wing designs.
c) jet-powered planes and rockets, as well as turbo props.
d) the futuristic designs, such as flying disc and boomerang-type aircraft, powered various ways; flying platforms, people, tanks etc.
e) the helicopter, rotating wing, the gyrocopter designs as well as U-Boat pulled kites and gyroscopes etc.

During peace time all this work was carried out at regular aircraft plants near airports of major aircraft producing towns such as Munich, Augsburg, Stuttgart etc. These places were safe from aerial attack until America got involved in the war. Then the designs on the more futuristic designs were transferred to Silesia, East Prussia, the Sudetenland, Bohemia etc. The laboratories were usually underground in abandoned salt or coal mines, in some cases, however, entire mountains were honeycombed with a maze of tunnels, shafts, elevators and underground railroads. Smoketacks were camouflaged as medieval castle turrets. Entrances were so well camouflaged by entire forests that had been transplanted and in one such case it took playing youths six weeks after the war to stumble on a secret jetbomber factory the Americans had overlooked.

One case, known to the author's father, is the airfield in the Sudetenland, without any runway. The entire airfield, in effect, was built into a mountain. The planes touched down on what looked like the extension of a regular highway and were immediately gobbled up by a yawning crack in the side of the mountain. On the opposite side of the mountain, the jets would roar out at almost the speed of sound whenever they took off. Eventually, the Allies stationed 20 fighters on an around-the-clock basis always circling the "hole in the ground", hitting the elusive German fighters at that crucial time when forced to slow down to aim for the hole in the mountain. It is in bases like the above-mentioned, that some of the UFO experiments were conducted. All areas were guarded by electrified barbed wire, constant patrols and minefields. It was only possible to enter with special passes granted only by Himmler's Headquarters, all were consecutively numbered and had a picture of the bearer affixed. All security arrangements were in the hands of the S.S. Troops. Often when rumours got around to flying discs, wings etc. amongst these S.S. Troops, they referred, in hushed tones to “Himmler’s baby”, leaning on a play in words, since Himmler in German means sky — “Himmelskind” or “child of the sky or heaven”. Why this strange nomenclature? Actually it is not so strange at all. The German “Landser”, the popular nickname for the German version of the G.I. had always developed short, but very fitting descriptive titles. For instance, when the Russians introduced their feared rocket batteries which sent a salvo of 12-16 projectiles screaming across to the German lines, it sounded like discordant organ music, therefore it was immediately nicknamed the “Stalin-organ”. So to the S.S. men the flying saucers became known as Himmler’s babies”, just as the Americans quickly called them “Krautmeteors”, appropriately enough, since they were fast as meteors and just as silent.

Let us visit one of the German saucer bases as described by the late Prof. Dr. Friedrich Kuhfuss, who died in Barcelona, Spain, in exile, having never been captured by the Allies. Prof. Kuhfuss had for years been involved in all manner of experimental flying activities. His family was wiped out by an American air raid and he vowed he would rather take his knowledge on flying saucers to his grave than to ever share them with “those barbarians from across the seas or those peachy complexioned hypocrites along the River Thames”. From Dr. Kuhfuss we at least know how one of these bases looked . . .

BASE X

Deep among the near-primeval, dark and foreboding forests, somewhere in one of the many hilly areas of Germany, there was a secret base simply called X. To the outside world it looked like an ancient hunting lodge, perched atop a small hill. Only two meandering winding roads led up to the “Jagdschloss” as German woodsmen and small farmers of the nearby village (about 8 km. distant) would simply call it. Apparently some gruesome murders had taken place in centuries past at the castle and local woodsmen insisted that on certain nights one could hear the frightful din and clash of arms and the shrieks and cries of the wounded and dying. Therefore the spot was treated with a peasant’s healthy respect, for stories of this type were never taken too lightly in Europe. However, someone in high places had apparently not heard of the ghosts and had decided that because of its strategic location at the end of the world, the Jagdschloss would be a good site for some far out experimentation and before the peasants and woodsmen knew what was happening, their forest area had been declared a restricted area. They were told that for the duration of the war the entire area was under the direct control of the S.S. All villagers were issued with special passes, with photographs; no outsiders were allowed to visit them and they were sworn to secrecy. War was war, and this was not the first time in their lives they had had to restrict their lives because of special circumstances and besides they found a ready market amongst the soldiers for some of the few things they had to offer for sale, such as eggs, the occasional chicken, goat, rabbit and perhaps even a pig. They observed, however, bus loads of people driving through their village usually sombre looking men, very few women, but many of them uniformed and an exceptional number of higher rank officers.

Since there was only one Inn in the village, The Gasthaus zum Goldenen Ochsen (The Golden Oxen) occasionally some of the heavy Mercedes and Opel automobiles would stop and their occupants lunch or partake of snacks. The men behaved in a most peculair manner. They all took their briefcases with them to lunch, many of these cases being of a size larger than the usual German briefcase. They were chained and locked to left wrists and time and time again the local peasantry stood open-mouthed with amazement as these people from “the outside world” descended upon their peaceful Inn, asking for dishes with which they were not familiar and asked for in German dialects which they could hardly understand.

However, the hand motions of the eaters, sometimes shooting into the air, or weaving back and forth, sometimes hovering and the occasional word fliegen (flying), schweben (float in air), aufsteigen (climb up) which they could understand, they began to realise that something to do with flying was being discussed and obviously in connection with the Jagdschloss.

One day, one visitor even asked the proprietor's daughter to fetch some old saucers from the kitchen with which a very serious group of men piled out into the courtyard and watched with much excited discussion and nodding, how saucer after saucer was hurled into the air like today's "Frisbees", to demonstrate to the assembled guests (obviously scientists) the flight peculiarities of Saucers, all of this much to the chagrin of the young woman, because dishes were a pretty precious commodity during war. However, the guests paid well for them, more than the "new" price and after the demonstration they roared out of town.

There was relative quiet for a number of weeks and then one day S.S. men asked the local burgermaster to call together the local inhabitants. An officer was introduced, he announced that close to the Jadgschloss an auxilliary to a concentration camp was to be set up and that the inmates were war plant workers engaged in extremely important work. Nobody was to fraternize with these people and all strangers or strange happenings were to be immediately reported to the S.S. Ortskommandatur. The inhabitants were thanked for the exemplary manner in which they had treated their "uninvited" guests and hoped for future good relations. He raised his arm, everybody said "Heil Hitler" and he walked out, leaving the townspeople talking excitedly amongst themselves. A few days later, truck after truck loaded with construction equipment of every conceivable description rolled through the village. Then followed wood lumber, many rolls of tarpaper and finally barbed wire. Later, followed a few buses, with windows painted over, followed by truckloads of steel-helmeted soldiers with carbines. Quiet settled again on the village. A few weeks later, where there had been meadows was now a hustling, bustling camp.

Soon loud and frightening blasts could be heard day in and day out, reverberating through the valleys. After a few months they ceased. Then huge, slow-moving, flatbed trucks began to arrive carrying loads, covered with tarpaulins all chained to the platforms and guarded by soldiers. This went on for many, many weeks. By now the whole village was rife with the most unbelievable rumours.

One night, the entire village was awakened and terribly frightened by sound of such high pitch and frequency that had commenced only as a hardly audible humming, that it was soon realised that something very unusual was happening. They rushed outside and to their utter amazement and bewilderment they saw a brilliantly illuminated "thing" hovering in the air in the general direction of the Jagdschloss. Then, just as violently as it had announced its arrival the sound died down, the light faded and the strange "thing" settled behind the treetops, out of sight of the relieved, yet still shaken local people. Eventually, this strange sound became familiar to them and only the children became excited about it everytime a "thing" started or landed. Soon, several of these strange vehicles, each a little different from the other, were flying about, at first slowly but later at such fantastic speeds that it was difficult to follow them with the naked eye. But now a new annoyance frightened the farmers. They had observed that their cows and dogs seemed to be affected by the high whine of the engines of these "things". Sometimes, when flying so fast, they made frightful noises, big bangs, that reverberated around the valleys rather like heavy thunderclaps. All in all they were beginning to be a little “unheimlich” (scary) and there was talk of asking the mayor to protest again these shenannigans to the S.S.-Ortskommandantur.

In the meantime, two of the local boys who were in the Army, came home on leave. When they were told what was going on they mentioned to their folks the nicknames “Himmelskinder”, and how it was thought that they were the miracle weapons the Fuhrer had spoken of several times in the last few months. This consoled the local population for after all reports from the front were none too rosy and if their valley could help to turn the tide of events and be of aid to the Fuhrer then it was alright with them. So, the months became years, then one day long columns of trucks clogged the roads. Since there were two roads into and out of the Jagdschloss it was difficult to know what was transpiring, but soon they knew. Les and less flying “things” were seen and soon the camp was only a shadow of its former self. One day all work ceased, tremendous explosions ripped, once again, through the valley, smoke rose from the area of the Jogdschloss and a few weeks later the Russians rode into town, unopposed, raping and looting everything in sight. They found only ruins at the Jagdschloss. When they were told, during interrogation, what had been seen, they just stared over their vodka bottles disbelieving the Germankis. Little did they realise that in those caved-in caverns, with electrical cables and wires dangling from now damp ceilings, on the debris-littered floors, in seemingly endless halls, with strange burn marks on the concrete floors, walls and ceilings, had taken place one of the wonders of the world. Now all lay wrecked and mute, only worthless bits of pieces of metal, nuts, bolts, steel rods, rubber tires, some leather and some strange-looking and feeling “slacklike”, greyish substance was to be found amongst all the rubble. There was the usual amount of rusty and burnt bunk bends, with their half-rotten straw sacks, broken down tarpaper shacks, half burned, empty cans, containers, some empty munition boxes, guard huts and two or three abandoned, cannibalized trucks. And that was all. No records, no evidence, only destruction.

THE U.F.O. PUZZLE

Technical Details

One could safely state without fear of contradiction, that the UFO origins and their technical aspects, such as method of propulsion, guidance, metallurgical composition of the craft themselves, and the origins of the crews, human or non-human, have perplexed an entire generation of people.

Much has been stated in this book that has never been looked at before in the light of German operated UFO’s. Now it is time to look at the available data, real hard facts.

Most people interested in the UFO phenomenon know the Reinhold Schmidt story, so we will only summarize here that he was an American, born in America, but who could still speak some German which his parents had taught him. He has stated that he was taken into a flying saucer on several occasions and actually taken for rides as far away as the poles. The crew spoke German and behaved like German soldiers. Certainly a remarkable story. The crew leader claimed he was from another planet, which could certainly be true, and it could mean that Germans have inhabited other planets. Then comes the obvious question — how did Germans get to other planets? Reinhold Schmidt forgot to ask. However, we do have a sketch of the flying saucer he was taken up in, and it certainly resembles the German UFO’s that follow, a photo of Schmidt's saucer and the Bellonzo-Schriever-MietheModel which actually flew. There are two authorities who can vouch for the actual flights and some of the details as to propulsion, size, speeds reached in actual flight etc. One is the late Major Rudolf Lusar, author, and an engineer by profession who worked for the German Air Force Ministry and in the patent and discovery evaluation section during the war. We reprint his account of the Flying Disc experiments from his definitive work on German Secret Weapons of W.W.II, pages 165 and 166 of the English edition, published by Neville Spearman, London, England.

Mentioned in other pages of this book

There are a number of speculations which Lusar makes as to the postwar whereabouts of some of the scientists and their plants, equipment etc. which have since been established to be erroneous. However, in 1953 when he wrote this book, that was all that was then known and all that could be surmissed. In conversations with the author just before his death, Lusar mentioned that he was going to update the 6th German Edition; his premature death prevented such updating.

Now we must turn our attention to another man who has been closely linked with the German UFO story — Victor Schauberger. Reproduced here are photos of two of his electro-magnetically powered "Flying Hats" and some photographs that show how strikingly similar they are to actual UFO's photographed flying over the United States. Victor Schauberger lived for some years in the United States after the war where he was reported to be working on UFO projects. Apparently he was well financed and supported by a group of mysterious, but obviously wealthy people. He received wide publicity in the middle 1950's when he first published his work on "implosion" instead of "explosion", which is a concept as revolutionary as saying "not nuclear fission but nuclear fusion" is the way of the future. His articles were greatly discussed and then one day in Chicago he just vanished. His battered body was found and as to who killed Schauberger or why has never been solved. One version has it that gangsters tried to beat his revolutionising secrets out of him and accidentally killed him. However, Schauberger did experiments early in 1940-41 in Vienna and his 10 foot diameter models were so successful that on the very first tests they took off vertically at such surpriing speeds that one model shot through the 24 foot high hangar ceiling, damaging not only the roof but also causing the first UFO casualty, namely itself, for it was blown to bits. After this "success" Schauberger's experiments received "Vordringlichkeitsstufe" — high priority and he was given adequate funds and facilities as well as help. His aides included Czechoslovakian engineers who worked at the concentration camp af Mauthausen on some parts of the Schauberger flyinq saucers. It is largely through these people that the story leaked out. There is a further witness to all this, he is a Diplom-Wirtschaftsfachmann (Economist) named Hermann Klass from Muhlheim a.d. Ruhr who wrote extensively about his wartime involvement in the UFO development in the "Bergische Wochenpost" a regional paper in his area. We reproduce here a few of his photo copies which date back as far as 1941.

SPOT FLYING SAUCER—Above is an artist's conception of an unidentifed flying object spotted low over the horizon near Chantry Island in Lake Huron Thursday night David Powell of Paris, Ontario, an artist, along with his brother, Steve, 8, and two cousins, Carol Powell, 23, of Ingersoll and Terry Hook first sighted the object at about 8 p.m. from Southampton. They continued observations until it disappeared into the distance 45 minutes later. The object emmited a greenish glow "like a light bulb" said Mr Powell. He estimated it to be about the size of two or three stars, moving in a northerly direction. (Sketch by David Powell)

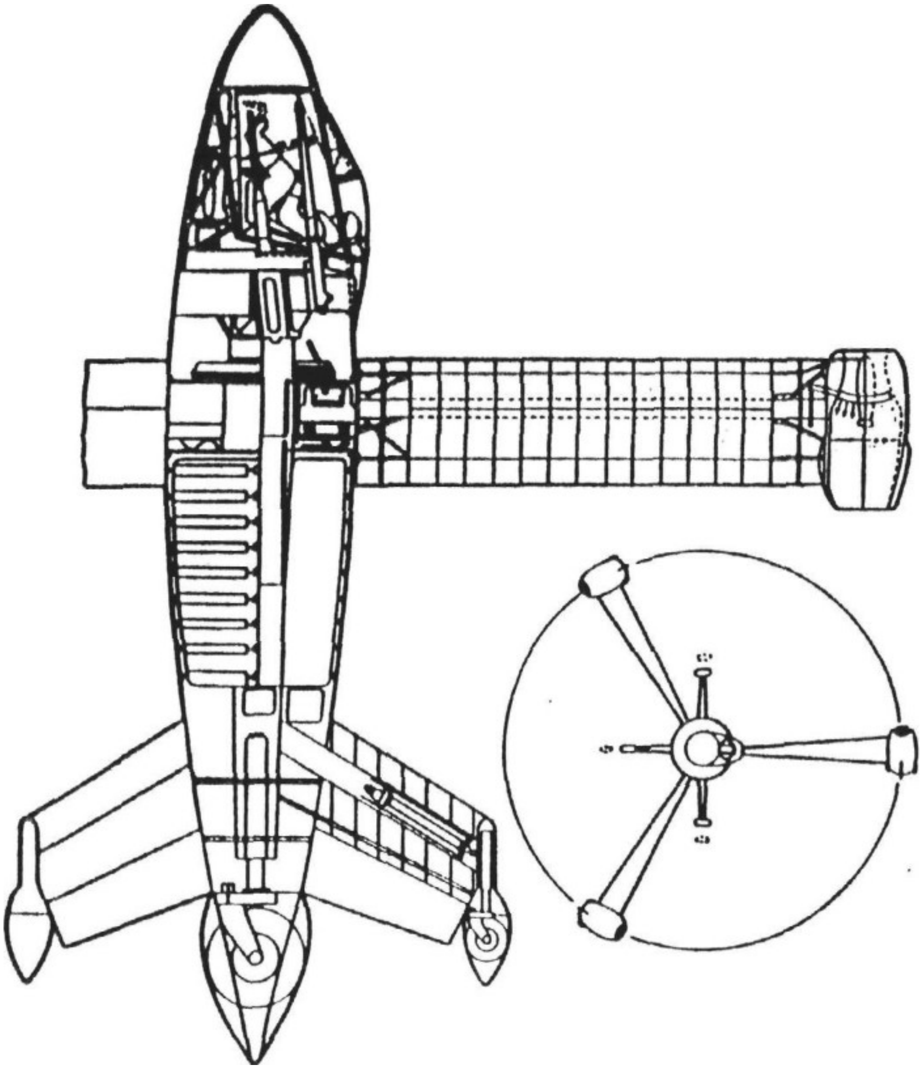
Hermann Klaas knew Victor Schauberger personally and transported U.F.O. parts from Mauthausen to Vienna and most likely to the factory named Kertl which is mentioned in the book “Flying Saucers over South Africa” written by Sievers. The director of this Viennese firm complained once to Klass about the fantastic speed and silent take-off of Schauberger’s invention which had caused the hole in the roof — earlier reported.



The “Verlikalzugschraube” principle as well as tillable rotating jets in wing tips incorporated in unusual “plan”. Many elements were used in German Flying Saucers. Note: Pilot’s seating arrangement.

Let us now examine each saucer in detail. We leave the original German descriptions and add English translations on the engineering drawings.

This prototype was first test-flown in 1941-42; it is also the world's first vertical takeoff flying vehicle. It has similar flight characteristics as the Schauberger models but it was less stable. The wings which issued from the centre of the craft like spokes towards the outer rim, were tillable. The Germans called that "Flugelrad" or Wingwheel. This caused the designers immense problems because the smallest imbalance caused the wingwheel to vibrate and this vibration increased at high speeds and was the cause on many occasions of wrecked machines. Perhaps the best comparison is to the tire of a car that is not properly balanced or is unevenly worn. Since the r.p.m.'s were so utterly fantastic, the problems faced by the designers can be easily appreciated even by the layman. Whilst car wheel balancing can be corrected by adding lead slugs to the rims of the wheels, German UFO scientists could employ no such crude remedy and so it was repeatedly "back to the drawing board" and it was absolute perfect workmanship which finally eradicated the problem. This model was test-flown with the standard German Rocketmotor then in use and called the Walterrohr. Because of its tremendous speeds, fuel consumption was very high and there was not sufficient tank space on board. At first, the pilot sat in a reclining contour seat as in an airplane. Later the position was changed to lying flat. Provision was made for one flight mechanic whose compartment can be seen below the "Flugelrad". The jet engines on all conventionally propelled flying saucers were manouverable or tillable in order to achieve what is called the "Coandaeffeckt" which results in the vertical take-off of the craft. Many improvements were naturally made in the course of the experiments and flight trials.

Model II embodies some of these changes. The size has been increased to accomodate two pilots lying in a prone position and the engine compartment as well as fuel carrying capacity have been increased. This model also used an airplane-like rudder steering-assist mechanism for stabilization. Speeds of between 1000-2000 km/hour were reportedly achieved. The problem of wheel balancing had been solved and the wingscrew or wing propeller arrangement worked to satisfaction. The German terms coined at the time were “Vertikalzugschraube” or vertical pull propeller. As soon as the desired height was reached the propeller blades were adjusted to a very flat angle and now the pull up propeller became the “Tragschraube” or carrying propeller — very similar to the principle of the helicopter.

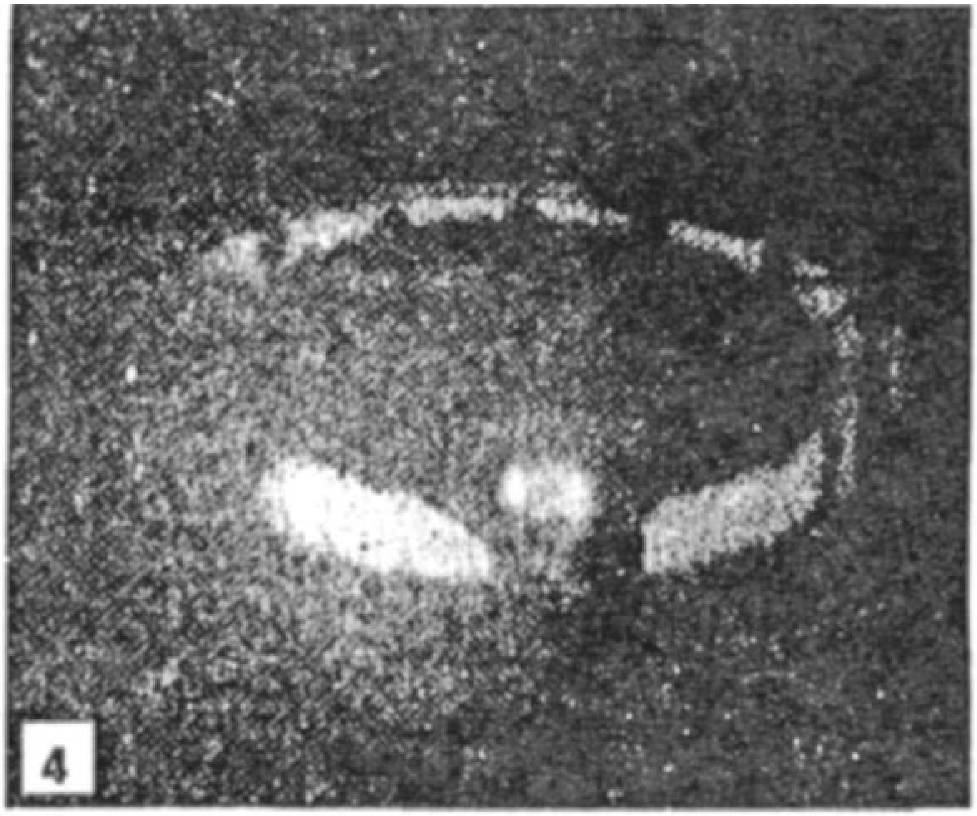
The previous few pages and some of the following ones show quite clearly the trend in U.F.O. development. Significantly some of the best photos, originated in South America and Europe. They span over 30 years.



This disc-like craft was photographed over Alberton, South Australia. Experts say it could not be an aircraft or a satelite.

Model III last known German prototype

Model III This is the final model; some experts refer to it as the Bellonzo-Schriever-Miethe Diskus. This version was produced in various sizes, some as large as 135 feet and even 225 feet in diameter. Actual speeds recorded were over 2000 km/hour. Conventional rocket motor speeds of up to 4000 km/hour were anticipated. As is clearly visible, this model already incorporated a very aerodynamic shape and for the first time also had retractable stilt-like shock absorbers. The craft is ringed by a sophisticated arrangement of tiltable directional jets which guaranteed not only a tremendously increased manoeuverability but also increased speed and better fuel utilization. The top of the craft was ringed by suction openings which had a dual purpose; a) to cool the engine and b) to create a near vacuum into which the craft could glide or ascend into with much less effort. The flight mechanic or flight technicians' compartment was retractable during high speed flying and was only lowered during slow flying or upon landing.

In this advanced, conventional, design can clearly be seen all the basic ingredients of just about every subsequent UFO type which has been sighted and photographed around the world. Undoubtedly, these models were also powered by Viktor Schauberger's flameless and smokeless implosion motors. However, to date, no German technicians who ever worked on these advanced machines have volunteered their knowledge.

We reproduce here many photographs and drawings of UFO vehicles which have been sighted and photographed and any interested UFO investogator can readily compare them with the Model III German flying saucer.

UFO'S SERIOUS BUSINESS

Unidentified flying objects - sometimes treated lightly by the press and referred to as "flying saucers" - must be rapidly and accurately identified as serious USAF business in the ZI. As AFR 200-2 points out, the Air Force concern with these sightings is threefold: First of all, is the object a threat to the defense of the U.S.? Secondly, does it contribute to technical or scientific knowledge? And then there's the inherent USAF responsibility to explain to the American people through public-information media what is going on in their skies.

The phenomenons or actual objects comprising UFO's will tend to increase, with the public more aware of goings on in space but still inclined to some apprehension. Technical and defense considerations will continue to exist in this era.

Published about three months ago, AFR 200-2 outlines necessary orderly, qualified reporting as well as public-information procedures. This is where the base should stand today, with practices judged at least satisfactory by commander and inspector:

- Responsibility for handling UFO's should rest with either intelligence, operations, the Provost Marshal or the Information Officer - in that order of preference, dictated by limits of the base organization;
- A specific officer should be designated as responsible;
- He should have experience in investigative techniques and also, if possible, scientific or technical background;
- He should have authority to obtain the assistance of specialists on the base;
- He should be equipped with binoculars, camera, Geiger counter, magnifying glass and have a source for containers in which to store samples.

What is required is that every UFO sighting be investigated and reported to the Air Technical Intelligence Center at Wright-Patterson AFB and that explanation to the public is realistic and knowledgeable. Normally that explanation will be made only by the USAF Information Office. It All adds up to part of the job of being experts in our own domain.

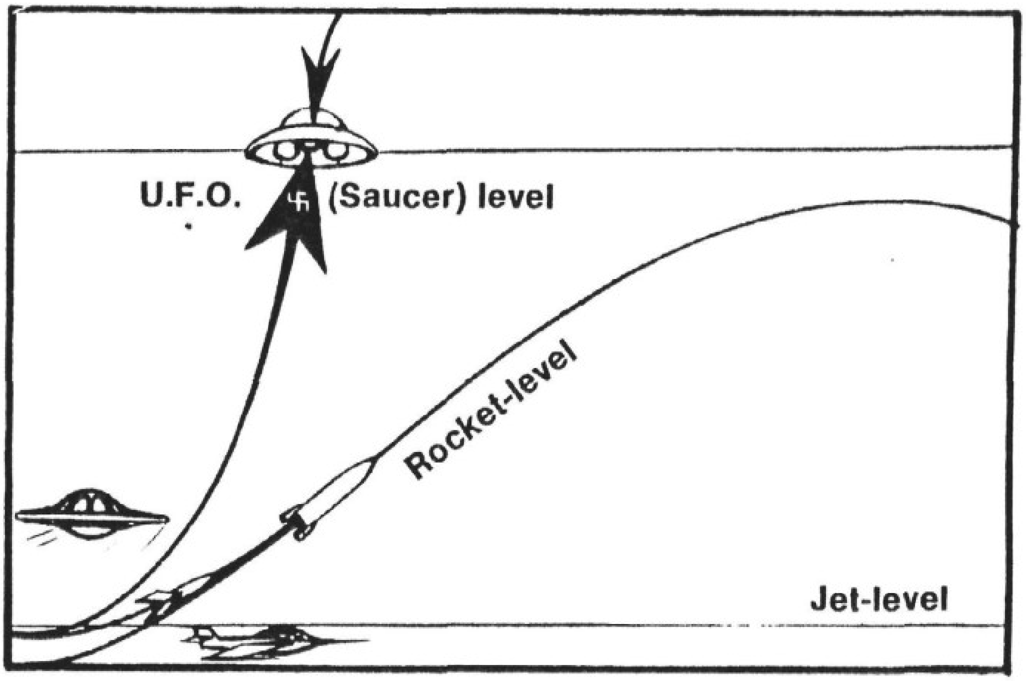
Undoubtedly, tremendous advances must have been made on these flying machines by those who knew the secret of flying saucers, and any unbiased reader must admit that the German Flying Saucer development ushered in a new age in travel. However, because of the new technology we have to ask ourselves some very searching questions.



Did the Germans have help from "real" U.F.O. people because their technology was the most advanced?

Did Hitler's scientists perform their "miracle" alone, unaided or did flying saucer "people", perhaps visitors from other galaxies give them a helping hand because they had mastered the new technology and consequently spoke the same or at least similar technological language? Could this be possible? Another question could be, did the Nazis discover some long-hidden deep secrets during their lengthy and exhaustive expeditions to the Himalayas and ancient Tibet? Intriguing and fascinating volumes have been written about these mysterious activities which had the active support and blessing of men such as Heinrich Himmler. It has been reported that the S.S. had an extremely large collection of occult books and medieval transcripts of alchemy and sorcery. Apparently over 20,000 volumes were, at one time, housed at the Ordensburg, Sonthofen, in Bavaria.

Perhaps there are elements of truth from all these stories. Did the Nazis establish secret bases in Antarctica? Did they perfect there a far-advanced flying saucer programme? Did they accidentally discover during their many expeditions that there is indeed an "Inner Earth"? (Nordic legends and Sagas have long recounted very inspiring tales of a perfect society of blue-eyed, blond Germanic giants who dwell in the inner earth). Was the world not astounded when it became known in 1945 that many of the Nazi leaders had been early members — 1918-20 — of the Secret Order of Thule!? It is known that Dietrich Eckhardt, Hitler's brilliant poet friend, had introduced him to this organization in Munich. The great expounder and father of geo-politics, Haushofer, friend and mentor of Rudolf Hess (Hitler's comrade and cell mate of Landsberg) Hess himself and Hitler were all steeped in the ancient mysteries of the Nordic world. It is therefore quite conceivable that the Nazis were the outer earth representatives of the "inner earth" or "outer space" blond, blue-eyed giants who spook through Nordic, Inca, Aztec and even North American Indian legends.

Perhaps Erich von Danniken has uncovered the tips of an iceberg? Are we about to have shattered our comfortable world picture that God created the earth in 7 days etc. etc. And so, again and again we have to come back to the same questions which can only be answered by the same answers. Every government on earth seems to be frantically engaged in suppressing the UFO story. Films are confiscated, pilots instructed to intercept and shoot to kill UFO's. People, are railroaded into hospitals and eventually insane asylums because they have seen or even been contacted by UFO's. Why? Why? Why, the UFO crews themselves give most of the answers to the questions. If they were from other planets and had come here to investigate or make contact with earthlings, they would hardly waste their precious time and tremendous expense and effort just to fly around and treat us to pulsating lights in some remote swamps or hills in the backwoods of the world. They would do what we would do if we had some crews of astronauts investigating some distant planet. Our astronauts would have been given some detailed orders, such as go and make a flypast, take photos, films and make visual observations. Test for radioactivity, air oxygen content etc. Radio and teletype all your findings back to earth and then return home. Even more conceivable would be that orders would be given for them to land, if they found conditions "bearable", and especially if they had the technology (which UFO's obviously have) and investigate everything in sight and take soil and rock samples; if you find "beings" talk with them, film them and perhaps even kidnap one.

Now let us look at how the flying saucer people have behaved:

Technologically they are certainly very advanced, move at tremendous speeds, change direction at will, (often denying every known law of motion or gravity. They can seemingly appear and disappear from human vision or radarscreens with great ease. Theoretically and also practically they could land, take samples, kidnap people and leave for home, and almost unimpeded! So we must assume the obvious. These UFO's from other planets, (and on purely a mathematical probability there are habitants on other planets), have come, have seen, have sampled and returned home. Why would any representatives of any civilization advanced enough to come the tremendous distances involved, just play cat and mouse with a few hillbillies in Mississippi? The answer is self evident, they just would not bother with such a farce and over a period of 30 years!

So there has to be an equally simple answer to why UFO's behave the way they do. They have to be either from earth itself which can only explain their lack of curiosity and also accounts for their linguistic skills. Reinhold Schmidt states the crews of the flying saucer he flew with, spoke German, and those Adamski and others met, spoke English. They apparently looked like us and pretty well behaved as we do — undoubtedly because they are "from us".

Now it is not inconceivable that in the never-ending stream of time our race has either gone from here "out there" or we have been landed here or stranded here from "out there" eons of time ago. Legends and sagas of old can supply many pointers.

Could it mean that the German nation is indeed a colony, either from the German-speaking "Saturnians" with whom Reinhold Schmidt conversed or are they the outer-earth beach head of the inner-earth civilization previously mentioned? Is this perhaps the answer to the vexing question of why the Germans are "different"? Is this the explanation for their superb performance and genius as soldiers? Are they leading the world in precision engineering and in technology because they have dwelling amongst them a disproportionate number of "Saturnians" or "Atlantians"? Could this be the reason why they always rise stronger and Phoenix-like from the ashes of defeat? Was Hitler planted on this planet earth to pull back Western civilization from the brink of degenerate self-extinction — peacefully, if at all possible — through war, if necessary?

Should the above question be answered in the affirmative, then "The Last Battalion", when the time is ripe, will spring into action. With racial strife and economic disaster looming, how far away can "Der Tag" actually be? And finally, will the "Saucer Nazis", as a last resort, invade strategic areas militarily?

Members of "The Last Battalion" are already amongst us as soldiers, labourers, teachers, students, scientists — in fact, in all walks of life. Male and female, young and old. So look at your neighbours and your friends — how many of them do you think belong to "The Last Battalion"? Time will tell!

The Air Force last night banned publication of a photograph of an unidentified flying object seen over Ohio by hundreds of persons and chased 86 miles by police.

Police Chief Gerald Buchert, of Mantua, Ohio, about 25 miles east of Cleveland, said he photographed the object from the front lawn of his home.

Buchert, according to an Associated Press dispatch, said the Air Force told him not to release the photograph or permit pictures to be taken of it. He said the object looked like "two table saucers put together."

An East Palestine, Ohio, police officer and Portage County Sheriff's Deputy W. L. Neff said they "played tag" with the mysterious object for 86 miles through eastern Ohio before losing it near Conway, Pa.

Flame-Shooting 'Phantom Plane'

Airline Pilots See 'Wingless 2-Decker'

ATLANTA, July 24.—(AP)—Two Eastern Airline pilots said they met a wingless two deck plane early today southwest of Montgomery, Ala. They said the strange ship shooting red flames and with a blue glow underneath the fuselage, passed the E. A. L. plane at ,000 feet headed toward New Orleans.

"The pilots said the stranger looked like a "Buck Rogers rocket ship."

SEEN AT 2:45 A. M.

The two pilots—Captain C. S. Childs, and co-pilot J. B. Whitted—were flying the Houston-to-Atlanta-to-Boston run. They left Houston, Tex., at 8:30 p. m. last night. This morning at 2:45 o'clock, 20 miles southwest of Montgomery they sighted the strange ship.

After reaching Atlanta at 2:49 a. m. EST., the two pilots told of their strange experience. Captain Childs said that they first sighted the object up ahead when nearing Montgomery.

"It was in line almost with our flight," he said. "We veered off to the left and the object turned to its left. When it came nearer to us, within better sight, its fuselage appeared to be about 100 feet in length and about four times the circumference of a B-29 fuselage.

2 ROWS OF WINDOWS

"It had two rows of windows, an upper and a lower. They were square. Out of the rear of the ship red flames were shooting 25 to 50 feet. There was a blue glow underneath the fuselage.

The ship appeared to be doing between 500 and 700 miles an hour, heading toward New Orleans.

"Of the 20 passengers on board Childs 9said only one was awake and saw the other ship. He gave this ppassenger's name as C. L. McKelvie, Henelton Pike, Columbus, Ohio.

The E. A. L. ship went on from Atlanta to Boston today on its regular run.

At Montgomery, Maxwell and Dannelly army fields said they knew nothing about the report.

Radar Tracks Zipping Objects Near Air Base

8-2-65

OKLAHOMA CITY (UPI)—Air Force radar tracked four unidentified flying objects zipping along in a diamond formation at high altitude in a 50-mile radius of the sprawling Tinker Air Force Base Sunday night, authorities said.

At least eight law enforcement officers spotted the objects during the two hours immediately after the first sighting report which came just before sundown.

The sightings followed by less than 48 hours a Wynnewood, Okla., policeman's report of a UFO that emitted red, white and blue light near Wynnewood. The object was tracked on two radar screens early Saturday before it disappeared and then reappeared about 29 miles south of Tinker Base, officers said.

Wynnewood is about 29 miles south of Purcell, where the UFO's first were sighted Sunday night.

The Oklahoma Highway Patrol said a security officer at Tinker informed the patrol that the base's radar picked up from one to four UFO's at various times during the evening.

The objects were moving erratically, at an altitude of about 22,000 feet, the patrol quoted the officer as saying.

A base spokesman later would neither confirm nor deny that radar had tracked the objects. He said only that the Air Force would investigate the UFO reports.

GLOWING IMP

A green, glowing object that took off at high s on Monday night in no way resembled conventional said last nig

[illegible] watched the object in flight for 10 seconds before it disappeared in cloud over Manly.

Mr. Crowe at his home in Coolong Road, Vaucluse, told a Daily Telegraph reporter last night:

"It took off with a noise like air forcibly released from a balloon.

"The noise was quite unlike any made by jet engines."

Mr. Crowe said that the object a giant disc, was bathed in a glow.

He saw no sign of movement within the craft or any portholes or doors.

He said he became aware about 5.30 p.m. on Monday of a glow coming from the beach.

He went to investigate and saw that the glow emanated from a huge disc resting on the beach.

Near disc at take-off

He was within 50 or 60 feet of the disc when it took off.

"Its diameter appeared to be about 20 feet," he said.

"I estimate its height at nine feet, including what appeared to be legs protruding from the bottom.

"Its rim was glowing a greenish blue, while the top and bottom halves were dullish silver-grey.

"A hollow in the top could have been a glass dome."

Mr. Crowe said that as the object took off, a yellow or orange glow appeared beneath.

After a take-off run of only 50 or 60 feet, the craft climbed rapidly in the direction of Manly.

"I looked around, hoping to see someone else who saw what I saw, but about a dozen or so dogs," Mr. Crowe said.

"While the object was stationary, they were all barking loudly at it.

"After it took off, they were all strangely silent."

Mr. Denis Crowe

Mr. Crowe said that when he returned home he sat down to collect his thoughts.

He had dinner, then wrote down what was still vividly in his memory, and sketched the object as he recalled it.

The sketch is reproduced above.

[Mr. Crowe, an Englishman who has been in Australia for more than four years, was formerly a technical and illustrative artist with British aircraft companies.]

"At first I wondered whether I should say anything about what I had seen," he said.

"The natural reaction of most people might label me a crackpot.

"But I could not keep silent.

"I felt I had a moral obligation to speak of what I had seen."

UFO Is Reported In Western Area

SANTA ANA, Cal. (AP)—An unidentified flying object described as round, bright and with a long orange tail was seen by scores of Southern California residents Tuesday night and by at least three airline pilots flying over Arizona's Grand Canyon.

Viewers said the object moved rapidly from west to east in about 10 to 20 seconds. It appeared to descend rapidly, they said, then it would level and disappear to the east.

Three pilots reports a similar sighting and described it as a "large ball of fire with a tail, traveling west to east."

Similar reports came in from airports at China Lake, Palmdale, and Edwards Air Force Base, Cal., and the Albuquerque, N. M., Air Route Traffic Control Center.

Huge Flying Saucer Reported Over Paris

Paris —(U.P.)— The French government sought today to solve the mystery of the "phantom of Orly" a gigantic flying-saucer-like object which whirled across the airport's radar screen at supersonic speed last Friday.

It was the third time in less than a year that the "phantom" has been charted on radarscopes at the busy international airfield outside of Paris. The object was described as about twice the size of the largest known plane, moved at times at an estimated 2,000 miles an hour, and hovered around the airport for about four hours.

Mystery Object Over Hawaii

HONOLULU (UPI)—An unidentified flying object, traveling west at a "very high altitude and a high rate of speed," was sighted by hundreds of persons in the Hawaiian islands.

Two Air National Guard pilots said they saw the object north of the island of Kauai during a routine training mission in jet fighters at an altitude of 40,000 feet. Honolulu newspapers and radio stations were flooded with calls.

Capt. Jon Parish said he thought the object was "possibly a rocket or some sort of space object flying a predetermined course." Lt. George Joy said he thought it was the Milky Way at first, but then noticed that it left a visible vapor trail.

Witnesses in Honolulu said the object looked like a crescent-shaped moon falling into the sea. They said it was bright, and some said it appeared to be on fire.

ALASKAN TELLS OF MYSTERIOUS STREAK IN SKY

KETCHIKAN, April 15.—(AP) — A mysterious reddish orange streak across the sky over Annette Island was reported to the coast guard at 2 a. m. today.

Earl Leding said he sighted what seemed to be a flaming object hurtling westward at tremendous speed as he was returning by boat from Metlakatla, the Annette Island native community.

He said he and Ray Haldane saw the streak for about 40 seconds before it disappeared.

Navy Radar Spots Mystery Objects

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 (AP). - The Air Force is investigating the reported sighting of two high-speed unidentified flying objects by Navy radar operators at Patuxent Naval Air Station, Md.

The Navy said Tuesday that the operators observed "two objects on their scope approaching at approximately 4800 miles an hour from 30 to 40 miles south" of the base at 8:30 P. M. Dec. 29.

The objects approached the naval air station, executed a tight turn and disappeared from the scope, the Navy said.

About the fastest aircraft in existence is the X-15 experimental plane, which has flown at 4104 miles an hour. The X-15 is based on the West Coast. It has a very short range.

BUENOS AIRES (UPI) — Argentine sailors at two Antarctic outposts saw a multi - colored "unidentified flying object" dawdling across the sky Saturday, the Navy Department announced Wednesday night.

"The object was discus-shaped and predominantly red and green in color, with occasional flashes of yellow, blue, orange and white. . ." The Navy announcement said.

"It was moving generally eastward, but at times it went west . . . at some moments, it appeared to hover . . .

"It was in view for 15 to 20 minutes, allowing ample time to photograph it . . . (the object) was seen by members of the naval detachments at Deception and Orcadas."

BUENOS AIRES, July 7. — (Reuters) — Argentines at two Antarctic bases have confirmed reports by British and Chilean scientists of the appearance four days ago of an unusual celestial body over the frozen subcontinent.

The object, observed and photographed by the Argentine Navy men last Saturday night, was shaped like a double-convex lens. It was colored mainly red and green, a Navy statement said.

The object made no noise, and moved generally eastward at changing speeds before disappearing.

An earlier report from a British Antarctic base said the object made geomagnetic instruments wild.

Ten-Gallon UFO Sighted at Sault

SAULT. STE. MARIE, Ont. (CP) — An unidentified flying object shaped like a "ten-gallon hat" was sighted here Friday night.

Darlene Wagner, 15, said she saw the object about 10:20 p.m., silently descending to the top of an oil storage tank across the road from her home. It landed on the oil tank.

The girl said the object was shaped like a hat, the crown glowing red, the brim blue. There were flashing blue and white lights at each edge of the "brim."

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, CALIF. (UPI)—A possibility the X15 encountered strange phenomena in space arose Thursday with scientists unable to identify a mysterious object both sighted and photographed by Maj. Bob White on a soaring flight by the rocket ship.

Scientists said Wednesday they could give no explanation whatsoever for the objects that appeared near the X15 on July 17 when White skyrocketed to a world airplane altitude record of nearly 60 miles.

"It is impossible to explain the object's presence at this time," space agency scientists said.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration, after intensively studying White's sighting report and films from a tail movie camera, on the X15, released photographs of an object that darted above and behind the plane.

The photographs, taken from the movie films, show an object that looks like a fluttering piece of paper and which scientists describe as being "grey-white."

White, from his cockpit near the nose of the rocket ship, reported seeing what looked to him like a piece of paper the size of his hand "going along with the ship" at an altitude of 270,000 feet—over 50 miles high.

Pilots Tell Of Saucers Flying In Formation

MIAMI, July 16.—(UP)—Two veteran air-line pilots added to the flying-saucer lore today accounts of seeing eight huge discs zipping in formation at supersonic speed near Norfolk, Va.

W. B. Nash, 35, and W. H. Fortenberry, 30, pilots of Pan American Airways, said the "glowing, orange-red" saucers maneuvered oo sharply for human endurance at a speed of "far above 1,000 miles per hour."

"Whoever was in those things," he pilots declared, "had capabiliies far beyond our own. Those hings absolutely did not contain any human being as we know hem."

Nash and Fortenberry said they were flying their DC-4 with ten company officials aboard southward between Newport News, Va., and Norfolk Monday night when he saucers appeared 6,000 feet below them, at about 2,000 feet altitude.

Mystery object

SANTA MARIA, Azores (UPI) — An airport spokesman Saturday said a mysterious flying object apparently stopped all electro-magnetic watches at the Santa Maria Airport when it flew slowly over this island Friday. He said a white cylindrical object was seen flying northwest at an altitude of 33,000 feet and attempts to identify it were unsuccessful.

Pilot believes he saw manned space-ship

Evening Press 23/9/59

THE pilot of a Pan-American airliner, flying almost four miles up between New York and Paris, this morning, reported that he sighted what he believed was a space ship with people on board.

In a brief message from the clipper, Captain J. Cone, said it was visible for only 30 seconds and that the object had vertical tail fins. It was travelling very fast in a south-westerly direction between the stars, Elnath and Castor.

The message was flashed to a U.S. coastguard cutter.

There were 119 people including 12 crew members on board the jet liner, which later landed at Paris. It was flying at an altitude of 20,000 feet when the object was sighted.

Gave position

Other brief details given in the message gave the object's position as 53.40 degrees north, 58 degrees west, which would be slightly north-east of Goose Bay, Newfoundland, about 2,000 miles west of Ireland.

The report has set off speculation in international circles studying space aeronautics, the dominant view being that it was a secret Russian attempt to send men to outer space, probably to the moon.

It is expected that a report will be sent to the United States Government for investigation.

On DEW line

The object was sighted almost on the D.E.W. line, the distant early warning radar screen which protects the entire north-west coast of America and Canada from attack.

Mystery Object Buzzes Planes

TOKYO, March 21 (Reuters). —Two Japanese civilian pilots reported their planes were buzzed Thursday by an unidentified flying object, an air safety officer in southwestern Japan said Sunday.

A spokesman for the Air Safety office at Takamatsu on Shikoku Island said the planes were a Convair 240 airliner and a private Piper Apache plane.

The newspaper Mainichi Shimbun quoted the airliner pilot as saying an object about 15 yards in diameter and radiating a greenish luminescence approached the plane at about 20 miles an hour, wheeled abruptly and flew alongside for about three minutes before making off.

Unidentified Objects Sighted by Astronauts

SPACE CENTER, Houston, Tex., Dec 4 (AP)—Twice in the early part of their space flight, astronauts Frank Borman and James Lovell reported seeing objects that were not explained immediately. On the second orbit, Borman said, "We have a bogey at 10 o'clock high."

There was some static in the transmission and the space center had to ask three times for explanation. Borman said they could see the spacecraft booster "as a brilliant body against the sun," slowly tumbling and that three of four miles ahead of the spacecraft there were "what looks like hundreds of little particles."

In addition, he said, there was the "bogey." That's an airman's term for another object.

On the third revolution, while burning fuel to raise the orbit, Lovell reported "we hit something."

Space Center: "You hit something during the burn?"

Lovell: "Something came forward by the right window. Look-

British Radar Tracks Air 'Object'

LONDON, Nov. 19.—(AP)—An object described by observers as huge and glowing and probably metallic has been tracked by radar high over England twice this month, the War Office disclosed last night.

Official reports of the sightings have been made by members of two army radar crews. They estimated that the object's altitude was 60,000 feet.

The reports were on November 3. The first report said the object was kept in sight from 2:30 to 3:10 p. m. A similar report was made that day by two flying officers of the Royal Air Force. They were at 20,000 feet in a jet plane, they said, when the object passed far overhead at "tremendous speed."

UFOs Spotted In Minnesota

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — Unidentified Flying Objects were spotted over parts of Minnesota and North Dakota Monday night.

Dozens of police officers on patrol between 12:20 and 2:30 a. m. reported sightings in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area. According to various reports, the objects "bobbed, dipped, hovered, stopped, jerked along and sped away."

An officer in suburban Shorewood radioed his dispatcher: "Boys, I hope you don't think I'm crazy, but I just got passed by a star."

The airport control tower said it had seen nothing on radar. The tower said also that a number of B-52 military aircraft were in the area.

Sky Object Tracked by AFB Radar

OKLAHOMA CITY (UPI) — Tinker Air Force Base officials reported tracking an unidentified flying object by radar early Saturday before it suddenly disappeared.

'Saucers' Fly Beside Plane

DETROIT — (UPI) — The pilot of an American Airlines DC-6 passenger plane said Wednesday three mysterious objects that looked like shining saucers appeared to accompany the plane for 45 minutes last night on its nonstop flight from Newark, N. J., to Detroit.

Capt. Peter Killian of Syosset, N. Y., who has flown passenger planes for 15 years, said "I have never seen anything like it before."

Killian said other members of the crew and the 35 passengers also saw the flying objects. The plane left Newark at 7:10 p.m.

KILLIAN and co-pilot John Dee of Nyack, N. Y., said they lost the three strange objects in the haze when they started their descent for landing at Detroit's Metropolitan Airport while the plane was over Cleveland, Ohio.

The three bright whitish lights first were sighted while the plane was flying at 8,500 feet between Philipsburg and Bradford, Pa.

Flying saucer 'hisses'

Men on the tarmac at London Airport were certain last night that they saw a flying saucer. One described it—"white, with a blue flame from its tail. Speed about 600 miles an hour, and it hissed."

But control tower officials neither saw it nor heard the hiss.

Radar Crews Get Solid Fix on UFOs

HOUGHTON (Mich.)—(UPI)—Personnel at the U.S. Air Force radar base in the Keweenan Peninsula yesterday reported "solid radar contact" with seven to 10 unidentified flying objects moving in a "V" formation over Lake Superior.

The objects were moving out of the southwest and were heading north - northeast at about 9,000 miles per hour, the men said. They were 5,200 to 17,000 feet high.

One of the men at the base said three other radar stations, in North Dakota, Minnesota and Luther Air Station in Canada, also reported spotting the objects. He said another station reported electronic jamming of its radar.

Seven other objects were spotted over Duluth and jet interceptors gave chase, he said, but they could not maintain the speed of the UFO's and were easily outdistanced.

The radar personnel, Air Force enlisted men, asked that their names not be disclosed.

2 SOUTH AFRICAN POLICEMEN REPORT SIGHTING OF 'SAUCER'

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa—South African police and scientists investigated Thursday a report that a flying saucer-type object had landed on a main highway near Pretoria, the country's administrative capital.

Two patrolling police officers reported seeing the flaming "saucer," about 30 feet in diameter, shortly after midnight. One of them, Koos de Klerk, said that the shiny copper-colored object resembled a giant spinning top.

The two men claimed that, as they approached the object, it took off silently at great speed with flames shooting out of its underside.

Scientists who examined the spot where the officers said that they saw the object were reported to have found that a six-foot wide section of the tarred road had been badly burned. Grass on either side of the highway also was reported slightly scorched.

In Conquest of Cosmos

Earthlings, Planet Men To Join Forces, Red Says

London, Sept. 29 (AP).—A Russian scientist predicted today that space-probing earthlings eventually would meet up with beings from other worlds.

And together they would go on to conquer the cosmos.

"Soviet science already commands the means to send cosmic rockets to Mars and Venus," claimed Moscow radio.

To be sure of getting to Venus a rocket will have to be set off precisely at 11.5 kilometers (7.46 miles) per second—"somewhat greater" than the speed of Russia's rocket which hit the moon, the broadcast said.

In man's conquest of the cosmos, Moscow radio reported, astronomer Feliks Segal believes the space travelers first will colonize the moon.

Then they will conquer the rest of the planets. Finally they will venture forth into other solar systems.

In a broadcast beamed to North America, Moscow radio said the moon at present was no place for man to make a home. It has no atmosphere and man could not breathe there. Daytime temperatures rise to 130 degrees centigrade but the nights are unbearably cold, the thermometer dropping to minus 160 degrees.

Moscow radio said one Russian scientist estimates that one inhabited planetary system must exist for every million stars.

"Consequently there must be about 150,000 inhabited planetary systems in our galaxy.

"On some of them life exists in lower forms. But there must be planets, too whose inhabitants may even be higher than man in point of development.

"Some of them may even have begun to make flights into space. Therefore we should have meetings with them.

"If such meetings do take place, they may result in the co-ordination of the efforts of man and these other intelligent beings in the great work of combating the elemental forces of nature."

Says 'saucers' seen in Far North

By JOHN LESTER
Staff Writer

Unidentified Flying Objects, more commonly known as Flying Saucers, again have been seen "maneuvering and landing" in Northern Alaska and the North Pole area, UFO authority Lee R. Munsick of Morristown told members of the Denville Rotary Club yesterday.

Speaking at a luncheon meeting at the Rockaway River Country Club, Munsick, formerly assistant director of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena, told Rotariansm these most recent sightings in the Frozen North took place within t ehpast two weeks, "as nearly as can be determined at this time."

The Alaskan sighting involved a single disc-type craft that was seen by a small party of trappers about 200 miles east of Umiat, Munsick said.

The men estimated the UFO was about two miles away when they first noticed it, Munsick reported, that it rose and descended to within a few feet of the ground several times, then flew slowly in a tight circle before disappearing.

They described it as "red colored."

Munsick attributed this to the fact that there are numerous instances on record of UFOs' glowing when in motion, a deep orange at low speeds, nearly white at high speeds.

The Polar sighting was made by two Norwegian soldiers, although no further details are available.

The Norwegian embassy, Munsick said, claimed to have no record of this sighting but added that all information on UFOs and their sightings were considered classified.

This latest North Pole sighting is at least the fourth in which members of the Norwegian military have figured as far as is known, the speaker said.

In September, 1955, he recalled, a representative of the Norwegian Gneral Staff revealed that "special details" assigned to observe the Arctic region "are now convinced" it was being used as a base by UFOs, especially during bad weather "when we are forced back to our bases."

WE ALL KNOW UFOs ARE REAL, SAID THE ASTRONAUT!

The question is, he added, where do they come from?

Massive Ordnance Air Blast (MOAB) is a non-nuclear US Air Force super-bomb.

The etymology and original meaning of the name Moab is unknown. The word is foreign to Hebrew. In the Old Testament Moab is the name of the incestuous son of Lot (Genesis 19:37). In the Plains of Moab, opposite Jericho (Numbers 22:1 ; 26:63 ; Joshua 13:32), the children of Israel had their last encampment before they entered the land of Canaan. Moses died in the land of Moab (Deuteronomy 34:5 Deuteronomy 34:6).

The MOAB bomb was developed by Albert L. Weimorts of the United States Air Force. In German the word wei denotes white. In French the word mort denotes death. Weimort = White death. [2]

"The society of the spectacle had begun everywhere in coercion, deceit, and blood, but it promised a happy path...

"Now it no longer says: 'What appears is good, what is good appears.' It simply says, 'It is so.' It admits frankly that it is no longer essentially reformable, though change be its very nature in order to transmute for the very worst every particular thing. It has lost all its general illusions about itself."

The Society of the Spectacle
Preface to the Fourth Italian Edition

"Debord's early distinction between the concentrated and diffuse forms of spectacular organization is abandoned in favor of a single category: the integrated spectacle...'When the spectacle was concentrated, the greater part of surrounding society escaped it; when diffuse, a small part; today, nothing. The spectacle has spread itself to the point where it now permeates all reality...this reality no longer confronts the integrated spectacle as something alien...

"Possessing 'all the means necessary to falsify...perception,' the spectacle 'is the absolute master of memories just as it is the unfettered master of plans which shape the most distant future.'

"...Debord argued that the 'vague feeling that there had been a rapid invasion which forced people to lead their lives in an entirely different way is now widespread...many see it...as something inevitable...the cycles of...simulation..."

Sadie Platt
The Most Radical Gesture

"For Facebook and Google and Instagram and Twitter, the business goal quickly became maximizing and monetizing human attention via addictive dopamine hits. Attention, they meticulously found, is correlated with emotional intensity, outrage, shock and provocation. Give artificial intelligence this simple knowledge about what distracts and compels humans, let the algorithms do their work, and the profits snowball. The cumulative effect — and it's always in the same incendiary direction — is mass detachment from reality...

"With each passing second online, news stories, graphic videos, incendiary quotes, and outrages demonstrate their stunning utility to advertisers as attention seizers, are endlessly tweaked and finessed by AI to be even more effective, and thereby prime our brains for more of the same. They literally restructure our minds...

"And if you live in such a madhouse all the time, you will become mad. You don't go down a rabbit-hole; your mind increasingly is the rabbit hole — rewired that way by algorithmic practice...But the thing about algorithms and artificial intelligence is that they don't rest, they have no human flaws, they exploit every weakness we have, and have already taken over. This is not a future dystopia in which some kind of AI robot takes power and kills us all. It is a dystopia already here — burrowed into our minds, literally disabling the basic mental tools."

Preface

"It was (Martin) Heidegger who first had the audacity to trace the accumulating ills of modern society to a steady deterioration of human sensibilities with regard to the wonder of things in their sheer radiant existence, the miracle of Being that gives all things that are.

"The cultures of the West gradually lost their capacity to mediate and develop this sensibility, the core of truly human existence; the consequent hollowing out of our traffic with beings is manifest both in the way our care for what is has curdled into the manipulation of things as tools, and in the way our communities have devolved into impersonal structures of social management and exploitation. All this, as a result of a fall away from the authentic expression of Being..." [3]

This work, Twilight Language, could perhaps serve as a transcendent voyage to a reawakened comprehension of how our experience of Creation has been purloined, and how our human being can be restored.

The acquisition of comprehension leading to an "authentic expression of being," is possible, but so arduous and daunting given our inhabitation in and of this time, that it is mainly, if not exclusively, a blessing bestowed by grace unearned, rather than a titanic labor undertaken by ubermenschen.

And as the smart ship grew
In stature, grace, and hue,
In shadowy silent distance grew the Iceberg too. [4]

In these pages we are engaged in the study of the nature of reality, in search of a counter-modern retrieval of radiant human being amidst the wonders of Creation, against the defection encoded in and abetted by Twilight Language which, in a preponderance of cases, is a departure from authentic apprehension and expression of verisimilitude, into a degraded burlesque of communication which repudiates the ontological search for knowledge of ourselves as images of the divine, within the natural world of wonder.

[3] Paul DeHart, Aquinas and Radical Orthodoxy, p. 6

[4] Thomas Hardy, "The Convergence of the Twain"

Human beings have been partakers of this debased language which has been codified by the western secret societies such as the early Rosicrucians, and further eroded by post-modern advertising, radio, "rock," cinema, Internet and news media. Inside this psychic pressure cooker, true apprehension of Being and Creation is rendered unobtainable. As a consequence of this Intentional Processing, men and women are radically diminished — experiencing the reduction of their existence to the level of post-human consumers of imitation phenomena, rather than instauration as imago Dei living the immanence of divine creation.

The decay is reflected in indices of rising levels of loss of memory and cognitive acuity, divorce, abortion, suicide and "random violence," as well as in our profound disengagement from human relationships and communion, amidst an artificial world simulated by signs conveying constant messages of avarice, degeneration, incapacity, sterility and death.

Twilight Language is the visible spectrum of the occult imperative. It is rendered invisible through our willful forgetfulness — the price we pay to maintain a sliver of comfort and self-satisfaction within the sorcerous system of things.

Consumption of the knowledge and branding of Twilight Language (as opposed to the study and analysis of its function as neuro-linguistic programming), is an act of enthrallment, not liberation. Participants in The Process situate greater knowledge of Twilight Language in a continuum of thrilling jolts to their seriously impaired and dulled autonomic nervous systems, like narcotic addicts who increase their dosage to obtain the same level of serenity first experienced with the ingestion of a lower dose.

Consequently, this book can either be an empowering map for sleuths seeking emancipation from simulation, or a further descent into psychological and spiritual bondage on the part of those who partake of this writing mainly to obtain a more thrilling shock of recognition concerning their own demise — a shock that will eventually dissipate and require yet another unprecedented jolt, and then another, and another…

Many of the people stewed in morbid conspiracy theory suffer the effects of the mental contagion they imagine they are decoding. The Process ends when the nervous system becomes too anesthetized and stupefied to experience further stimulation. This is the Black Jack state of 2(00)1.

Theater of the Clown Priests of Zuni

"...the clowns--priests annually elected from the membership of the Kâ'-kâ, and disguised as monsters, with warty, wen-eyed, pucker-mouthed pink masks and mud-bedaubed equally pink bodies. First appear the dancers, some fifty of them, costumed and masked with such similarity that individuals are as indistinguishable as the birds or the animals they conventionally represent are from each other. Large-jawed and staring-eyed demons of one kind or another marshal them into the open plaza of the village under the guidance of a sedate unmasked priest bearing sacred relies and prayer-meal. One of the demons sounds a rattle and howls the first clause in the song stanza; then all fall into line, all in equal time sing the weird song, and go through the pantomime and dance which invariably illustrate its theme.

"When four verses have been completed, the actors, bathed in perspiration, retire to their estufa to rest and pray, while the priest-clowns appear with drum, cabalistic prayer-plumes and the paraphernalia of guess-games.

"They begin the absurdest, most ingenious and witty of buffoonery and raillery, generally managing, nevertheless, to explain during their apparently nonsensical dialogues, the full meanings of the dance and song — the latter being often couched in archaic or jargonistic terms utterly incomprehensible to others than the initiated among the audience..." Prologue

A Black Jack Progression: 2(00)1 — (20)21

This book is not a how-to manual to prevent being alchemically processed by the Cryptocracy. One cannot prevent a disease that has already metastasized. Neither is it a "wakeup call." Since the Gateway Year 2001, the majority of Americans have been processed as initiates. They are "Masons on sight," i.e. members of the secret society without knowing it.

A "wakeup call' presupposes that people are asleep. They are only partly so. In their waking stages they intuit that the Cryptocracy in the United States engages in human sacrifice and occult process. This thrills them and they keenly anticipate more thrills.

At this stage in history, America is a carnival-sideshow thrilldrome and "We the People" vie for a front row seat. Eternal salvation, the pursuit of truth and freedom—all that takes a back seat, despite the rhetoric.

The alchemical processing of humanity is ahead of schedule. People are becoming less human and far more numb and easily misdirected, as the Reign of Dead Matter appears on the horizon.

Reality, facts and truth are dispensable in the high echelons of the Cryptocracy. Sorcery entails a calculus in which reality, facts and truth are whatever the sorcerer declares them to be.

According to allegations in Ariel Sabar's book Veritas: A Harvard Professor, a Con Man and the Gospel of Jesus's Wife (Random House, 2020), one of the principals who was allegedly instrumental in promoting the "Jesus Had a Wife" papyrus fragment hoax, was Karen King, Hollis Professor of Divinity at Harvard University. In a review of Sabar's book, James Lasdun states concerning King's alleged co-conspirators in the hoax:

"She had little interest in hearing what Sabar had found out...Nor did she offer any mea culpas when her fragment was discredited. You could read this as the product of a lofty post modern sensibility, unbound by crude categories of true and false. King's statements over the years certainly support that. 'History is not about truth but about power relations,' she wrote in one paper. Sticklers for the former were guilty of 'fact fundamentalism.'

"But such relativism, for her, was never an end in itself. It was always in the service of a larger goal, and from the beginning of her career that goal was unabashedly religious...A gospel revealing Mary Magdalene as not just Jesus's disciple but also his wife would restore...forfeited sexuality. If it turned out to be genuine, so much the better. But even if it didn't, might it not do some good all the same..." [6]

In the non-Gnostic, orthodox Christian theology of the Bible this legerdemain falls under two categories. The first is mendacium officiosum (the officious lie; the helpful lie; lying "for our own good" to "assist us into illumination").

Jacob conveyed to his father Isaac the "helpful" lie that he was his first born son (Genesis 27:19). The seventeenth century theologian Thomas Brooks notes that Jacob told Isaac an officious lie, after which: "Jacob hardly ever had a merry day, a good day after it; for God followed him with a variety of troubles, and his sorrows came posting in, one after another, even to his dying day, that both himself and others might see what bitterness is wrapped up in officious lies...(St.) Augustine stoutly asserts that we are not to tell an officious lie though it were to save all the world....

"Nepos reported of Epaminondas, a nobleman of Thebes and a famous warrior, that he would never lie in jest nor in earnest, either for his own or another's gain. This refined heathen will one day rise in judgment against such kind of Christians who take a pleasure in officious lies."

The most common occult lie is mendacium perniciosum, pernicious lying intended to defraud or cheat. There is no occult imperium without rampant mendacium perniciosum. If it is successfully conducted it becomes a "truth" of consensus "reality." This is the might-is-right winner's creed. The Christian counter-culture says otherwise: it is better to be a loser in this world than a liar. Jeremiah loathed and abominated liars to such an extent that he chose to live in the wilderness than among them (Jeremiah 9:2-8).

[6] James Lasdun, London Review of Books, September 24, 2020, p. 8. The New York Times lent support to the papyrus hoax, cf. Times, September 19, 2012. The "Jesus Had a Wife" papyrus fragment was allegedly forged and conceived by Walter Fritz, a German-American, who, according to Mr. Sabar's book, produced "hot wife" pornographic films starring Fritz's wife, a series of men, and on occasion, Fritz himself. Mrs. Fritz "had her own website that jointly celebrated 'sluthood,' and, of all things, the teachings of Jesus. The latter are given a distinctly Gnostic spin: 'That's why Jesus says: The Kingdom of Heaven Is Within You! It means: find your own reality within, then you will know it all.' References to Aleister Crowley...and even Karen King's translation of the Gospel of Mary, appear in the couple's online writings and videos." (Lasdun, p. 6).

What is “the Reign of Dead Matter”? Is it “inevitable”?

In the summer of 2020 Elon Musk expressed anxiety to Maureen Dowd of the New York Times over the possibility that Silicon Valley oligarchs may be “summoning the demon.” In this connection he informed Dowd that he believed machines will surpass human intelligence before 2025, at which time “things” will start to “get...weird.” [7]

Machines = Dead Matter.

“Inevitable”? Can the present be colonized by “the future”? If so, then yes. But what is the future if not a unit of measurement of time, and as Frank Wilczek has observed, “…measurement is a disruptive process, which disturbs the thing being measured.”

Concerning His followers, Jesus Christ proclaimed, “He that believeth on me, the works that I do, shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do...” (John 14:12). Jesus must have had very few actual followers in the America of the twentieth century, because after the Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter (atomic incineration) at the 33rd degree Trinity Site in New Mexico (the “Land of Enchantment”), in 1945, it was the Killing of the King rite at masonic Dealey Plaza, near the Triple Underpass and on the 32nd degree of north parallel latitude, on November 22, 1963, that catapulted our nation into a psychic Oz from which we have yet to emerge. The virtuoso managers of the once-and-future-America-as-crime-scene, have gone from victory to victory, in what until recently was supposed to have been “a Christian nation.”

If this writer has learned anything over the course of more than forty years of sleuthing secret languages and coded messages, mass shootings and serial killings, it is that a unit of the Cryptocracy inside the United States government propitiates dark forces with human sacrifices, such as occurred with Son of Sam, Hillside Strangler, Double Initial, Columbine High School, the Aurora Colorado theater, and in Las Vegas, in front of the shimmering pomps and sleazy props of Pharaonic Egypt.

[7] New York Times, July 25, 2020. In the play and movie "Harvey" by Mary Chase, a character named Dowd has an evanescent fairy companion, a giant rabbit who renders him invulnerable to harm.

Law enforcement in this country did not arrest and convict the actual killers of John or Bobby Kennedy, Martin Luther King or Malcolm X. The elite perpetrators of the September 11, 2001 attacks, the rapists and suffocaters of the little girls of Rochester, New York; the planners of the Aurora shootings, the perps and commanders of the Las Vegas mass-murder, have all walked free.

Except for the Swartzentruber Amish and members of cognate "primitive" Anabaptist groups, certain non-Amish off-grid wilderness folks, and that rare breed who can live in a city without being of the city, the vast majority of those who reside in North America, the British isles, Ireland, Europe, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, are occult-processed to such an extent that they have the status of occult initiates.

The masses of people have been immersed in enough twilight language communication that many can see it for what it is, though in most cases they will not admit this to themselves or others.

This is not a book of who to blame for this state of affairs: Jews, blacks, immigrants, rednecks, Rothschilds or Republicans. The "blame," if one may use such a word in this context, is fairly evenly distributed among the millions of human beings who choose to comprise the United States of Amnesia, of Apathy; of eerie indifference.

"Just a Little Bit Crazy"

Howling Madness Spouted After Sept. 11, 2001

"We Have Forgotten How to Hate"

"Today I will surprise you by complaining about how we have forgotten how to hate. The proper response to the cowardly brutes who perpetrated the horrific attacks against America is to hate them with every fiber of our being and purge ourselves of any morsel of sympathy which might seek to understand their motives. The only way to react to incorrigible evil is to wage an incessant war against it...and to hope they find no rest, neither in this world nor in the next...the purpose of our hatred is not revenge, but preservation of justice...we track them down because G-d at Sinai entrusted us with the promotion of justice, turning the jungle into a civilized society....

"Only if we hate the truly evil passionately will we summon the determination to fight them fervently. Odd and uncomfortable as it may seem, hatred has its place...Let us make sure, therefore, that we never make the mistake of forgiving those whose sin is so inextricably woven with their rotten character that the two can never be separate."

— Shmuel Boteach, the Lubavitcher Rabbi of Oxford University.

Americans Will Welcome a Police State

"Probes from the 1970s investigations led by Sen. Frank Church...have crippled intelligence gathering and covert operations...Human intelligence capabilities suffered as CIA agents wishing to pose as journalists or recruit informants with criminal backgrounds face a daunting internal approval process...unshackle our intelligence agencies.

"The absurd rules aimed at...preventing U.S. involvement in assassinations have no place...Americans will greet wider surveillance, detention for questioning...and many other precautions with relief and unified public support."

— Daniel J. Popeo, Washington Legal Foundation

Don't Rule Out Using Nuclear Weapons

"In the excellent words of Paul Wolfowitz, deputy secretary of defense, we must 'end states who sponsor terrorism.'...It must be fought with the most effective weapons we possess (a few weeks ago, Rumsfeld refused, correctly, to rule out nuclear weapons). And it must be fought in a manner that secures victory as quickly as possible...regardless of the countless innocents caught in the line of fire. These innocents suffer and die because of the action of their own government in sponsoring the initiation of force against America..."

— Leonard Peikoff, Ayn Rand Institute, in a full page advertisement published in the New York Times, October 2, 2001.

Ally with Drug Cartels and the Russian Mafia

"We need to be really focused, really serious, and just a little bit crazy...terrorists and their supporters need to know that from here forward we will do whatever it takes...it takes a home-grown network to destroy a home-grown network...

"Actually, we would enlist the drug cartels. They have the three attributes we need: they know how to operate as a covert network and how to root out a competing network, such as Mr. bin Laden's. They can be bought and know how to buy others.

"And they understand that when we say we want someone 'dead or alive' we mean 'dead or dead.'

"The Cali cartel doesn't operate in Afghanistan. But the Russian mafia sure does, as do various Afghan factions, drug rings...Something tells me Mr. Putin, the Russian president and former K.G.B. spymaster, has the phone number of the guy in the Russian mafia who knows the guy in the Afghan cartels who knows the guy who...knows where Mr. bin Laden is hiding.

"It is going to be that kind of war...an underground network you fight with moles and exterminators....right now is the season of hunting down people..."

— Thomas Friedman, New York Times columnist, winner of the National Book Award and the Pulitzer Prize. New York Times, September 28, 2001.

The Twin Tower Game of 21

"The appearance of the Sentinel from '2001' at the beginning of the year 2001 and the century it symbolizes (the 21st), marks the symbolic end of the preparatory-processing phase intended to program us into accepting the appearance of the devil himself as our presiding Overlord...The process...culminates in a hermetic game of hazard or 'chance,' 21..This principle corresponds to...the 2001 gateway to the '21' epoch." Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare 2001, published July 2001, pp. 15-16.

The attack on the World Trade Center is represented in the Rider-Waite Tarot cards by the number 16 Tower card, and the attack on the five-sided Pentagon by the Tarot's number five of Pentacles. Sixteen plus five equals twenty-one.

The Rider-Waite Tarot deck was first published in 1910 by Rider and Co. in Great Britain. It was designed by the English Freemason Arthur Edward Waite (1857-1943). Waite was the author of The Holy Kabbalah: A Mystical Interpretation; A New Encyclopedia of Freemasonry, and The Secret Tradition in Freemasonry: An Analysis of the Inter-Relation Between the Craft and the High Grades. Waite was one of the founders of the Order of the Golden Dawn.

The number 16 assigned to the Tower card symbolizes the so-called sectio aurea ("Golden Section"), Golden Ratio or Golden Number, known as Phi (after the 21st letter in the Greek alphabet).

Since the early Greeks, a ratio of length to width of approximately 1.6 has been considered the most aesthetically pleasing in the construction of monumental architecture. Fibonacci numbers are also anchored by 1.6. The ratio of successive Fibonacci numbers gets continuously closer to this "Golden Ratio of Phi." No matter what two numerical values are used, if Fibonacci terms are employed to continue the series, the ratio of the two terms will always be the Golden Ratio of 1.6 etc.

The same is true for the Lucas numbers: 1, 3, 4, 7, 11, 18, 29, 49 etc. The Lucas sequence is made in the same manner as Fibonacci numbers. One obtains each number by adding together the two previous (1 + 3 = 4; 3+ 4 = 7 etc.). If we take pairs of Lucas numbers and divide the higher by the lower we get the same first two 1 6 numbers every time: 18/11 = 1.6363.

29/18 = 1.6111. 47/29 = 1.6206, ever more progressively approaching the Golden Mean (1.6180339887).

In other words, all of these mathematical roads lead to the basic building block of 1.6, which the Kabbalist Waite represented as 16 in his depiction of the downfall of the Grand Architect's construction, i.e. the fall of the Tower of Babel and all subsequent Babels.

All that goes up must eventually come down, but in most cases the fall is the slow crumbling of decay. Whereas, what is built with god-like conceit—the occult "Edifice Complex"—will fall catastrophically. If Freemasons know this, then why do they continue to propitiate their "Grand Architect" and their rivalry with God? We would answer, conceit does not necessarily imply ignorance. The greatest deviltry is performed fully conscious of the consequences. Truth or consequences = the 33rd degree.

The downfall of the tower in the inferno of September 11 (9/11) is the 911 emergency call to the psyche of the Group Mind, unleashing imprisoned energy. A burst of illuminated consciousness was released on 9/11. Properly channeled and directed, this Group Mind energy is harnessed to produce conditions for the imposition of an even more enormous and conceited tower. Every successive Babel is more towering than the previous one, thus does the imposing empire of the Grand Architect "build bigger" from out of the ruins of the old.

The only thing not destroyed in the towering inferno is the principle that built it, symbolized by the number 11, which stays the same even when written upside down. This principle is further elaborated in alchemical imagery by the salamander, the legendary creature that paradoxically thrives in fire.

At the other end of the equation is the five-sided Pentagon, representing both the cosmic force of the five-pointed "blazing star" which, according to Scottish Rite Supreme Commander Albert Pike symbolizes for the Freemasons the "dog star" Sirius, and which was personified in Egypt as Set-An (Satan); as well as by the door through which Set-an's power manifests on earth, in the form of the exploitation of the feminine principle of "wounded but undying Nature," under the occult veil of Isis: she who bleeds and is not injured; she who bleeds and does not die. The divine menstruant is represented numerically by the mean number of days in the menstrual cycle, five.

The union of the exploding phallic tower (16) and the wounded but functioning pentagon (5) comprises an equation totaling 21, e.g. the point in the flow of time where the process manifests—the 2(00)1 gateway to the 21st century epoch—the age appointed for the corporeal manifestation of the Overlord in “masonic progression”: from twenty years ago in 2001, to 2021, where the Overlord walks among us only partially concealed under a flimsy and threadbare cloak which is becoming progressively more transparent, and whose civic acceptance is prophesied to be virtually universal.

According to Gordon Moog of the United Supreme Grand Chapter of Mark and Royal Arch Masons, "The symbolism of Passing the Veils is that enlightenment which comes from Masonic progression...the entire object of alchemic art 'is the uncovering of the inner faculty of insight and wisdom and the removal of the veils intervening between the mind, and dividing it from its hidden Divine root'...the lifting of each veil is accomplished by giving a password..."

This magnum opus represents a departure from the incremental processing of the masses which has hitherto, with a few spectacular exceptions, been the Cryptocracy's modus operandi. Recently it became the process of conditioning through climax, where timing is key. It was necessary to initiate an anti-climax, a planetary false alarm in the form of the Y2K panic, which hundreds of millions of people were duped into believing:

"In relation to the end of one millennium and the beginning of the new one, we see the familiar outline of anti-climax and climax. A legion of false prophets and con-men, who wore an anti-Establishment mantle, but whose views were trumpeted by the Establishment, predicted financial collapse in 1999 and the 'end of civilization as we know it' in 2000, and these soothsayers raised both the physiological and psychological adrenaline of the masses, in some cases to fever pitch in what became an anti-climax of the apocalypse.

"...But the Cryptocracy had rather clearly, through the medium of its anointed prophets, such as Arthur C. Clarke, signaled to initiates and those percipients whose alertness is sufficient to qualify them as self-initiates, that 2001 would serve as the climax entry point for the epoch of human alchemy..." [8]

The miscued goyim, with their charlatan Nostradamus, were paralyzed as they passively spectated at the end of 1999 and the dawn of 2000, looking for discernment concerning the future of nature. The 2001 advertising slogan of the giant, Frankenfood agri-business, ADM (Archer-Daniels Midland) gives an initiate's hint at the deterministic contours of the Merlinesque "inevitability" game that is being played. Their corporate motto is, "ADM: The Nature of the Future."

[8] Hoffman, Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare, p. 13.

Writing in April 2001 (and published in the July edition of Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare), we analyzed the making of the atomic bomb from the point of view of occult ceremony. We further cited the propagation of the theory of evolution in fashioning the Cryptocracy's degraded "New Man." In the aftermath of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Evolutionism's high-priest, Harvard Prof. Stephen Jay Gould, used atomic terminology to refer to the ruins of the Trade Center as "ground zero" and to make reference to "the largest human structure ever destroyed in a catastrophic moment." (New York Times, September 26, 2001).

Prof. Gould's arcane "ground zero" cue, (which is now the standard term for the devastated Trade Center site), leads us to a key dictum of atomic physics, the point at which Merlin meets Einstein, "Time relations among events are assumed to be first constituted by the specific physical relations obtaining between them."

This dictum is Camelot arcana restated in scientific jargon, thereby making it more palatable to the post-modern mentality that would scoff at Merlin but embrace Einstein. The underlying principle is the same, however: "...to orient us to the space-time conjunction necessary to the maintenance of the once-and-future inevitability of the Cryptocracy's Camelot allegory." [9]

Gould's imagery recalls that other "largest human structure ever destroyed in a catastrophic moment," the Tower of Babel. Perhaps he was covertly signaling that those who built the World Trade Center were involved in idolatry, because the edifice was another Babel, the "largest human structure ever destroyed in a catastrophic moment" (since Babel).

One peers at the ground zero made at the World Trade Center and glimpses the ruins of a modern Babel, summoning Biblical eschatology. The apocalyptic age, the 21 hazard era, came not in the snare of 1999/2000 as focused for the goyim by the Establishment and its useful idiots, but in Year One of the final millennium, at the 21st century gateway which is the 2(00)1 space (time) odyssey to the greatest battlefield of all, the cosmic war between alien scale and human scale, between the anti-Christ reign of number and the Holy Spirit realm of poetic serendipity.

All this was consciously lost on our yahoo friends and neighbors who were deep into a predictable, first-stage pattern of a formulaic spasm of "patriotic" war-fever and self-righteous drivel post-September 11, 2001, through the early stages of the Afghanistan and Iraq invasions. We qualify their perception with the word "consciously" because, as in the aftermath of the Cryptocracy's last great climax in the management of masonic progression—the JFK assassination—there is a sub-rosa, shadow side to the flag-waving persona propelled out of the smoldering ruins of the Twin Towers' "double day" of 11 September, which planted seeds of doubt and wonder deep in the subconscious of Americans.

Of course 21st century Americans are not 1950s Americans; they have been run through the mill that is the psychedelic funhouse ritual rollercoaster, ever since that other "double day" on the calendar of America mystica, the 22nd of November, 1963. In whose wake:

"...the American people were forced to confront a scary alternative reality, the reality of a shadow government over which they had neither control or knowledge. The shepherding process was thus accelerated with a vengeance. Avant-garde advertising, music, politics and news would hereafter depict (especially in the electronic media)— sometimes fleetingly, sometimes openly—a "shadow side" of reality, an underground, amoral 'funhouse' current associated with extreme sex, extreme violence and extreme speed. The static images of the suit-and-tie talking heads of Establishment religion, government, politics and business were subtly shown to be subordinate to the Shadow State, which the American people were gradually getting a bigger glimpse of, out of the corner of their collective eye. The interesting function of this phenomenon is that it simultaneously produces both terror and adulation and undercuts any offensive against it among percipients, which does not possess the same jump-cut speed and funhouse ambiance." [10]

The same freeze-thaw cryonic process is gnawing into the official fabric of the events of September 11. In the subterranean layers of the psyche of even the most convinced Bush-booster and Fed-fan was a corner-of-the eye glimpse of the twin at work. An ancient tradition of occult governance holds that the actual ruler does not show himself until his power becomes absolute. Instead, such a ruler's invisible, omniscient presence pervades the land and all consciousness like a shadow.

This sense of hidden rulers behind the figurehead presidents and prime ministers has bored deep into the consciousness of the American people. The attack on the New York Towers and the District of Columbia Pentagon, constitute an electrifying, lightning-like revelation that always accompanies the disruption of mundane routine when overturned by sudden chaos and explosive realignment.

In the presence of this overthrow, the reaction in the percipient is a burst of momentary, X-ray like perception—illuminating what was hidden by glimpsing it in a flash of insight—such as was experienced at Ground Zero at the site/sight of the first atomic incineration.

The shocking perception is subsequently suppressed and denied through the chatter of innumerable talking-head spin doctors, who impose approved "solutions" and expert "explanations."

Hence, slowly and inexorably, excruciating tension builds between the public world of the suit-and-tie solvers-and-explainers with their phonograph-record parroting of the restricted official line — and the Sirius B-side of the record, with its shadows and spectres which hint at the dark truth about the Towering Inferno and the wounded Pentagon and for that matter, the wounded head of John Fitzgerald Kennedy.

A population torn between these two extremes may be said to mirror the psychiatric state termed "bipolar."

Since 2001 these insights have been leaked to the masses by the Establishment itself, in bits and pieces. The frigid 2001 Officialspeak which assailed us from every televiewer has been thawed. Truths about the attacks have flooded the public consciousness, long after effective counteraction has been rendered inoperable; thereby doubling the god-like awe in which the hidden rulers are held, until such time as their power is finally absolute. At that point in their game, the Overlord, "Black Jack," is set to assume public, universal, physical manifestation.

An unspoken, indeed, dare-not-be-spoken, insight was propelled in the psychic pressure cooker ignited on September 11, 2001: the impression that a hidden force was behind the Pentagon and Trade Center Towers' "special operation," a force much bigger and more powerful than "Arab terrorists." This force was hypnotically suggested not so much by the actual person of the double bin Laden (Osama and Usama), but by the imagery which bin Laden's icon invoked, that of the turbaned seer from the East, whose crystal ball and oracular powers are foreshadowed rather than stated.

This was the trance state induced in the masses, who, in keeping with Revelation-of-the-Method elements outlined in Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare, experience certain dream-like, hypnotic cues dropped by the media and the government, suggesting that in special operations of this type it is necessary that they should be deceived by their media and their government; indeed that it is necessary that high officials of the United States government lie to the American people:

"Special operations by their nature are cloaked in secrecy and deception making it impossible to know whether officials who discuss them obliquely are being completely candid." ("Bush Assures Hot Pursuit," New York Times, September 29, 2001, p. B4).

The bipolar made visible:

"Last week Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld held a news conference in which he quoted Winston Churchill, 'In wartime truth is so precious that she should always be attended by a bodyguard of lies.' The Pentagon later issued a clarification that Rumsfeld did not mean to imply the government would lie. Yet that seems to be exactly what Rumsfeld was saying." (Los Angeles Times, October 11, 2001).

Rumsfeld did not mean to imply the government would lie. Yet that seems to be exactly what Rumsfeld was saying.

In addition to lying to us "for national security reasons," we have also been informed that the special operation, the "game of 21" and that which emanates from it in concentric rings, entail psychological warfare: "...the United States is planning extensive psychological operations..." (New York Times, October 3, 2001, p. B4). "The Pentagon also has begun deploying forces to mount psychological operations, or 'psy-ops'..." (Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2001, p. 1).

Where, in any of these reports, was there any assurance that the American people were not themselves targets of these operations? On the contrary, the fleeting allusions to the necessity of deception, psychological warfare and psy-ops would seem to hint that no one will be exempt in the mind games dragnet, least of all the taxpayers who fund it.

Psychological warfare operations were launched after September 11 to pre-empt revolt against continued U.S. collusion with the Israelis, and more seriously, revolt arising from inquiry into U.S. government involvement in the attacks.

Hints were dropped, ostensibly about bin Laden, but in fact concerning "our" own elite. For example, "The White House told the media to be careful of broadcasting videos of bin Laden or his lieutenants, saying they could contain coded messages..." (Associated Press, October 11, 2001). Yet when campaigners against Hollywood and Madison Avenue manipulation attempted to document the existence of coded messages and subliminals in Establishment videos and advertising, they were dismissed as paranoid cranks.

George W. Bush's own staffers were caught inserting subliminals into Bush advertisements during the presidential campaign. The American-based Cryptocracy regularly uses seemingly run-of-the-mill news conferences, book illustrations, audio recordings and films to send coded messages. The technique is as old as cryptography, as venerable as the 16th century painting, "Shepherds of Arcadia" by Nicolas Poussin, or of the Victorian artist Walter Sickert, who incorporated clues to the identity of the masonic Jack the Ripper killer in his "Camden Town" paintings.

Detecting the Great Game

Andrea Mitchell of NBC News reported on national television on September 19, 2001 that certain financiers had advance knowledge of the catastrophe and profited from the fall of airline, insurance and brokerage stocks through the purchase of "put options." Mitchell was a bit more authoritative than your average media dork, in that she was at that time the spouse of Federal Reserve Bank Chairman Alan Greenspan.

On September 10, thousands of put options on American Airlines were purchased on the Chicago exchange, worth over $4 million after September 11. Numerous put options were also placed on United Airlines stock in the week before September 11. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co., which occupied 22 floors of the World Trade Center, had over 2,000 of its put options bought in the three trading days before 9/11. This compares with an average of only two dozen contracts per day in the first week of September. This deal too represents millions for the investors involved. A similar pattern was observed with Merrill Lynch & Co. stock, as well as insurance stocks. The identity of the investors has, as of this writing, not been divulged.

The firm that was used to place the put options on United Airlines was, until recently, managed by the man who served as the number three executive of the CIA, A.B. "Buzzy" Krongard, the former chairman of the A.B. Brown investment bank. A.B. Brown was acquired by Banker's Trust in 1997. As part of the merger, Krongard became Vice Chairman of Banker's Trust-AB Brown. In 1998 Krongard joined the CIA, and advanced rapidly to a position as special counsel to CIA Director George Tenet.

In addition to the money web in the respectable corporate world of high finance, there is the "evil twin" which spins a web of symbiosis in a mocking, carnival milieu. Ringling Brothers and Barnum and Bailey Circus traveled in two separate units, the Red Circus and the Blue Circus. The U.S. military's psychodrama teams are divided into the Red team and the Blue teams. The Wall Street Journal reported: "Mind Games...U.S. Military 'Red Teams' Adopt Enemy Identities..." (October 2, 2001 p. 1). The Journal stated that during these "mind games" the U.S. Military's Red team kills its own people, including women and children, then "seeds the landscape with the bodies...when the first reporters and CNN cameramen arrive... (they) announce..." that the enemy did it. (October 2, 2001 p. A12, column 2).

We asked a question in the immediate aftermath of September 11: how many of the System's top luminaries disappeared in the collapse of the World Trade Center, which was home to the New York offices of the FBI, the CIA, the Secret Service and the ATF? How many members of the elite survived the Pentagon crash, an attack which gave wide berth to Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's offices and the nerve centers of the Pentagon? (The "airliner" [or missile] struck a relatively thinly staffed portion of the Pentagon that had been undergoing renovation).

This writer has only been able to identify two of the System's top functionaries among the victims: the wife of U.S. Solicitor General Ted Olsen, who supposedly died on Flight 77, and John O'Neill, retired FBI commander who was the intelligence chief in charge of Trade Tower security from his 23rd floor command post.

O'Neill had previously ran the 1993 World Trade Center bombing "investigation." However, like FBI commander William Sullivan who was shot to death by U.S. intelligence because he knew too much about the JFK assassination, O'Neill may have been allowed to perish because he knew a good deal more about FBI culpability in the 1993 bombing than was healthy:

"One of the largest acts of domestic terrorism in U.S. history was the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in New York. As it turned out, the FBI was fully aware of the bomb plot before the attack took place. The Muslim group involved had been infiltrated by Emad Salem, a former Egyptian intelligence agent who was hired by the FBI and ultimately paid $1 million. The FBI even provided the Egyptian with a timer for the bomb, prompting the Chicago Tribune to publish a report headlined: 'FBI Tipster Said He Built NY Bomb" (Chicago Tribune, December 15, 1993).

The Establishment quickly mocked and then dismissed as an "urban legend" the report that Israelis were tipped in advance of the attack on the Trade Center in Manhattan. The account was derided as coming from the "Arab rumor mill." The September 16, 2001 edition of the Jerusalem Post reported: "The Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem has so far received the names of 4,000 Israelis believed to have been in the areas of the World Trade Center and the Pentagon...Army Radio reported."

But no 4,000 Israelis have been reported missing by the American media. Did thousands of Judaic persons save themselves due to an advance warning, in part from an Israeli electronic message service? As reported by the Hebrew language newspaper Ha'aretz, in a story headlined, "Odigo says workers were warned of attack," we read:

"Odigo, the instant messaging service, says that two of its workers received messages two hours before the Twin Towers attack on September 11 predicting the attack would happen, and the company has been cooperating with Israeli and American law enforcement, including the FBI, in trying to find the original sender of the message predicting the attack...Odigo (is a) well-known Israeli instant messaging application." (Ha'aretz, October 1, 2001).

There have also been accounts ("urban rumors") of a group of Israelis videotaping the Trade Tower attacks as they happened. That report is also from Ha'aretz newspaper: "5 Israelis detained for 'puzzling behavior': "Five Israelis who had worked for a moving company based in New Jersey are being held in U.S. prisons for what the Federal Bureau of Investigation has described as 'puzzling behavior' following the terror attack on the World Trade Center in New York last Tuesday.

"The five are expected to be deported...The families of the five, who asked that their names not be released, said that their sons had been...kept in solitary confinement...The mother of one of the young men explained the chain of events as she understands it to Ha'aretz: she said that the five had worked for the company, which is owned by an Israeli, for between two months and two years.

"They had been arrested some four hours after the attack on the Twin Towers while filming the smoking skyline from the roof of their company's building...The (Israeli) Foreign Ministry said in response that it had been informed by the consulate in New York that the FBI had arrested the five for 'puzzling behavior.' They are said to have had been caught videotaping the disaster and shouting in what was interpreted as cries of joy and mockery." (Ha'aretz, September 17, 2001).

The possibility that these Israelis filmed the first impact, and were taken into custody by the FBI after an allegedly outraged witness caused the incident to be made public, fits a pattern.

Absent from the World Trade Center on September 11 was the Federal Reserve's New York President, William McDonough, who was in Switzerland at the time. Missing from Washington, D.C. on September 11 was Alan Greenspan who was also in Switzerland. Federal Reserve Governors Laurence Meyer (in China at the time); Edward Gramlich (visiting in Arizona) and Edward Kelley, who was "on vacation" at an undisclosed location, also missed the attack on New York and Washington D.C.

There are certain telltale indicators when a crime is an inside job. One of these is the failure of law enforcement to interview accessible witnesses who may have had contact with either the victims or the perpetrators. Ted Kaczynski, the "Unabomber," had been under FBI surveillance for years. We surmise that from its early stages the FBI was inside the Unabomber scenario. That is why, when a man matching descriptions of a radical environmentalist, turned up in Kaczynski's adopted hometown of Lincoln, Montana a few days after the arrest of Kaczynski, publicly espousing support for Kaczynski, the FBI did not bother to question or investigate the man. Why would they? The FBI knew that Kaczynski's only accomplices were other government agents. There was no need to conduct an authentic investigation.

Our investigation unearthed similar evidence of macabre indifference in the case of 9/11. We have spoken with a relative of a passenger on a flight departing Newark airport just after the hijacked United Flight 93 airliner departed for San Francisco. The passenger, a California executive in the publishing field, took time to look over the passengers on the doomed airliner bound for the earlier flight to California, to see if there anyone he knew. This eyewitness was not contacted by the FBI. His jet took off after the hijacked airliner, from a nearby gate. The FBI, while making a great show of "interviewing thousands" and following "tens of thousands of leads," didn't bother making contact with a prime witness, and others like him.

The year 2000 edition of Criminal Acts Against Aviation, published by the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA), cited bin Laden as a "significant threat to civil aviation, particularly to U.S. civil aviation." The warning was ignored by U.S. Law Enforcement. National Public Radio's Morning Edition reported on September 29, 2001 that the FBI knew before 9/11 that bin Laden-connected associates were training as pilots in the U.S. The U.S. spends $40 billion a year on the eleven intelligence agencies that comprise its huge secret police network; that's a total of $400 billion in the past ten years. Yet, the Bush Administration says it was taken by surprise.

On September 11 the "Arlington Road" script was implemented, as in the Oklahoma City ruse, where the patsy McVeigh was apprehended the day of the crime by means of self-incriminating license plates.

The Cryptocracy left no room for doubt as to who was to blame for the Trade Center and Pentagon attacks. Within 10 minutes of the second tower being hit, CNN declared Osama bin Laden had done it. Cell phones which were apparently impervious to interception only that morning, were suddenly yielding congratulatory phone calls to bin Laden's associates that afternoon.

By September 12 the U.S. government and media somehow had managed to obtain incriminating Arab-language flight manuals, Last Wills and Testaments of the hijackers, and copies of the Quran which turned up in the perpetrators' vehicles, or in luggage conveniently abandoned at Boston's Logan airport.

And what of the tale of quickly finding a passport bearing an alleged suicide bomber's real identity, in the vast World Trade Center rubble, before it had barely been sifted?

As in the Oklahoma City dramaturgy, self-incriminating "evidence" was swiftly and conveniently "discovered" in order to imprint the Group Mind with a lasting "first impression," while evidence of official involvement was made to disappear, such as where were the American military's air defense fighter jets after the first tower was attacked?

Placing the High Stakes Black Jack Wager

Those who engineer the reign of dead matter over humanity are virtuoso risk-takers. Placing the high stakes Black Jack wager is part of their DNA. On Monday, June 5, in the year 2006, on page A19 of the New York Times, the "newspaper of record" read by millions, the Cryptocracy inserted the following advertisement in the form of a news report for a highly disruptive, indeed revolutionary counter-narrative of the 9/11 terror attacks. [11] In an article that comprised nearly one-third of the page, the Times reported:

"Such was the coming-out for the movement known as '9/11 Truth,' a society of skeptics and scientists who believe the government was complicit in the terrorist attacks.

"In colleges and chat rooms, this band of disbelievers has been trying for years to prove that 9/11 was an inside job."

The article asked:

"...how the building at World Trade Center 7" (which wasn't hit by an aircraft) "collapsed like a ton of bricks."

[11] nytimes.com/2006/06/05/us/05conspiracy.html
The article that appeared in the print edition of the paper was titled, "For 9/11 Conspiracy Buffs, A Chance to Compare Notes." The same article online has a different headline, "500 Conspiracy Buffs Meet to Seek the Truth of 9/11." No imputation of wrong-doing or conspiracy is alleged concerning the author of the 2006 New York Times report.

The New York Times article of 2006 goes on to draw attention to incendiary facts that have been hotly denied by the Times and other legacy media ever since:

"...the military command that monitors aircraft 'stood down' on the day of the attacks" and "the towers did not collapse because of burning fuel and weakened steel but because of a 'controlled demolition' caused by pre-set bombs."

The Times went to far as to publicize a dissenting technical "report written by Steven E. Jones, a professor of physics at Brigham Young University (BYU) and the movement's expert in the matter of (building) collapse."

The "newspaper of record" even provided the correct Internet URL (which was an active link online in 2006), containing Dr. Jones' rigorous scientific critique of the official engineering analysis of the collapse of the Twin Towers that had been issued by the National Institute of Standards and Technology: physics.byu.edu/research/energy/htm7.html

(The link was removed some years later by BYU).

As of this writing, other than the assassination of the President of the United States in daylight in masonic Dealey Plaza, no spectacular crime has so stimulated the collective psyche of the American people as that which occurred on September 11, 2001. Consequently, it was a perilous Revelation of the Method gamble in 2006 for the Cryptocracy to point to the Internet location of the painstaking and meticulous critique by Prof. Steven E. Jones, a credentialed academic, of the 9/11 tale as told by the government and an overwhelming majority of the corporate media.

Here is a matter of life and death: establishing that the towers were brought down by explosives as part of a controlled demolition and not as a result of the impact of the two jet aircraft striking the "Twin Towers." Unraveling the official tale, and proceeding to apprehend and prosecute the actual planners, perpetrators and concealers of the terror attacks, would represent a solar high wind of cleansing power blown through America.

Consider this: less than six years after the September 11 attacks, on June 5, 2006 readers of the New York Times were handed a key to the puzzle palace. What did they do with it?

Next to nothing.

There was no great groundswell of sustained activism. After receiving this revelation, the millions of percipients continued their drowsy ramble deep into The Process, as the Black Jack players had gambled on them doing, cognizant that an astonishing revelation that does not produce a mighty movement arising in reaction to the alarming public manifestation of high crimes and misprisions, instills deeper hypnosis, paralysis, demoralization, misdirection and confusion in the target audience.

Howard Dean: Bush Knew

Memory refresh: the 2006 Revelation of the Method by the New York Times was preceded in 2003 by another.

Former Vermont Governor "Howard Dean, whose penchant for off-the-cuff comments has proved both a strength and political liability, is facing a new flap over suggestions that President Bush had advance knowledge of the September 11 terrorist attacks...

"Dean suggested Bush 'is suppressing evidence' that could aid the Kean Commission in its reconstruction of events leading to the terrorist attacks. Leaders of the commission — which is headed by former New Jersey Gov. Thomas H. Kean — have complained that the Bush administration has been too slow to provide access to key documents, and has intimidated witnesses by insisting that CIA and FBI observers attend sensitive interviews. The president has declined to turn over highly classified intelligence reports to the panel, despite threats of a subpoena (Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2003).

Diane Rehm: "Why do you think he (Bush) is suppressing that (September 11) report?"

Howard Dean: "I don't know. There are many theories about it. The most interesting theory that I''ve heard so far — which is nothing more than a theory, it can't be proved — is that he was warned ahead of time by the Saudis. Now who knows what the real situation is?" [12]

"Bush called it an 'absurd insinuation' to raise questions, as (Howard) Dean did recently, about whether the president had advance knowledge of the September 11 attacks." (Associated Press, December 15, 2003).

This statement by Mr. Dean, who at the time was former Vice-President Al Gore's anointed presidential candidate, and the insipid response from Bush, might signify that a bold gamble by the Establishment was afoot to leak the fact that the Bush administration was implicated in the 9/11 attacks.

The Fabulous Doublecross of His Satanic Majesty

A familiar pattern in the Revelation of the Method is to leak bits and pieces of evidence of criminal conspiracy and then ensure that the perpetrator gives vague answers, or talks around the subject, as George W. Bush did. The goal of the Revelation is to desensitize Americans to the fact of Bush's complicity in 9/11 by exposing them to an intermittent, occasionally dramatic, but mostly low-level buzz. By this conditioning process, awareness of Bush's connivance gradually becomes absorbed into the din of The Process, morphing into the sub-strata of the digital-psychedelic funhouse.

The slowly dawning revelation of Bush's treason becomes not a basis for indictment and prosecution, but a sideshow for the game zone's sarcastic management simulator, a macabre, yet perversely sexy rumor-mill that burnishes Bush's potency and aura, and plays on people's jaded sense of awe in the presence of a "Satanic Majesty" who commands such power that he can successfully mount a fabulous doublecross and still thrive.

The crimes of the Cryptocracy are leaked by the Cryptocracy itself, in part to trivialize them by embedding them within our high-speed electronic freakshow clown culture. 9/11 has become one such phenomenon and President George W. Bush's involvement in the conspiracy has morphed into a fetish of power, accompanied by the subconscious sense that, "If he did allow 9/11 to happen, he did so for our own good."

Consider the Pearl Harbor con. One of the first to penetrate that charade was John Toland in his 1982 book. Infamy. The New York Times passed sentence on the truth that Toland (and many others) uncovered, with this clever wordplay: "Toland said he had turned up evidence to conclude that Roosevelt had known in advance of Japan's impending attack but failed to inform the naval command in the Pacific in the hope of rousing America from its isolationism. This view put him (Toland) at odds with a series of official federal investigations and historians who said Roosevelt may have made errors in judgment but neither knew about nor encouraged the attack." (New York Times January 7, 2004, emphasis supplied).

Get the picture? 1. The Establishment instructs us to believe that Toland is wrong because he is "at odds" with an official consensus. 2. As damage control, the Establishment paradoxically concedes that something about the official line is flawed, but that this flaw consists only in "errors in judgment," not a criminal conspiracy.

In a similar vein, who today believes that, as William N. Grimstad phrased it, "one lone assassin and one very talented rifle bullet" were responsible for the assassination of President Kennedy? Yet the surviving conspirators were never brought to justice. The Cryptocracy has seen to it that while a JFK assassination conspiracy is broadly acknowledged, the issue has become so muddled that Americans have a dizzying sense that "everybody killed Kennedy" — the anti-Castro exiles as well as the pro-Castro Communists; the CIA as well as the KGB; the Mafia and the Birchers.

In these crimes, the role of the Society-of-the-Spectacle's Videodrome is a crucial factor in neutralizing the hunt for perpetrators, by incorporating chatter about a government conspiracy into the infotainment machine. One doesn't seriously call for detectives and prosecutors inside a carnival funhouse. Instead, one marvels in "shock and awe" at the perverse wonder of the spectacle.

The Twin Tower Game of 21 shapes us as part of the continuing process of human alchemy into devolved species, the vaunted "new man" of the early decades of the 21st century, who has since been coagulated into the contemporary laboratory phase of the suppression of nature, wherein recognition of the organic differences between humans possessed of XX chromosomes and those with XY, is proscribed hate speech. Very little of this process would have been possible had the murder pageants, ceremonial bombings and towering infernos been thoroughly and freely investigated, prosecuted and otherwise challenged by intrepid women and men holding positions of power and authority in journalism, law enforcement, the judiciary and the church.

But the wimp factor in the churches is off the meter. The fraud factor in the salons of intellect and the groves of academe is beyond calculation. We are admonished to love thy American special forces golem, to fall down before them in abject quivering idolatry, or fear, as the occasion demands.

With each case of the successful conduct of their spectacular public crimes, our not-so-hidden masters have been emboldened to proceed to the next stage of their civic diabolism. These thinly-veiled rites possess an inner dynamic which sweeps us along with the power of a psychic tide, in an explosion of communal conditioning which was given an incomparable boost from its 2001 launch pad. From the vantage of 2021, "Childhood's End" can no longer be said to be "hurtling toward us." It's here.

Freeze/Thaw: Reagan, Rumsfeld and Saddam

In this third decade of the 21st century Howard Dean is not so very infamous for asking in December of 2003 if "Bush knew." His query has merely smoldered. Mr. Dean gained brief infamy again with his observation that the world was no safer after Saddam Hussein had been captured in Iraq, than before. Which brings us to the other Revelation in the Method-that-is-their-Madness — the freeze/thaw process.

Prior to the American invasion of Iraq, the mountain of facts concerning Ronald Reagan and Donald Rumsfeld's alliance with Saddam Hussein were frozen solid. These facts almost never turned up as questions for Bush in any pre-Iraq-invasion presidential news conference of which we are aware. After the much-coveted Iraq invasion and occupation had been accomplished and the Zionists and "Christian" Zionists got what they wanted, the facts were thawed and headlines in Establishment newspapers blared, "Rumsfeld Made Iraq Overture in '84 Despite Chemical Raids" (New Times, December 23, 2003), and "Rumsfeld's '84 Visit was to Reassure Iraqis" (Seattle Times via Washington Post, December 19, 2003).

Too late! The hurly burlys done. This knowledge, publicized by the corporate media more than nine months after the invasion of Iraq had been accomplished, was at that point mostly ceremonial. It was deep frozen before the U.S. invasion of Iraq, then thawed by time-release after the war was launched. It functions as a kind of nose-thumbing at the peasants, "So Saddam used to be our ally. So what? It's none of your damn business, little man. Your business is to bleed and be taxed and stand in awe of the splendor of our five-pointed and six-pointed astral system."

Information that could have prevented the invasion is used after the invasion to "shock and awe" the minds of Americans.

The whispered reaction of the peasantry to the thawed facts is one of grudging admiration, "Wow, what a bunch of crooks, but hey, crooks rule!"

This psy-war component of American foreign policy is overlooked by the Left, which continues to ascribe the maintenance of support for Bush to antique propaganda methods pioneered by Fascist and Communist parties ninety years ago. The Establishment dismisses the reality of the government's psy-war with psychiatric jargon, [13] while a stew of competing conspiracy notions, often generated by the System itself to distract and confuse, proliferate.

As Moshe Goldstein noted, "Hussein's ouster by the U.S. was an afterthought following three decades of collusion." The CIA backed Saddam's Baath party coup in 1969. Reagan hosted Iraqi official Tariq Aziz at the White House. In 1982, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee acknowledged a U.S. alliance with Saddam, who received assistance from CIA director William Casey and Assistant Secretary of State Richard Murphy. $1 billion was overtly conveyed to Saddam through the Department of Agriculture's Commodity Credit Corporation. Covertly, Reagan funneled $4 billion to Saddam through the Atlanta branch of the Italian bank, Banca Nazionale del Lavoro. Under the auspices of the US-Iraq Business Forum, sponsored by the Reagan administration, corporate America, in particular Honeywell, Bechtel, Exxon, General Motors and Westinghouse, profited handsomely from trading with Saddam.

The Israelis had directed their American serfs to use Saddam against the Islamic Republic of Iran. Saddam was encouraged to go to war and invade Iran, resulting in eight years of war and one million casualties on the Iranian side. American media executives who praised Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman for insisting on "unconditional surrender" from Germany and Japan, continually lambasted Iran for making the same demand of the Iraqi invaders. Saddam's reward for devastating a fellow Muslim nation on behalf of the Israeli-American bloc was supposed to have been Kuwait.

[13] Fifty-six years after its publication in 1965, Columbia University Prof. Richard Hofstadter's The Paranoid Style in American Politics continues to serve as the Establishment's manual for diagnosing the mental illness of anyone to the Right of Bob Dole who proposes that the U.S. government engages in criminal conspiracies involving mind control and assassinations.

Moshe Goldstein reports, "It was actually U.S. diplomacy under George Bush Sr.'s presidency that gave Hussein the perception of a green light for his 1990 (Kuwait) aggression."

From the transcript of U.S. Ambassador April Glaspie's remarks to Saddam while he had his troops massed on the Kuwait border, a few days before he invaded Kuwait:

"We have no opinion on your Arab-Arab conflicts, such as your dispute with Kuwait. Secretary (of State James) Baker has directed me to emphasize the instruction, first given to Iraq in the 1960's, that the Kuwait issue is not associated with America."

Of course, Saddam did not receive Kuwait as his recompense for making war on Iran on behalf of the agenda of President George H.W. Bush. He was sucker-baited into the attempt. Saddam was a prize chump in George W. Bush's war depicting him as the fiendish enemy of the American Way; a foe brought to justice by Donald Rumsfeld and the Neocon ideological heirs of Ronald Reagan. Actually, Saddam was part of the post-JFK American Way: the doublecross and plausible denial in the freeze stage—and bragging rights and Revelation of the Method during the thaw.

By every metric of spiritual and psychological disturbance—deep depression, anxiety, despair, childlessness, divorce, drug addiction, alcoholism and suicide—Americans are a radically unhappy people, despite often concealing their condition behind a skillfully maintained persona of a satisfied, if occasionally beleaguered life. Maintaining that facade is a burden that creates more psychic fault-lines. Many tens of millions of Americans harbor a collective death wish which stokes the revival, and consequent psychic energy, of the 3500 year-old Pharaonic death cult.

Let us, therefore, spare ourselves reciting rigamarole about of this or that "occult superpower behind the mysteries of history" as if it were news to the public. This is the 21st century, five hundred years into the western occult and its intensified application of The Process. The future has, in a sense, already occurred, and at present our stage of the alchemical program is post-history, in which there are no mysteries except the ones we conceal from ourselves, lest we break the bonds of the enchantment. We can see hell on the horizon, and we do little or nothing to forestall it; in fact, many of our actions serve to facilitate or even welcome it.

We have an inkling that many "random lone nut serial killings" are in fact ceremonial murders performed as propitiation and conditioning. We have a troubling, lingering sense that many hundreds of perfectly "respectable, moderate" government officials, police, media editors and politicians are co-conspirators in the terror psychodrama. Yet, we play along. We drift along, rudderless, leaderless.

If Satan himself were to land in a starship on the lawn of the White House, Americans would be electrified back to life for several weeks, after which their life force would slowly return to its 30-watt steady state, and the search would be resumed for the Next Big Thrill necessary to again jolt our minds and bodies into momentarily approximating the consciousness of the fully human beings of the past.

There's no place to hide from our responsibility and this book will not provide cover where none is possible.

Some are perhaps reading this text to obtain an amnesiac's thrill: How close does Hoffman come to revealing the ultimate secret? How can anyone forget that some readers and reviewers said we performed that service in our 2001 volume? This 2021 work is not complicit in the masturbation of that vision.

Fertility Then and Now

> The application of the blows by the one sex to the other, especially by young men to young women, suggests that the beating is or was originally intended above all to stimulate the reproductive powers of the men or women who received it ; and the pains taken to ensure that the branches with which the strokes are given should have budded or blossomed out just before their services are wanted speak strongly in favour of the view that in these customs we have a deliberate attempt to transfuse a store of vital energy from the vegetable to the animal world.

James Frazer, The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion (Macmillan, 1935), volume 6, p. 272

Our 2001 writing was given a bit of stick by some for being "too Christian" and "obsessed with abortion." The groovy pagans wanted to be certain that their conférés understood that in recommending some of our cognition, they were putting obligatory distance between their elevated pagan consciousness and our occasional digression into "pathetic religious fundamentalism."

Pagan? Really? There are pagans in the West these days? Are we on the same page? Are we alluding to the pre-Christian Saxons, Danes and Druids, to the European vegetation folk with their pregnant goddess and her consort, the Green Man — those key elements comprising the vast majority of the paganism of western history?

That paganism is long dead and drowned, fathoms deep. It consisted of a giant and perpetual working, both magical and practical, for invoking and maintaining the inextricable link between the fertility of the people and the land.

The sterile, fetus-fearing and fetus-loathing wraiths haunting the contemporary milieu with their tattoos and anemic imitations of pre-industrial tribal people, are a shabby simulation of historic pagan humanity.

At what level of the sub-cellar of their consciousness do they grasp this truth and yet continue to act a part in the spirit-decaying charade?

It is not difficult to obtain the knowledge that the western paganism of history was a relentless and sometimes frenetic summoning of life in the womb of the woman, and the fertility of the land.

With the exception of an extraordinarily malevolent society such as the Pharaonic Egyptian, only a tiny fraction of the pagans of western history were outside the fertility paradigm and devoted to the deities of thanatos. Yet today western paganism is almost entirely thanatos.

Here we digress to anticipate an objection from the "white magic" pagans who will say they enthusiastically bless fertility and all life on earth.

By way of reply, we ask how many children do the women of your white magic pagan community average? We will bet dollars to doughnuts that the answer is an average of either zero, one or two.

Those tragic numbers are not reproductive. "White magic" pagans cannot reproduce themselves averaging zero, one or two births per woman.

Therefore, we regret to say, they are a death cult indulging in familiar self-deceiving rhetoric about "our love of fertility."

"Little Egypt"

As noted, Pharaonic Egypt was a death cult, and lo and behold we discover that swaths of the American south and midwest, from Memphis, Tennessee to Cairo, Illinois and points in-between, came to be known in the nineteenth century as "Little Egypt," with the Mississippi River reconfigured as the Nile. Much has been made of the innovations in electricity and other scientific advancements presented at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. We wonder however, whether the midway's most transformative attraction was an apparatus of technology.

Rather, it may have been "The Streets of Cairo" exhibit, featuring what was, for an audience in 1893, a provocatively erotic performance by a belly dancer named "Little Egypt," a charmer who created one heck of a sensation in the emerging American society-of-the-spectacle. Within two years, sheet music was published nationally titled, "The Streets of Cairo." It's alternate title was "The Snake Charmer Song." Care to hazard a guess as to who was being charmed by the snake?

Americans mesmerized by "Little Egypt" were eventually catered to at carnival sideshows throughout the land, where sex acts of varying degrees of lechery, from mild to raunchy, which were typically outlawed in local municipalities, sailed past the censors and were performed outside city limits in "hootchy-kootchy" tents, which for ninety years or so were a sordid tradition making the rounds of America mystica, until the mainstreamed deluge of topless and bottomless bars beginning in the 1960s, as well as pornography on videocassettes and later the Internet, made them largely superfluous. And by the way, "Hootch" is a synonym for homemade whiskey, while "Kootchy" is an old slang term for the vagina. [14]

On a mass scale, sex without procreation qualifies as a death cult—a society in which the fertility of the land, the crops and the men and woman of procreative age are no longer the priority.

We are in the stage of the post-death cult, where the "progressive environmentalists" of the white race proclaim that to have children is an irresponsible and reckless action. When masked as environmentalism, this white people's dogma is not particularly controversial, even though it is an unmistakable manifestation of the 4th century A.D. Manichean Elect, who, as John Marshall has written, believed that "begetting children helped to trap souls in matter and fostered the spread of the 'Kingdom of Darkness."

No, we don't seek to burn Manicheans at the stake. No authentic follower of Jesus Christ ever perpetrated any such abomination. It is more likely that those of us who raise alarms concerning infertility will experience a soft "burning" at the hands of the white environmentalists (i.e. reputation shredded, canceled online, canceled financial transactions and employment, and subject possibly to confinement in re-education facilities).

Feeding the people iatrogenic toxins (pharmaceutical drugs), certain vaccines and that which is alleged to be "food," viz. SAD (Standard American Diet), has succeeded in lowering the ability of men and women to conceive children, think independently, and work effectively. Does anyone imagine that the string-pullers behind these sterility-inducing processes are the friends of a positive life on planet earth?

If we continue to cede our agency to a process of flummery and pretense operated by ingenious conspirators whose sorcerous mystique and ceremonial psychodrama have gained for its simulation of reality a general acceptance by the public, then we will witness the light of humanity extinguished, at least in this age; Doomsday being the most extreme manifestation of the thrill-seekers' quest for a terminal, cortex-crunching adrenalin rush.

In the face of the gossamer-winged illusion that sustains the flimsy occult magnum opus, we assert that we need not be prisoners of a scripted inevitablism.

This time of ours can be the Stage of the Life-Culture. Dead matter need not reign. Amnesia can be dispelled, and indifference overcome. Divine Creation can be loved again, fertility revived and the future restored, if human beings so choose.

I

PARALLEL LATITUDES

Twilight Language

An Interview

Interviewer: How did you come to know James Shelby Downard and how did he come to be known to a national audience?

Hoffman: Fortean scholar and visionary Bill Grimstad introduced me to Mr. Downard. I met and traveled with him a few times in the Tampa-St. Petersburg Florida area in the mid-1970s. I spoke and corresponded with Shelby (as his friends called him), for the rest of his life. In support of my work, Mr. Downard would send checks in amounts ranging from $300 to $500, between five and eight times a year on average, during most of the time I knew him.

His breakthrough came when our friend, writer-publisher Adam Parfrey, informed us about a book he was planning to publish, Apocalyspe Culture. We believed it would be an opportunity for Mr. Downard so we submitted to Adam's anthology the manuscript of King-Kill/33, which Shelby wrote and I copy-edited and enlarged at his request.

Interviewer: Parfrey published it only under Downard's byline.

Hoffman: Yes, he did, but it didn't really matter at the time. Apocalyspe Culture was a publishing phenomenon and Mr. Downard and his message entered the public consciousness of a mass audience from then onward, largely thanks to Adam's vision and promotional acumen.

Interviewer: Parfrey was quite taken with Downard.

Hoffman: Very much so. He traveled from California to Shelby's final home in Memphis, Tennessee for a visit.

Interviewer: What did Parfrey regard as so special in Downard?

Hoffman: I think he viewed Mr. Downard as a watchman-bard who perceived the higher elements of an overlooked reality which society had reduced to materialistic dross and Cartesian science. Mr. Downard pointed us to a tale that was being imparted above—and paradoxically inside—the deepest recesses of our heads, most significantly in the first atomic bomb blast and the John F. Kennedy assassination, which he described, respectively, as the Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter, and the Killing of the King. No one outside the Cryptocracy had that vision of those events before Shelby. He discerned a narrative, the Rosicrucian Ludibrium constructed to speak to our subconscious, weaving one of the most powerful of mental attractants: a compelling story. Words like "hair-raising" and "spine-tingling" are pathetically inadequate to describe this narrative manipulation and programming.

Adam observed, "In Downard's writings, the products of his subconscious bubble to the surface and catalyze painstaking research. The collision of the poetic against the logical works especially well in the field of conspiracy; it remains the freshest approach to a field of inquiry…"

Interviewer: Is there a particular example that comes to mind of this tale Downard wove from current events?

Hoffman: There are many. I'll cite the first atomic bomb explosion which he viewed as the culmination of many centuries of occult planning and heavily invested with symbolism, beginning with what he termed, "mystical toponomy." He didn't believe in accidents when it came to events at this level, so for him the siting was deliberate and novelistic: at the end of the most lethal section of the Camino Real, which wound from Mexico City to Santa Fe, the ninety-mile "stretch between Las Cruces and Socorro called Jornada del Muerto or Journey of the Dead...Drive east of Truth or Consequences to Engle, get out of your car...Imagine 400 years ago, traveling step by step (on)...the Journey of the Dead." [1]

At the end of that peregrination we arrive at the atom bomb's "Trinity Site." Coincidence? There, besides the bomb, we encounter the medieval alchemical homunculus bottle which the U.S. government dubbed, "Jumbo." The tower from which it was suspended near ground zero vanished, apart from two steel footings set in concrete. According to the official government website of the White Sands Missile Range: "As confidence in the plutonium bomb design grew, it was decided not to use Jumbo. Instead, it was placed under a steel tower about 800 yards from ground zero. The blast destroyed the tower, but Jumbo survived intact."

[1] volcano.und.nodak.edu/vwdocs/volc_images/north_america/new_mexico/jornada.html

As you can see the government website states, "Jumbo survived intact." A very remarkable occurrence not much remarked upon, or scrutinized. An imbecilic oversight if ever there was.

According to Shelby Downard, a homunculus — a mannikin — was perhaps placed inside Jumbo and it was thought by some that the radiation had managed to animate it.

That's not what he himself believed. It was what he said the "sorcerers" (his term) involved with the Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter believed, and attempted to achieve. Whether they did or did not is an open question.

Shelby recognized the enactment of a possibly delusional but nonetheless long-sought-after alchemical objective, which had been incorporated into earth's first nuclear preparations at the highest levels of what was a top secret government project, and this during wartime. He paid attention to extraordinary anomalies like that when no one outside the secret society did.

Mr. Downard felt that that first atom blast had altered reality, far beyond the contours of the nostalgic observation that, "The world will never be the same again," but rather in the fact that when the world saw the "sun" rise in the morning from the west for the first time in recorded history, our reality was forever altered.

The experience of the eyewitnesses in the western desert regions—and there were many thousands of them—they were struck to their core by this shattering experience and some even equated the seemingly miraculous sight with the Second Coming.

In July 2005, during the observances for the sixtieth anniversary of the atomic detonation, the Associated Press reported: "Emmett Hatch's grandmother ordered him to drop to his knees and pray July 16, 1945, shortly after the world's first atomic blast. She was awake at 5:29:45 Mountain War Time that morning in Portales to make breakfast and saw the explosion from more than 220 miles away. 'She thought it was the coming of the Lord, because the sun rose in the west that day,' said Hatch, who was 8 years old at the time."

Sixty years later Mr. Hatch was present at the restricted "Trinity Site," marked by an obelisk inscribed, "Where the World's First Nuclear Device Was Exploded on July 16, 1945."

Interviewer: Aren't obelisks and monoliths associated with the advancement of human evolution, as per Kubrick's "2001"?

Hoffman: The monolith is more of a sentinel, don't you think? One wonders whether it bears some kind of witness, or acts as some type of catalyst for human devolution, as opposed to the cover story about evolution.

Interviewer: A third event that galvanized Downard was the Apollo Moon Flight.

Hoffman: Not just Downard. Mr. Grimstad viewed the fate of the Eagle landing module, fired directly into the sun after it docked with the Columbia, as perhaps an enactment of the mystical union of the sun and the moon, which is another storied alchemical objective. He also insinuated that the impact of man leaving his boot tracks and space junk on the moon would have negative consequences, and we now know the astronauts left their feces there too.

The Zuni Indians predicted sterility for the white race due to this violation of the moon, which has been seen in legend as a guardian of fertility on earth. Call it a fairy tale if you like, but the Zuni observation has a certain verisimilitude in light of the fact that after we landed on the moon, the population of the white race sank, with statistics showing vastly higher rates of contraception and abortion. The prophecy, if you want to call it that, has been fulfilled.

Interviewer: The Chinese are sending rockets to the moon and mining the surface and setting off detonations. Will they follow the demographic fate of the whites for their sins?

Hoffman: I don't know. What I do know is that the slow transformation of these formerly pristine celestial objects into a degraded junkyard and slag heap, probably does not bode well for the human race. To a galactic observer it might offer a rather poor testimony to our nature.

Interviewer: And you account for this with the doctrine of Original Sin?

Hoffman: The idea of Original Sin is viewed as very uncool and nerd-like. Call me a fundamentalist or whatever name you wish, but hell on earth is always built when our fallen human nature is denied, and then recruited to build heaven on earth. This Thelemic project is a huckster's call.

Here's a quote from Francois Rabelais describing the "philosophical paradise" of the Abbey of Thelema, "There was but one clause in their Rule: Do what thou wilt, because people who are free, well bred, well taught and conversant with honorable company have by nature an instinct—a goad—which always pricks them toward virtuous acts and withdraws them from vice."

Rabelais is repeating, not inventing, Satan's original gnosis. The specially selected and chosen inner elite, are "oppressed and enslaved by base subordination and constraint." The laws of God and nature are condemned as bondage because they interfere with the freedom of this higher class of godlings, all of whom have been "educated so nobly...vying laudably with each other to do what is pleasing to any one of them."

Rabelais exhibited two of the signs of occult initiation, or at least, involvement. The first is blasphemy. He was an ordained priest, a monk and a sinister character. Jesus on the cross cries out, "I thirst." The disgustingly drunken priest in Rabelais' Gargantua mouths the same words, in obvious mockery.

The second is the prisca theologia, the universalist doctrine that all religions come from a single wisdom tradition, a belief that is impossible for any believer in the literal truth of the Bible. In his Pantagruel, Rabelais, the Thelemic prophet, makes a pitch for this religious syncretism, reconciling Plato and Pythagoras with the Gospel and St. Paul in the Third and Fourth Books of Pantagruel, on the road to the reign of human brain power, disguised with environmental virtue-signaling, and palaver about "luhv."

Interviewer: And these currents are all headed where?

Hoffman: To the Jornada del muerto on the 33rd degree latitude line, and to Dealey Plaza on the 32nd degree latitude line, in what John Dee termed in 1577, "the perfect art of navigation," which leads to the discovery of an exploding mushroom cloud and an exploding head. Signs nostra aetate.

Fertility cults are supposed to green the earth. This however, is a blackening, perpetrated by those who "know what is best for us," the high-minded Thelemic disciples of the enemy of the human race.

Interviewer: Who do you identify as that enemy?

Hoffman: Do the math.

Interviewer: Come on.

Hoffman: Gustav Kuhn, a psychologist at Durham University stated, "Magicians seem to be able to carry out secret actions in front of their audience without being spotted. I'm interested in why people don't perceive those actions."

By controlling attention and expectation through suggestion, and exploiting our implanted preconceptions, we are led to participate in our own deception.

We are at the weird stage now where we do spot the secret actions of the magicians, after which we take an active civic part in the sorcery of fooling ourselves. We are the audience at a voyeuristic magic act that consists in the secret of spectating at our own death, the highest thrill the Big Top's magicians have to offer. Freedom, redemption, transcendence? They're nowhere to be found in this particular theater.

Interviewer: The Theater of the Revelation of the Method.

Hoffman: That's it. You did the math.

Interviewer: Revelation is supposed to be filled with light, but light's absent in this one.

Hoffman: "From those flames
No light, but rather darkness visible
Served only to discover sights of woe..."

Interviewer: That's from Paradise Lost. Milton.

Hoffman: Yes, paradise lost.

Interviewer: What is "Twilight Language"?

Hoffman: Let's see, do I start with a "jack ruby," or sheep dipping?

Where to begin when there isn't a beginning. Measurement has no place here.

There is going to be difficulty among the masses and even conspiracy students and investigators concerning the language which speaks in ways that are non-linear to most minds.

Twilight language is a form of communication that eludes most people's conscious perception, though it is of course perceived by the subconscious. In the 21 century that dichotomy is much less the case, because the initiation of the masses into the civic magic that increasingly appears undisguised has brought the revelation of Twilight Language to the frontiers of the waking mind.

A yarn is being spun and "charmed" conjunctions and interstices are formed, partly from invocation and partly from "surfing" a magnetic attraction that seems to organize anomalies around certain "words of power" and potent symbols. That there is incredulity in the face of this is the least surprising dimension of the phenomenon.

The two extremes which distort our perception are total denial of twilight language on the one hand, and a total immersion in trivial aspects of a case that ends up muddying the key elements of pattern detection. There are researchers who pick a grab bag of symbol books, videos and name references and throw them into a cauldron that they call Twilight Language and what comes of it? A laundry list of increasingly tedious, trivial or contrived links of words. Without enlightened pattern detection such an approach is part of the obfuscation, not the clarification.

We ourselves can generate the phenomena. We can begin to see coincidences everywhere. There has to be a selection so we remain mindful of how our perception itself becomes part of the process of invocation.

Interviewer: What do you mean by "trivial aspects" and selection?

Hoffman Deciding what is important and what is effluvia; what qualifies as Twilight Language but is actually a kind of arcane litter, sometimes placed in the field of vision to distract and sometimes invoked by the percipient/investigator himself because he can't detect the pattern, he can't grok what is insubstantial, what is a false lead, even if it does reflect occult dimensions. As in any language, one encounters jibberish and some sleuths are misled into believing it has significance.

We should be keenly aware that not everything in the symbolic stream is of profound remarkability. Discerning the difference between the actual communication being conveyed by Twilight Language—between that and signal noise—is the difference between a higher state of consciousness and a form of debilitation that can mimic the classic symptoms of mental illness.

Some of these investigators who don't possess the antenna, intuition, ears to hear or eyes to see — call it what you will—serve the Cryptocracy by failing to distinguish between the medium and the message. The strangeness of the communication has shocked and awed them to such an extent that their discernment has fallen by the wayside.

A stated goal of the 1960s and '70s psychedelic revolution was, "Ingest those plants and mushrooms and open the doors of perception." But the yin of that process is that those doors can swing too far in the other direction, and we get the equivalent of a kind of data rot, Twilight Language glossolalia or diarrhea. It harkens to a superstitious state of mind that we described in Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare at the dawn of the conversion of the pagan peoples of Europe to Christianity (in cases where that conversion was not forced by state actors like Charlemagne who executed tens of thousands of civilians who happened to be pagans).

In the early centuries of its existence, the Christian path was a clean break from minds so immersed in Twilight Language that their every step was fraught with peril, or significant meaning, which was paralyzing their ability to live, and had to be mediated by a ritual of propitiating the gods with a whole series of superstitious gestures and words. It became a type of madness for which the remedy was the simplicity of the Christian Gospel with its warning that the wicked flee where no one is pursuing them.

Interviewer: What are the internal mechanics or dynamics of Twilight Language?

Hoffman: A dynamic yes, mechanics no, because we're in the realm of art. There is no cuneiform tablet for Twilight Language. It functions more like poetry than physics, giving narrative propulsion to the Cryptocracy's screenplays.

Interviewer: It has no basis in neurology then?

Hoffman: Of course it does, just as, if we observed the brain moved by a speech by Hamlet or the entrance of his father's ghost, we would see neural pathways responding. Does the Twilight Language stimulate neuro-chemical pathways? I would answer in the affirmative.

Interviewer: What chemicals?

Hoffman: The chemicals most closely related to behaviors associated with the evocation of sex and violence: catecholamine and gamma-aminobutyric acid.

The way Twilight Language has cachet now is based partly on the rise of the invisible world. Cotton Mather, the New England witch-hunter wrote a book, Wonders of the Invisible World, which is the subject of much mirth now. We feel very superior to this "poor fool" Mather and his "ridiculous invisible world." Yet we inhabit a world of invisibles beginning with nuclear physics and the atom; a universe we can't see. The "Big Bang exactly 13.8 billion years ago" we are told, is invisible, but it has, we are told, been confirmed by "gravitational waves" — "ripples in space-time" founded on "quantum fluctuations." Here is a whole invisible cosmos in which we invest our belief; we accept it as true because today's priests, who are too sly to call themselves priests, and instead are termed "scientists," declare it to be so. There is even a 20th century religion that adopted the word for itself, "Scientology." The name gives people the ability to be religious while imagining they are scientific; the perfect modern conceit, courtesy of LaFayette Ron Hubbard.

Faith in an invisible world renders us more attuned to Twilight Language and what we have is a much higher sensitivity to magically activated words, what the Pharaonic Egyptians knew as "words of power," acting as a means for imprinting a prefabricated reality—a sibilant whisper of a counterfeit universe—into the mind, as part of a process where people volunteer to have their brains wired to the data hive.

Interviewer: You're saying that in our video age of Internet, TV and movies we're less visual?

Hoffman: We're less literate and therefore more susceptible to the processing of our perceived reality through signs, bytes and slogans. Twilight Language sometimes consists in slogans pregnant with archetypal imprinting, giving narrative propulsion to the pattern theatre that the Cryptocracy weaves with its ritual murders and other types of spectacular crimes.

When I say less visual I mean we are lacking in the type of memory that is jogged by the visual. Mnemonic is a $50 word that simply denotes any device employed as an aid in remembering something. This device can be visual or literary. In the latter case, one can recall the names of the colors of the rainbow by remembering the acronym ROY G. BIV, which is a mnemonic for recalling the names of the colors red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo (black) and violet. Twilight Language sometimes consists of talismanic mnemonics — it summons a mnemonic which the collective subconscious "memorized" long ago, which in turn triggers the thing memorized. For example, "Wicker" is a mnemonic for mind-bending — and for ritual murder.

Interviewer: I don't remember committing the word "Wicker" to memory in connection with serial killings or ceremonies.

Hoffman: True, but you're overlooking a shared subconscious of the human race which Dr. Jung termed "archetypes"— manipulation of those Jungian archetypes, the dreaming mind—the subconscious—by means of Twilight Language, can result in the magical organization of the imagination, and by magical I don't mean enlightening or illuminating, but occluding—narrowing the aperture of our perception, the better to herd us in the direction the Cryptocracy wants us to go. Recall the lines from Christopher Nolan and David S. Goyer's "Batman Begins" movie:

"What's 'scarecrow'?

"Patients suffering from delusional episodes often focus their paranoia on an external tormentor, usually conforming to Jungian archetypes. In this case, a scarecrow."

A scarecrow can be many things: a harmless, man-sized rag doll who frightens away birds and children on the basis of an illusion, or a lethal predator dressed like a scarecrow as part of a disguise or, in "Batman Begins," a drug-induced hallucination so terrifying it "drives men mad" and renders them powerless.

Interviewer: And "Wicker," being part of the Twilight Language, is part of our unconscious?

Hoffman: Not unconscious. It's part of our dreaming or subconscious mind. When summoned into the field of the conscious mind and linked to some of the ceremonies and rites which the police and the news media term serial murders or lone nut killings, it becomes a means for processing our minds and spirits.

Interviewer: Can you give an example of the visual that we've lost?

Hoffman: Marshal McLuhan mentioned the "Stations of the Cross" in the Catholic Church. Each "station" has a carved or painted depiction of one scene from Christ's suffering and death. The believer stands beneath each station while consulting a booklet with a prayer related to the particular scene. This is a process of auto-initiation into Christ's suffering for humanity's sins. The viewer uses the mnemonic of the art work at each station to imprint Christ's passion on the viewer's mind.

Interviewer: Why wouldn't television and cinema fulfill this function?

Hoffman: They don't. They're not memory theaters. TV and movies are predigested. They comprise the Videodrome and they're lacking the interior mental architecture. The Videodrome is external. The memory theatre is internal, mnemonic. The mnemonic process is not intrinsic to cinema and television.

The architecture of the mnemonic has been stripped away by the Videodrome and a pre-packaged hallucination is presented in its stead. It's called entertainment. It's even termed escapism. What does it mean to escape reality? It is to go mad. A series of moving pictures deceive our mind into seeing motion. This is far removed from the mnemonic.

Interviewer: How do you define a person's self-devised memory theatre?

Hoffman: Let me read you the words of the founder of the Jesuits, Ignatius of Loyola, from his Spiritual Exercises, "In contemplation of Christ Our Lord, who is visible, the composition will be to see with the eyes of the imagination the corporeal place where the thing I want to contemplate is found." This is the capacity for interiority which The Machine —call it computers, call it the Alien, the eldritch gods or Skynet — destroys.

Twilight Language moves the interior world into the exterior. It is virtually synonymous with the dreaming mind because of its archetypal cues and content. The subconscious, which is the supreme memory theater above all, is by Twilight Language propelled outside, into the external world, to explosive effect; analogous to atomic physics, which begins in a microcosmic, nearly invisible world and is forced to manifest in the outer world as a mushroom cloud; the mushroom being a symbol of higher consciousness.

Interviewer: Higher consciousness is considered benevolent.

Hoffman: My question would be, from where is this "higher" consciousness derived, from the presence of life or the presence of imminent death?

Interviewer: From death, but it is still a higher consciousness.

Hoffman: Often it's a consciousness tainted by death. It is "higher" than the bovine level of consumerism, by comparison. But there is a consciousness infinitely higher.

Interviewer: What about the idea that Twilight Language is just a code?

Hoffman: A puzzle? Yes, it can be as seemingly as prosaic as that — the "hidden in plain sight" clue. When I was a child I thought that the name of the woman who mercifully wiped the bloody and sweating face of Jesus on his way to Golgotha, was actually named "Veronica." It was only years later that I learned that her name was eponymous and assigned by posterity — "vera icon" viz. "true image." If "Veronica" was the name of a suspect in the vandalism of Michelangelo's statue of David or Moses, or some other prominent art work, my interest in the case would increase. If there were other symbolic names and numbers attached to this hypothetical vandalism then I would be interested to see if a story behind the story was being conveyed, a ritual, related in the language we call Twilight by our latest Doctor Syntax.

Interviewer: You say mathematics has nothing to do with twilight language.

Hoffman: No, I do not. What I say is that it is not mathematical. Would you say that mathematics is a determining factor in Shakespeare's plays? Let's not mystify Twilight Language. It's a play; a drama; a script. It sometimes contains allusions to numbers and that world. Truth or Consequences, New Mexico is located on the 33rd degree line of north parallel latitude and so is the Trinity Site, where the creation and destruction of matter first occurred. Let's distinguish Twilight Language from the priestcraft of scientism; from the mystification that lends an aura of higher expertise to expressions of mathematical formulae when applied to this psychodrama. People think if it's mathematics it can't be delusional. It took one of the leading mathematicians of the Victorian age to prick a hole in that inflated balloon.

In Peter Hunt's fine book about Lewis Carroll's "Alice in Wonderland," he directs our attention to the ostensible nonsense that Alice spouts when she mangles her times tables: "Let me see: four times five is twelve, and four times six is thirteen, and four times seven is – oh dear! I shall never get to twenty at that rate!"

We laugh at Alice's goofy mathematical incompetence because we think we know. After all, it's mathematics and math adheres to fact-based rules. But Carroll is showing us we don't know, because we're only skimming the surface and we're fixed in a mathematical reality that we regard as the only one possible. We should discourage that mentality when undertaking the study of Twilight Language.

Interviewer: What are you saying? That Wonderland math is accurate? That four times five equals twelve, is correct?

Hoffman: I'm not saying it. Lewis Carroll said it, as Peter Hunt revealed. Alice is actually following a logical progression: 4×5 is indeed 12 in a number sequence using base 18, and 4×6 is 13, using base 21. [2]

Mathematical concepts of number, space and time are not limited to Cartesian boundaries. On planet earth, space and time are mediated by the green witch. England's "scientific" occultists established the prime meridian and the measurement of "mean time" at Greenwich. Think about that word's etymology: Green wic, Grenewych, Greenwitch.

If by mathematics you mean that ingenious act which Oxford Math Professor Charles Lutwidge Dodgson (Lewis Carroll) put in his Alice books, then it has a part to play in ciphering and deciphering esoteric communication and signaling. It seems that Lewis Carroll, mathematician though he was, knew this better than most. Logic consists of the White Queen's observation, "The rule is, jam tomorrow and jam yesterday—but never jam today." This is the Mad Hatter's "tea time," wherein Effect precedes Cause. Alice says, "I see nobody on the road," to which the King replies, "I only wish I had such eyes! To be able to see Nobody! And at that distance!"

Anything can happen in Wonderland but it could only have happened the way it did. Robinson Duckworth, the Oxford undergraduate who rowed the boat on the river Isis, while Carroll told the story to ten-year-old Alice Pleasance Liddell, testified that Carroll did so extemporaneously, "off the top of his head," as if he were channeling it from somewhere; or should I say from erewhon.

[2] The progression only becomes erroneous in attempting to reach 20. Cf. Hunt, The Making of Lewis Carroll's Alice and the Invention of Wonderland (Oxford University, 2020).

Where we are warning people away from "science" or more properly, "scientism," is in the field of measurement. How does one measure anything with the yardstick of art? Using that rod to take the measure of Twilight Language is subjective. It's that inherent subjectivity that protects the objectivity of our study. "No phenomenon is a phenomenon until it is an observed phenomenon."

Interviewer: That sounds trite. What's it supposed to signify?

Hoffman: The person self-described as a scientist thinks his observations of the phenomenon must be correct because they are rooted in what he has been taught is an unalterable reality. Quantum physics teaches that when we take a measurement of something, say, for example, the position of a photon, it takes the form of what we are expecting to see. Whereas prior to our measurement, the quantum state of the photon existed as a wavefunction state vector, containing several observations of the quantum state. These are known as superpositions. Each observation in superposition can contradict the other, for instance, observing one photon to be in different locations simultaneously. In the process known as WavePacket Reduction (WPR), when a measurement of the phenomenon occurs, then only one of the anomalous observations which previously existed, is visible; the rest have vanished. We're where Heisenberg was nearly a 100 years ago, the "Uncertainty Principle" consisting of conjugate variables like time, energy, momentum and position that can't all be known simultaneously, and therefore they act as a buffer against man playing god. The nature of the subatomic universe prevents us from knowing everything.

Interviewer: Many scientists would say that what prevents man from playing god is established rules and stable properties, like those set by Albert Einstein concerning the speed of light being the highest possible speed.

Hoffman: On the contrary, those fixed rules pin God down, like a lepidopterist pins a butterfly to a display board. Look at the physics of non-locality by which quantum computers operate: entangled particles are connected to one another from across the cosmos, no matter how distant. Changes in one are conveyed to the other instantly, in other words, at a rate vastly exceeding the speed of light. In Einstein's "reality" they're far away. In superluminal reality they're unified.

Interviewer: So the science of physics is itself subject to art?

Hoffman: It might be best to think of another name for the words "science" and "physics" in that they are so heavily freighted with an allure of infallible determinancy that renders them more theology than evidentiary method. A truth-seeker would want to deflate this priesthood and its vanity, which is particularly evident in the medical profession and one reason why it's so catastrophic to permit these "deities" to dictate public policy.

Interviewer: Other than the Green Witch/Greenwich aspect to time, do you acknowledge a scientific basis to understanding time and even time travel?

Hoffman: Chemistry and physics can help us to have a better understanding of time. If you ponder the anomalies of absolute zero (or as close to that point as science has been able to approach), you observe that it is defined not by what it is, but by what it is not. Whereas, theoretically there is no limit to heat, in the absence of heat, the coldest possible temperature is only -459° F. At this absolute zero (zero Kelvin), the rate of entropy is zero, expressed as:

$$\Delta S \geq 0$$

Delta S (entropy) will reach zero at 0 Kelvin.

Entropy is defined as the degree of chaos, decay or randomness, from the Greek word for transformation (τροπή). So what does this have to do with time? Well, according to the Second Law of Thermodynamics heat passes only one way: from hot to cold. The process is irreversible. It cannot pass backward, from cold to hot. By this means we distinguish time as the difference between this chemical "before" and "after." Our experience of the passage of time — the past, the future and this present moment — is not an illusion. It is a chemical process.

Interviewer: Aren't you contradicting your own statements about "the inherent trickiness of the material universe"? Some quantum physicists have said there is no past or present, only now.

Hoffman: I'm not going to be ruled by a decontextualized platitude designed for mass consumption, which is what you're repeating. Quantum mechanics in its genius and luminescence, when reduced to the common denominator, can begin to resemble jargon and psycho-babble, which science has no model capable of resolving.

Interviewer: The resolution being in the poetic universe beyond numbers and chemicals.

Hoffman: Matter exhibits many anomalies as absolute zero is approached, including bilocation of elements and other quirks and tears in the script of the Cartesian-Enlightenment deists who ruled "science" (and all that hubris that affixed the word science to their arch materialist secular religions, as for example Marx and Lenin's "scientific socialism"), up until the coming of twentieth century quantum physics, when Albert Einstein's EPR theory was defeated by evidence of the quantum entanglement of particles at vast distances, as we've already mentioned, which proceeded from the rise of phenomena into existence when measured, the theory being that the role of the observer is critical to the manifestation of the observation. Here we encounter recondite considerations like wave function collapse.

Some of these mysteries are so arcane they border on parody and even comedy, in the Fortean sense of Charles Fort's hunch that there's a principle that defies every other principle, thereby checkmating the pompous inevitabilist prophecy, rooted in Kabbalah, of a level of omniscient human brain power soon to be obtained and possessed by a class of all-knowing grandees, to whom we will shall owe submission. To maintain that narrative, there can't be too much awareness of the cosmic monkey wrench that, according to Fortean epistemology, is tossed into the machinery of human absolutism and control. Consciousness of that process shatters the glamor and the self-advertised mastery of the Wizards of Tech.

Every significant step taken toward limitless autarchic human and machine control precipitates a loss of control at another level, which is often nearly invisible, even to the would-be Overlords. They will never reach their goal.

In Through the Looking Glass, as Alice spots scented rushes and leans from the boat to pick them, she says, "The prettiest are always further." And she says it with a sigh.

Interviewer: How does your art or poetic sense account for reality when mathematicians can't?

Hoffman: Samuel Goldwyn of the MGM [3] (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer) movie studio said, "Authenticity is everything. When you can fake that, you've got it made."

Interviewer: Words fail me.

Hoffman: You'll recover.

Interviewer: We're in the early decades of the 21st century, where does that put us on your clock of destiny? Are we approaching midnight?

Hoffman: We're past midnight. We're going over to the other side.

Interviewer: What other side?

Hoffman: We're are beginning to live amid the exteriorization of the tulpa.

Interviewer: Where other people's thought forms materialize in physical reality?

Hoffman: In what is called material reality. The Cryptocracy is far along in its success story. Immanentizing the eschaton and giving the appearance of the making manifest of the tulpa in our midst, is part of it.

[3] MGM = 33. The letter m is the thirteenth letter in the alphabet. The letter g is the seventh. 13+7+13 = 33.

Interviewer: What about the monkey wrench?

Hoffman: It's at work, sabotaging the best laid plans of the sorcerers, but it typically doesn't get up to the plate until the ninth inning. The Red Sea was always going to part for the Israelites but not for a long time. Daniel was put out of the den of lions at the last possible moment.

Until then — until the rescue of the predestined — bondage and hypnotic Twilight Language are the order of the day. Consequently, it can be rightly said, yes, it is very late.

Interviewer: If this were true wouldn't it be a huge wakeup call?

Hoffman: Only if it was brought on suddenly and our familiar props were removed. But the opposite obtains. It has come about slowly, although with gradually increasing speed of late. And the props are in place, giving a sense of the ordinary even as the extraordinary manifests before us. One way the props are maintained is based in the fact that we are the first people in recorded history to live in an age in which we can peer through a window and watch the ghosts of more than a century ago moving about. We do this through the old "silent" movies, some of which are now well over a century old. Imagine people in 1910 or 1914 able to watch films of Napoleon fighting the Battle of Austerlitz, or George Washington on his plantation amid his toiling black slaves; or Jane Austen working at her writing desk. If motion pictures of the early 19th century had manifested on film in the early 20th century, much of the world in 1921 would have still looked like 1821, because the people of 1921 would have grown up with those images of clothing and appearances, as we have in our time.

In terms of something readily noticeable, like fashion, we observe that people looked and dressed very differently in 1921 from 1821.

We've grown up with silent movie images and this translates into the somewhat remarkable fact that many people in 2021 dress somewhat similar to the people in 1921: suits, ties, dresses. In 100 years in terms of fashion and visual arrangements of cities and spaces, we haven't moved that far away from 1921. Motion picture technology has made a century-old vision part of our post-modern vision. In the midst of the huge disconnect we are experiencing in the cauldron of the alchemist's "gay science," the moral, cultural, racial, sexual and technological revolution we've experienced, we're nonetheless continuing to inhabit a mise-en-scène from the early 20th century, which is reassuring. It gives a sense of stability and continuity—being comfortably anchored in spite of the revolutionary changes. This is important to the success of The Process, as Arthur C. Clarke showed in Childhood's End, his novel of humanity conditioned to accept Satan in their midst without protest.

Interviewer: Most people don't immerse themselves in silent movies.

Hoffman: Most Americans have seen snippets of silent movies and most Americans have been exposed to, or are familiar at least somewhat, with the Gary Cooper/Clark Gable/Betty Davis/Barbara Stanwyck Americana of the 1930s, the film noir of the 1940s, the "I Love Lucy" of the "Fabulous '50s," and Andy Griffith's Mayberry from the pre-Vietnam 60s — many of these images are still very much present in the psyche of a considerable portion of the American population.

Interviewer: You think this helps to reassure them?

Hoffman: Hypnotically, yes. But as you know, it's a false assurance. Almost all of the actors they are watching in those shows are ghosts; they're long dead. The sets are demolished; where filming was done outdoors in Los Angeles the orange groves are now shopping malls — the quaint neighborhoods razed to make way for 20 or 30 story condominium towers.

We live inside a theatre. We've seen so many "photoplays" and television shows that we all have more than a little of the ham actor in us, the would-be celebrity. Pre-modern children in America were naturally shy. Most of them observed the world in periods of silence. If strangers addressed them or you stuck a camera or a microphone in front of them they would become bashful, mute, though alert and observant. This has been the endearing quality of childhood innocence. But now in our time, many young children who are in front of a camera or a microphone are almost immediately acting and emoting as if auditioning for a part. It's a by-product of spectacular society, where celebrity and exhibitionism are viewed as positive, even when they're negative.

Interviewer: Explain.

Hoffman: Look at Arnold Schwarzenegger the actor. He groped women on the set of his movies. As governor he lied and deceived and favored the corporations. When nurses went on strike for lower patient ratios so they could provide better patient care and quality of life, Schwarzenegger called them "lobbyists for a special interest group." When his trophy Kennedy wife was away for a few hours he took sexual advantage of the family's Mexican maid. This guy seems to be thoroughly rotten, at least in the period to which I'm referring, but he's nonetheless likable old "Arnold, the Guvenator." When someone is famous for being famous, which is an empty and farcical "achievement," then the values being celebrated are eye candy and voyeurism. In spectacular society one can have obviously wicked, corrupt popes, presidents and movie "stars" and the masses will still suck up to them. It's a Hitlerian attraction in a society trained to hiss at Hitler, but the Hitler mechanism—magnetism, charisma—is at the center of America's celebrity culture. If America actually were anti-Hitler it would be anti-celebrity. It would honor and lionize its farmers and carpenters and the mothers and fathers who raise three or five or ten children and give them a decent upbringing. But it's only a paper moon, our society at present; a story board; a stage design.

Years ago I would have followed up this description with the words "Behind that scene exists..." but we're devolving past that direction. Now I would say, "in the midst of" or "in front of this scene," where the tulpa appears among us. It's extraordinary — as if a very ugly, hairy red devil was walking around naked in Mayberry, with a filthy tail, billy goat eyes and horns, genitalia exposed, fire coming out of its mouth, and Barney's still looking for the whisky still patronized by Otis; Aunt Bea is continuing to cook her fried chicken, and Opie is being wisely counseled by his father. This devil walks up and down Main Street exposing himself to girls and boys, enslaves the mayor, disrupts the endocrine system of the people, induces abortions in women and almost nothing is said or done about it by the "good people" of rural, small town America. The tulpa has materialized out of the interior realm into the exterior. The tulpa is here, yet for most of us it is invisible, even though, paradoxically, we can see it.

Interviewer: You're saying America is aborting its babies, exposing its kids to porn, permitting the destruction of the innocent—

Hoffman: What I'm pointing to is an unprecedented level of perversity, the union of opposites, which in very ancient Asian culture was always seen as a harbinger of death, because to maintain—rather than erase opposites and polarities, such as very masculine men and feminine women who are powerfully attracted to one another—it is that magnetic attraction in Nature that gives rise to human life through procreation. To seek to obliterate those natural magnetic polarities, or to homogenize them, is to long for mass death.

In our post-modern death cult, in unprecedented ways, androgyny—the erasure of opposites, the denial of chromosomal reality—prevails under a utopian banner of peace, love, tolerance and a better way of life for all. Yet where opposites converge, there is much death and this is a slaughter house that we are not encouraged to discern, lest it register in our consciousness and awaken us.

According to China's own Health Department statistics, more than 300 million babies, mostly female, have been killed in their mother's wombs in China since 1971. How many western newspaper and cable TV editorials or Hollywood movies have been produced concerning that unimaginable Communist government holocaust? Alas, relatively little or nothing. 300 million missing babies? Yawn.

Republicans in the U.S. are being intimidated by claims from abortion-favoring feminists that "the Republicans are engaged in a war on women." 300 million mostly girl babies have been destroyed in China and it is the anti-abortion Republicans who are "at war with women"? The fact that this claim has any play at all is indicative of mass insanity of "the emperor has no clothes" variety. In 1821 the humanity of black people was denied and their enslavement asserted as a "right."

In 2021 the humanity of unborn human beings is denied and their murder through abortion is asserted as a "right." We're expected to believe that the massive violence of the dehumanized children in the womb has absolutely zero connection to the massive violence and dehumanization of people outside the womb.

We are being led by priests disguised as scientists into a scientism/futurism where the human brain with all of its startling potential for egoism, commands the peasants. Tom O'Hare observed plaintively, "If this year (2021) has taught me anything, it is that people are egregiously prone to be obedient to baseless government pronouncements echoed by many in a mindless and obedient media. That is one of the saddest outcomes of the this (COVID19) pandemic." Dr. Anthony Fauci personified the hateur of a government tyrant who imposes despotism under the banner of medical science.

Stanford University "neuroscientist"/psychiatrist Karl Deisseroth, M.D., PhD. speaks of "sitting and talking to a person whose reality is different from yours — to be face to face with the effects of bipolar disorder, exuberance, charisma...crushing — it can't be reasoned with...as if there's a conceptual cancer in the brain. He saw patient after patient suffering terribly, with no cure in sight."

"Conceptual cancer." That's how this high priest describes people who think differently from him. Allegedly, Dr. Deisseroth seeks to heal the human soul through bioengineering. After all, he went to Harvard and he runs a lab at Stanford, so he knows best. it has been claimed that he seeks to combine the manipulation of light with the manipulation of genes to work a "cure." When one hears jargon like that one sees how utterly primitive it is, despite the fact that it is brought to us in the habiliments of university science, accompanied by command words such as "neuroscience, bioengineering" and "optogenetics." The trigger words formerly were "scientific Socialism," "Better living through chemistry," the "peaceful atom," "Freudian analysis," "Dianetics," and then "Scientology." In the '40s, '50s and '60s these were the futuristic-sounding signs.

One fad, optogenetics, is a technique that allows the high priests to turn our brain cells on and off with a combination of genetic manipulation and pulses of light. This is supposedly being conducted by Dr. Deisseroth, who allegedly confessed to the New York Times that he's applied to his patients the favorite device of the psychiatric priesthood now that lobotomy is out of favor: "I've administered electroconvulsive therapy" (electroshock). Perhaps he sincerely thinks he is genuinely helping humanity. Perhaps his intentions are not malicious. I can't know his motives.

But imagine if Dr. Deisseroth had the stubborn and strong-willed, "different drummer" Henry David Thoreau appear before him as a patient, what he would make of this celibate loner with a preference for living in a hut in the woods? Many people thought Thoreau "couldn't be reasoned with." He must have been afflicted with "conceptual cancer." In the 1960s and '70s we termed such people dissidents and freethinkers, but since then the Machine has ascended above the split-wood-not-atoms crowd. Digitalization has taken command.

Interviewer: What does that signify?

Hoffman: It signifies what John Dee dreamed in the Elizabethan Age, the hegemony of dead matter. April 21, 2014 the New York Times celebrated "brain control in a flash of light." Not one word was printed about the possibility of the misuse of this research. The corporate media are seduced by these egotistical "scientists" possessed of the same mentality that brought us "better living through chemistry, nuclear power too cheap to meter," pharmaceutical drugs in place of nature's herbal medicine cabinet, and the Frankenfood of GMO corn and cloned salmon. We are supposed to defer to the "wisdom" of these big brains, who are affronted and almost shocked by the existence of dissidents who don't get immunized, don't have their babies in hospitals and think the New Testament is a better guide for healing demonic possession, fear and depression than a scientist who can barely believe he is actually "sitting and talking to a person whose reality is different from yours."

The scientific dictatorship is here. Skynet is here. We're voting for these trends with our apathy, in part because we have been taught, through hypnotic induction, that the new world which science, robots and humanoids will forge on behalf of Skynet, will be incredibly thrilling and adventurous; common sense, age old wisdom and prudence be damned.

Interviewer: Some would say you are exaggerating.

Hoffman: It is not an exaggeration to take note of the fact that all life on this planet, from the simplest cell to humans themselves, are all based on the same genetic code, made up of four DNA nucleotides, designated as A, C, G and T. What the Dr. Frankensteins are doing in our time is creating organisms that do not exist in God's creation on earth. These "synthetic niologists" are creating new nucleotides and thereby creating alien organisms — entities with a genetic code of more than four DNA bases.

Interviewer: Which, I take it, means that these are alien life forms, which is what you accuse John Dee of working toward and which Lovecraft predicted was an invasion force about to incarnate through demonic means.

Hoffman: True, but to use the word "demonic" closes the modern mind to the human agents at work — the scientists in serenely shining and peaceful, gleaming, state-of-the-art multi-million dollar laboratories where you'd like your own son or daughter to work, after he or she obtains his or her doctorate from Stanford and does their post-doc at Johns Hopkins. These scientists have pleasant demeanors, are seemingly rational, highly intelligent and idealistic people seeking to "make a contribution to society and the future."

Interviewer: You're poking fun at this.

Hoffman: I'm evoking the banality of evil, and how people's expectations of that evil prevent them from seeing it. They imagine a diabolic operation as being conducted in a foul, dirty place by an obvious madman and his hunch-backed helper. In contrast with that image we have attractive, successful, high-achievers, the envy of many who wish they could rise as high as these god-playing scientists have done. Hannah Arendt saw that Adolf Eichmann was not outwardly a monster, but a bland bureaucrat and that the evil he perpetrated was committed while he was a member of a respected, elite governmental organization. Doing evil was his respectable job.

As we said in the booklet, King-Kill/33, the eternal pagan psychodrama is escalated under these modern conditions.

Sorcery is not what 21st century post-modernists can accept as real; yet in the sub-cellar of their mind, they know it is.

Interviewer: Then it's all over, no hope for humanity?

Hoffman: When you have people enamored of thrills such as sex without children, and the pursuit of their greatest thrill of all, to get as close to death as one can without actually dying, then the prospects are poor in the face of that sort of bestial animalism.

Interviewer: You call it primitive and animal-like but your opponents would say it is visionary and progressive.

Hoffman: It's simian stuff; crude, debased materialism running amok on this planet more than ever in recorded history. Animals are stuck in the carnal although actually that's an insult to my dog, who has a more generous and expansive side to him than many of these master manipulator Brahmins who imagine that their tinkering at one or two degrees in the Cosmic Complexity (for which they have no respect), serves as a god-like rival to the Supreme Being, or may even constitute a surpassing feat of self-initiated godhood.

There is no end to the extremes of delusion to which demonic pride is subject. We are warned of it in the Greek, Roman and Norse myths and in the Book of Revelation. But "The One Ring" that Tolkein warned us about, has us in its power; the same "Ring" that was used to make the "Lord of the Rings" movies in yet another post-modernist act of double-minded negation of the principle being hailed.

The Society of the Spectacle: no matter how sterile and empty it is at its core, it will manage to attract the flies to the spider by the magnificence of the technical, VR, 3-D illusions which is the spider's bait; eye candy for the puffed-up scientoids who, with their personal computers, can access the Oracle of Delphi (the Internet and "Google"), ask it any question and come away satisfied, at least temporarily, with being wired to the data hive. This is how this tethered Group Mind's hive-like energy is harnessed and farmed.

Interviewer: Virtual reality technology is in use and the hallucination is heightened. Real life can be simulated inside a cubicle: sex, exhilarating adventure, travel, space exploration.

Hoffman: State-of-the-art, mass induced hallucination mainly for fun, for "entertainment purposes" of course. So who can object? Just as human embryo manipulation, cloning and genetic modification are sold to us as compassionate medical techniques —to heal the deaf, dumb, and blind; the diabetic, cancerous and heart diseased. Who can object? Even though these same "humanitarians" are exterminating Down syndrome children through abortion. Is there anything more neo-Nazi than that?

Along with VR "reality" there is hologram "reality" that appear in one's living room, not on a wall or on wide screen plasma or 4K television. John Wayne will fight the "Redskins" directly in front of you. The reputed homicidal gas chambers of Auschwitz-Birkenau will pour their toxic Zyklon B onto the dying bodies of Judaic persons who will seem to be writhing and gasping for breath on your carpet.

There is no apparent limit to the degree to which the Spectacle will invade the world because there is no clearly demarcated limit on the ambitions of the technology propelling it. Unsupervised infants and young children walk into highway traffic thinking it's a game, drink lye mistaking it for sugar, hop in a car that is idling and try to drive it. Older and wiser folk restrain their offspring's destructive infantile urges until their children can become adults and obtain enough experience of the technology, learning what is appropriate and what is not.

Infantile scientists however, are unrestrained by our infantile media. The philosophical maxim of the brave new world is—if it is technically or scientifically feasible, then go ahead with it—to hell with the possible unforeseen consequences.

GMO technology is just a few decades old. No one truly knows the possible long term effects, because it has been rushed into use based on the profit motive, and the assurance of the kiddies called scientists who have a string of alphabet letters after their surnames. They decree it to be "safe." How can they know, when only time will tell?

Frances Yates was one of the first historians of science to reveal the sorcery behind "science," how it is being directed by practitioners of ritual magic, how it is not objective, is not based on the best and most open-ended type of measurement, how it has been constrained and pointed in one direction: the perfection of a supposedly imperfect universe through the intervention of human brain power.

Who is doing the covert directing? Let's just say that it is a force that is unimaginably hostile to the human person and Creation itself. As the coils and folds of illusion pile ever higher and thicker, it will be that much more difficult to trace the designs of this force.

Interviewer: But the fact that you are revealing this could alert and awaken humanity.

Hoffman: Maybe. I can certainly visualize it happening. For it to happen a *dis*enchanting process of massive proportions has to occur so that people would choose life over death, and acclimate themselves to the poetic joys of a non-modified natural world, while disconnecting from their previous addiction to digitally-generated illusion.

It would be a test of character and it would require that someone like this writer, though not necessarily me personally, would become adequately well-known to the masses of planet earth, or the West, for a start, to disenchant a population in thrall to The Process. Frankly, it would be a tall order and take a miracle of God's grace, and then at the very least, many hundreds of thousands of people inclined to cooperate with that grace would have to do so.

Interviewer: And if we don't do so?

Hoffman: If we don't, then the Twilight Language hallucination will continue to occupy both mental and, increasingly, actual physical space in our material world and all of the negatives we have been discussing will accelerate.

Interviewer: What would that entail?

Hoffman: It depends on how the situation devolves, and what the script decrees. We could see blood-smoking pyramids where Main Street once was, with people's hearts ripped out of their chests atop the pyramid's capstone, while other folks go about their business at the Aztec shopping mall. They would be physically and mentally sick, enervated and disoriented without knowing it, while being told they were the beneficiaries of advanced science, and immortality-research aimed at working to keep them alive forever. And similar nonsense.

Even now the life is draining out of people. I was born in the 1950s and I can remember how lively people were then, even in the midst of their cigarettes and beer.

Genuine eroticism, not the canned kind applied like a volt of electricity to a cadaver through pornography, or the easy availability of "recreational" sex, but huge, magnetic attraction between men and women with even some of the wildest and most intractable women possessing a certain nurturing kindness, because the vast majority of them had never had an abortion, and the men had not yet begun to develop the "Playboy" mentality that would give rise to a culture-wide selfishness toward women. I could say much more about those times. I'll just say here that the vitality of women and the virility of men was something we could grok, and we can grok the substantial lessening of those qualities since then.

Interviewer: Rather than being something special, this sounds to me like the traditional nostalgic lament of every generation about their own imagined and self-dramatized idyllic past, which they think they experienced as children or adolescents.

Hoffman: You could be right. Thackeray, in his novel The Newcomes writes of a time "when the sun used to shine brighter than it appears to do in this latter half of the 19th century; when the zest of life was keener."

The fact that the lost lament for a better time may be a recurring aspect of human nature doesn't necessarily cancel the likelihood of the universe being changed or disturbed by a signal event, such as the first explosion of the atomic bomb in 1945, the first day in the recorded history of the world when the sun appeared to dawn twice in one morning. The atomic sun manifested in the darkness. "The sun at midnight" was one of the deepest mysteries of ancient Egypt, available to everyone at death, and in the deepest mystery of America mystica, to those living three thousand years later, in 1945.

After that event could the world ever be the same? Was the sky as blue, the soil as verdant? Scientism-trolls would respond that, according to their instruments of measurement, yes, the sky is just as blue, the soil just as fertile. Yet, what are their primitive instruments compared with the vibrations received by a fine-tuned human being?

Interviewer: The war, as you see it, is between the world of numbers and the world of poetry.

Hoffman: Edgar A. Poe championed ratiocination, a form of reasoning which factors the limits of the empire of mathematics. In "The Purloined Letter," Auguste Dupin, Poe's master sleuth, points to the limits of number-calculations: "Mathematical axioms are not axioms of general truth."

James Shelby Downard intuited that the woman playing The Great Whore role in mid-20th century secret society rites in America, spontaneously experienced orgasms in places that were vortexes of power. No mathematics sees that.

By poetic intuition one may discern that magnetism in and between humans is dangerously low now, indicative of pathology; of species attack.

Interviewer: Franz Anton Mesmer, the pioneering hypnotist spoke of "magnetism" and his system allegedly operated by means of it.

Hoffman: Officially the Establishment dismissed Mesmer as a quack. Unofficially it was acknowledged that this invisible magnetism was real.

Interviewer: How so?

Hoffman: Torsten Enßlin is a theoretical astrophysicist at the Max Planck Institute for Astrophysics in Garching, Germany. He states that magnetism "is a little bit like a living organism, because magnetic fields tap into every free energy source they can hold onto and grow. They can spread and affect other areas with their presence, where they grow as well."

Interviewer: Science, until recently excluded this phenomenon from its system of measurement.

Hoffman: In the sense that Mesmer dramatized it, his theatrical presentation of this magnetic reality, yes, that's true. But as early as 1845 the devout Christian genius Michael Faraday detected it by measuring the polarization of light waves at different frequencies. He discovered that a magnetic field rotates the polarization direction of light passing through it. The Faraday Rotation is determined by the power of a magnetic field and the frequency of the light.

Mesmer taught that magnetism permeated the universe. How did he know and teach that fact before Faraday was working? Other than gravity, magnetism is the only known force that determines the structure of the universe. It has the power to do this over immense distances.

Interviewer: If this is strictly a matter of scientific reality why has it become associated with weird spookiness?

Hoffman: Part of it is the mystique of Mesmer's magnetic-based hypnotism and part of it is the nature of the thing itself: it's intangible. Magnetic fields can only be detected when they act on something else. For example, microcosmically, magnetic fields cause charged particles to twist in spirals, which is a mirror image of the macrocosmic reality of the spiral galaxies manifesting on a vast scale.

Interviewer: What's the relationship between magnetism and hypnotism?

Hoffman: Mesmer believed that the human body possessed a magnetic field that could be manipulated to "sympathetically" influence the mind when that field was penetrated.

Interviewer: And the earth has a magnetic field that protects us from the sun's rays.

Hoffman: It partially shields us from periodic bombardment by charged solar particles that comprise the "solar wind."

Interviewer: Didn't Mesmer claim he could detect the strength of a human being's magnetic field?

Hoffman: He at least insinuated that he could and it's probably safe to say he believed he could.

Interviewer: Isn't that impossible?

Hoffman: One should hesitate to use that word because even today so little is known about magnetism by the scientific yardstick. Knowing the nature of the universe is not possible without knowing the nature of magnetic fields which control the density and distribution of cosmic rays in the interstellar realm. This is mostly a mystery to physicists and astrophysicists, at least in terms of what the public is told. Science in the public realm can't answer fundamental questions, such as how the magnetic fields of planets, stars and galaxies are maintained. Scientists continue to depend on the 176-year-old Faraday Rotation for what knowledge they have obtained of the field component of magnetism. Their futuristic quest is to measure Faraday rotation against what's termed the "Cosmic Microwave Background," produced by magnetic fields.

Before quantum physics, before the discovery of what Einstein and others derided as spukhafte Fernwirkung ("spooky action at a distance"), Mesmer's alleged ability to turn his human mechanism into a means of detecting and employing magnetism would have been laughed out of contention.

Interviewer: And now, not so much?

Hoffman: Not now, not until we can answer this question:what's the relationship, if any, between magnetic fields and hypnotic control of the human mind?

Interview: Is this question a pursuit of science?

Hoffman: On the esoteric plane not divulged to the public, I would answer in the affirmative, but in terms of the open scientific study of magnetism it seems to me that scientists are almost solely preoccupied with the macrocosmic; with the connection between detecting magnetic fields in space and correlating those measurements with the development of the structure of the universe. But what if the human body is a microcosm of the universe? In that instance there would be parallel fields available for more localized study. It appears that Mesmer engaged in those studies.

Interviewer: And the Cryptocracy has built upon his work? He was an occultist, right?

Hoffman: A member of a secret society? Reputed to be a Freemason. His educational career, both at Ingoldstadt University and in the medical school at the University of Vienna, was supervised by the Jesuits, and both institutions of course were of the Church of Rome. He was a polymath. He taught Mozart to play the glass harmonica, the strangest western musical instrument with which I'm familiar, other than the Theremin. Mesmer himself played an improved version which rotated on a spindle, this particular updated gizmo having been invented by the Freemason Ben Franklin. Mesmer used the glass harmonica during his employment of magnets and hypnosis. In his book Mémoire su la découverte du magnétisme animal published in 1799, he wrote in number sixteen of his twenty-seven propositions: "It is communicated, propagated and intensified by sound."

Dr. Mesmer stated that magnetism suffused the universe in "tides," which is pretty much the astrophysical description now, two hundred years after Mesmer.

James Shelby Downard spoke of human magnetic fields in mesmeric terms, as "sympathy" and "rapport." He believed this force could be used for good or evil.

I see it as the probable foundation of the control of the Group Mind of masses of people when all of their attention is focused on an object of vision, whether it be a Superbowl football game or the mass murder of Country and Western music fans in the presence of Pharaoh's ritual objects in "Sin City."

The mesmerists employed it to hypnotically control the individual mind. In my view it's also employed to hypnotically control the Group Mind, and as a consequence of the negative use of that control, to gradually condition us into something other than human; into a lower order of being, contemporaneous with the emergence of artificial intelligence (AI) which exerts its own rapport, or what Elon Musk called a weirdness that was likely to be malevolent and that humanity would begin to experience circa 2024.

Interviewer: Hypnosis is induced by inducing a sleeping state and then the hypnotic suggestions are imparted.

Hoffman: Yes, and there are post-hypnotic suggestions as well. It was often said in the early 20th century by people like Gurdjieff that, "Humanity is asleep." It's a common-enough refrain but people miss the fact that it's something that is subject to the change of era. Has the future already happened? The future we visualize as healthy and prosperous and advanced? Did it occur in the 1890s or the 1920s, and has it been downhill since then, commensurate with the conclusion of the dream of natural, life-enhancing progress? Has the eclipse been initiated and engineered by the Revelation of the Method?

Interviewer: Masses of people intentionally exposed to the making manifest of spiritually and psychologically devastating secrets, 'top secrets,' are very much awake.

Hoffman: Up to a point, but after the trauma of the revelation—in the post-adrenalin shock—the percipient is exhausted and sleep is very much desired. The sleeping state is then induced, together with more hypnotic suggestions concerning what constitutes reality. By this method the power and believability of false constructs of reality are exponentially increased as a result of the cycle of unveiling alarming, formerly clandestine facts on the one hand, followed by a sleep which does not refresh on the other.

When I specify sleep, I mean a state of sleep that is occurring during apparent wakefulness. It's repetitive shock therapy for the purpose of psychic driving: Revelation of the Method followed by somnambulism and hypnotic direction...Revelation of the Method followed by....homunculus, Jumbo, the mushroom cloud, king-kill in Dealey Plaza; taking prima materia back to prima terra and jettisoning the landing craft into the sun; twilight language serial murders, Son of Sam and Wicked King Wicker, the Oklahoma City bombing, the 9/11 terror attacks; the attacks in Columbine and Aurora Colorado and Las Vegas, Nevada, accompanied by synchronized clues, and jokes on the victims planted in Hollywood movies and other corporate media.

If there is any "pandemic" today it is the schizophrenia brought about by this bipolar excursion into a madness wherein the kind, benevolent, virtue-signaling leaders we are taught to admire, are revealed in flashes and bursts of illuminating intensity, as monsters of iniquity.

Interviewer: You wrote in Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare that this devolutionary process was "powered" by Twilight Language. You added the irony that what you call "bestialization" was accompanied by widespread announcements that humanity is entering a wonderful new level of advancement, selling us on the idea that we are headed toward becoming an ageless super humanity as long as we cooperate with the zeitgeist.

Hoffman: A super imbecility is more like it.

Interviewer: Give an example.

Hoffman: The manner in which in the year 2020 the television-watching imbeciles swallowed hook, line and sinker the remarkable fable that a seriously over-hyped flu virus dubbed COVID-19 was grounds for locking down the population of the United States, while we all waited for the "benevolent creative geniuses" in the pharmaceutical industry to sell the government a "cure," in the form of a vaccine.

It only takes a little mental acuity and initiative to learn two words that explain how humanity overcame the plagues of the past ten thousand years prior to the dominion of man-made laboratory drugs: the cultivation of natural immunity. How do we develop and strengthen our immunity by natural means?

Since the iatrogenic drug-pushers can't make billions of dollars answering a question like that, which entails the knowledge and use of plant-based medicines and radical lifestyle changes in terms of remineralizing the soil and other health improvements, they direct their moronic TV "news" talking heads to avoid the subject. Consequently, Americans sat stupefied in suspended animation awaiting a miracle at the end of a needle, instead of getting on with life, as the "benighted superstitious peasants" of the past managed to do in the midst of the Spanish Influenza, and other powerful flu outbreaks that occurred periodically throughout the 20th century and which killed hundreds of thousands of people without calling a halt to school, commerce and life outside the home.

By the way, with the introduction of the internal combustion engine and vehicles powered by it, millions of people have been killed in car and truck accidents since the early 20th century, and something like upwards of an average of 40,000 people in America are killed every year, even now. If everyone who traveled in a motorized vehicle wore a NASCAR crash helmet, three-point seat belt and flame retardant suit, those deaths and crippling injuries would be dramatically reduced. Do we see any sustained demands for those reforms on the part of the Establishment media's safety campaigners who virtually shut down this nation to "save lives" during the "COVID-19" epidemic of 2020-21?

Improperly prescribed pharmaceutical drugs kill hundreds of thousands of Americans per annum. Outcry? Reforms?

COVID-19 has been the focus of a selectively indignant media-panic with an agenda of social engineering having little or nothing to do with the health and safety of the people.

Interviewer: The hidden agenda.

Hoffman: This is the Black Jack game. It's not hidden. In the 1930s there was a Saturday afternoon movie serial featuring a Chinese villain, "Ming the Merciless." In 1981 Dean Koontz, writing under the pseudonym Leigh Nichols, published The Eyes of Darkness. On p. 353 of the paperback reprint edition printed under his real name, Mr. Koontz writes, "...China's most important and dangerous new biological weapon in a decade. They call the stuff 'Wuhan-400' because it was developed at their RDNA labs outside of the city of Wuhan. Wuhan-400 is a perfect weapon...."

On page 356 we read, "Bollinger knew how fast Wuhan-400 claims its victims, and he just panicked. Flipped out. Apparently, he convinced himself he could run away from the infection. God knows, that's exactly what he tried to do."

Interviewer: Are you saying Kootnz's Wuhan-400 was a type of precursor Twilight Language?

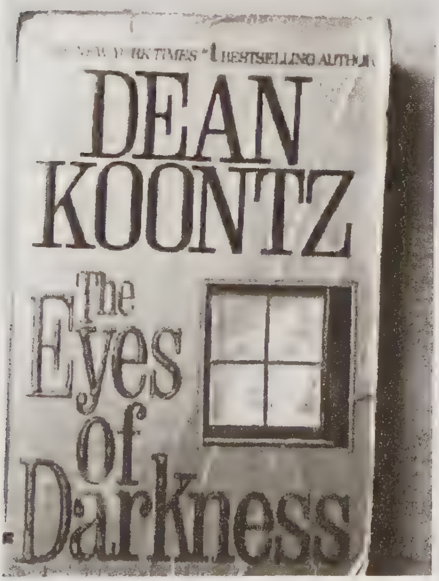
Hoffman: On page 364 it's revealed that the character Danny's "newfound psychic abilities were a result of...his repeated exposure to Wuhan-400."

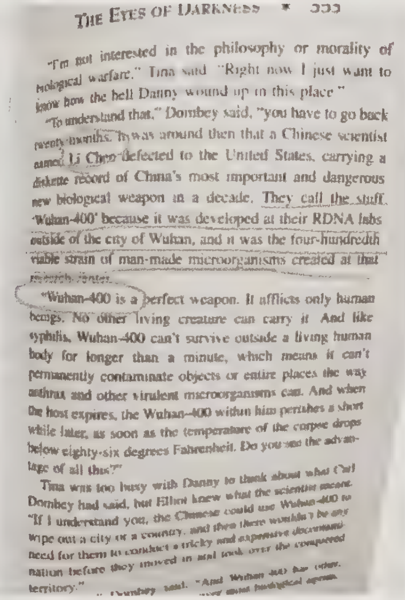
Interviewer: So this Danny person sees things most of us can't after he contracts the Wuhan-400 virus? Are you suggesting that Koontz's The Eyes of Darkness has something to do with COVID-19 and the 21 Gateway?

Hoffman: Divide the number 400 Dean Kootnz identified with Wuhan by the COVID number 19 which Donald Trump identified with Wuhan China, and you have 21. [4]

Interviewer: What does this mean?

Hoffman: It's a haunting. As far back as 1576 Fleming in his Panopl. Epist. (228) made a medical reference to being "haunted with a fever," but by 1594 Shakespeare was using the word in terms more familiar to us: "...haunt me in my sleep, to undertake the death of the world." (Richard III, Act 1, Scene 2). There is also the medieval connotation of haunting as being habituated to some thing or event.





THE EYES OF DARKNESS ✶ 333

"I'm not interested in the philosophy or morality of biological warfare," Tina said. "Right now I just want to know how the hell Danny wound up in this place."

"To understand that," Dombey said, "you have to go back twenty months. It was around then that a Chinese scientist named Li Chen defected to the United States, carrying a diskette record of China's most important and dangerous new biological weapon in a decade. They call the stuff 'Wuhan-400' because it was developed at their RDNA labs outside of the city of Wuhan, and it was the four-hundredth viable strain of man-made microorganisms created at that research center.

"Wuhan-400 is a perfect weapon. It afflicts only human beings. No other living creature can carry it. And like syphilis, Wuhan-400 can't survive outside a living human body for longer than a minute, which means it can't permanently contaminate objects or entire places the way anthrax and other virulent microorganisms can. And when the host expires, the Wuhan-400 within him perishes a short while later, as soon as the temperature of the corpse drops below eighty-six degrees Fahrenheit. Do you see the advantage of all this?"

Tina was too busy with Danny to think about what Carl Dombey had said, but Elliot knew what the scientist meant. "If I understand you, the Chinese could use Wuhan-400 to wipe out a city or a country, and then there wouldn't be any need for them to conduct a tricky and expensive decontamination before they moved in and took over the conquered territory."

[illegible] Dombey said. "And Wuhan-400 has other, [illegible]

Interviewer: And the significance is what?

Hoffman: Haunting us with the spectre that COVID-19 was staged. Here's another chapter of the psychodrama that shapes the fable being conveyed by those who have traveled to the subterranean crypt and returned to our world to tell about it. [5]

[4] To be specific, exactly 21.0526315789.
Separating the decimal numbers as: 05.263 and 15.789 and then adding them = 21.052.

Interviewer: In other words, a script.

Hoffman: In the argot of dramaturgy, script is shorthand for manuscript. In the twentieth century it denoted a "shooting script" fashioned in the curious craft of writing for cinema, television and video gaming. In the age of electricity, much of what has been used to process a mass audience is from a script, particularly fallible forecasts about the future that are presented as infallibly prescriptive. In the sense we're discussing here however, this haunting and the subsequent memory shaping and encoding—it seems to be a more venerable process—the shadows that dance around the campfire and the musical intonations of the bard as her voice enraptures those gathered there.

Interviewer: We see it and we don't see it.

Hoffman: Our subconscious groks it, to use Robert Heinlein's term, and as we proceed through this Time of the Gateway, we are seeing the story emerge into our waking consciousness and even materialize as a physical presence.

Interviewer: Is there an inception point for this scripting? Downard said the plan for the JFK assassination was laid in Shakespeare, New Mexico and the Storyville section of New Orleans.

Hoffman: In the early modern era we see it first in the West in the origin of the Rosicrucians with the publication over the period from 1614 to 1615 of their, at that time, anonymous texts, Fama Fraternitatis and Confessio Fratenitasis, ostensibly anti-Catholic tracts but actually products of papally-enabled Kabbalistic gnosis.

Interviewer: Which is what?

[5] To our knowledge, author Dean Koontz is not and was not involved in any conspiracy or wrong doing relating to his novel, to Wuhan or the pandemic. His book reflects well on his talent and prescience.

Hoffman: The human alchemy of "Magia and Cabala" pioneered by that prodigy of the Church of Rome, Count Pico della Mirandola. The Rosicrucian texts announced the formation of a secret society dedicated to shaping and directing science. The inaugural texts were authored by members of the "Tübingen Circle," a group whose German-Papist-Nominalist forefathers 125 years earlier, had initiated the first concerted intellectual and theological propaganda for ecclesiastical permission for usury.

Interviewer: You claim that the manifestation in the sky of the mushroom cloud by the explosion of the first atomic bomb, at the terminus of the old Mexican road known as the Journey of the Dead Man, on the 33rd degree of north parallel latitude, at the "Trinity Site," in the U.S. state whose nickname is "the Land of the Enchantment" is a direct result of the occult scripting of the Rosicrucian Ludibrium, correct?

Hoffman: It's more than a script, don't you think? It's a haunting tale contrived by an apparition bearing the vanilla names "bureaucrat" and "technocrat."

Interviewer: Which you say is the smokescreen behind which the occultism is hidden because it's so improbable coming from nerdy functionaries like that.

Hoffman: It would not have been improbable in 1615 when the Fama and the Confessio were presented in terms of the yearning for an advanced science. The Rosicrucian texts were couched in the lofty rhetoric of humanist calls for "reform," in terms of advanced propulsion of the acquisition of scientia est potentia, the new age of scientific power over nature.

The first edition of the Confessio, was published in Latin, together with something called the Consideratio brevis, an abstruse alchemical treatise by the enigmatic "Phillippus a Gabella." This person's Consideratio was known in English as a "Short Consideration of the More Secret Philosophy." It was a Hermetic explication of the Monas hieroglyphica that had been formulated by the English mathematician Dr. John Dee, during the time he served as sorcerer for the regime of Protestant Queen Elizabeth I. We are a bit behind the times in being disinclined to conceive of the mathematics of sorcery at the Trinity Site in 1945.

Interviewer: Why did the elite of the early 17th century see nothing sinister in magic married to mathematics?

Hoffman: One of the strengths of Frances Yates was her study of the difference between how magic in medieval times was perceived, as compared with during the Italian Renaissance. In the Middle Ages magic was almost always viewed as filthy, dark and demonic. By popularizing the concept of an “angelic Catholic” Kabbalah, allegedly representative of God’s own branches of divine knowledge, Pico della Mirandola and his Medici network cleaned up the image of sorcery and identified mathematics and the other learned disciplines with it. From that infernal marriage, both Cartesian mechanism and scientism’s “repair” (tikkun olam) of a supposedly “imperfect Creation” through the intervention of human brain power arose, with fairly disastrous results for Nature and this planet, as witnessed in the Land of Enchantment’s spectacular theatrical crucible, 330 years later.

Interviewer: How can the deterministic world of science find common cause with sorcery?

Hoffman: As you know the universe as envisioned by quantum physics is not deterministic, it’s indelibly probabilistic. Quantum states reflect our own knowledge of physical reality, rather than being faithful representations of something that exists independently. A case in point are the particles that don’t have definite properties until those properties are measured.

Interviewer: And you believe that?

Hoffman: It may or may not be prudent to believe it. It does however beg the question, “Is there a hidden deterministic reality that’s not modeled by the mathematics of quantum mechanics?”

Interviewer: How are we missing the whole science and magic connection?

Hoffman: It hasn't been missed by the New Age and hippie movements, beginning in the 1960s, though the knowledge was mutilated and misdirected. There are shelves of books and films devoted to it. The "Tao of Physics" etc.

Interviewer: Not in connection with the atom bomb.

Hoffman: Other than meditation on Oppenheimer's observation from the Bhagavad Gita which he allegedly uttered at the detonation, "I am become death, the shatterer of worlds."

Interviewer: I thought we were in the Revelation of the Method era?

Hoffman: We are, but there are paradoxes generated, adumbrated, as expressed in the maxim "hiding less in order to hide more," something which occasionally attends the Revelation but is not reducible to it.

Interviewer: Then it undercuts the Revelation.

Hoffman: Not if, however apparently circuitous the route, it leads to its manifestation.

Interviewer: How?

Hoffman: Hiding less in order to hide more seems to me to be an adjunct of the Revelation of the Method process itself. It's possible that the process doesn't operate in alignment with our expectations, for example that it's almost always going to manifest as a combustive flash. It appears to function in certain circumstances in ways that are analogous to what's known in computer science, in the year 2021 anyway, as iO, short for "indistinguishability Obfuscation." iO enables the creation of "deniable" encryption, wherein the user can plausibly convince a percipient that she was sent an entirely different message from the one actually transmitted. They are given the actual message but they don't recognize it. A method of obfuscating processing, rendering it indistinguishable, involves initiating people into the program without them perceiving the program's internal secrets. That's comparable to homomorphic computer encryption, in which a cloud computer has the ability to compute encrypted data without acquiring its internal dynamics.

Interviewer: Where does the Revelation of the Method come into play in this scenario?

Hoffman: Well, in that case you have RQM, which is relational quantum mechanics, which asserts that the value for one system is always relative to the system it's interacting with. For example, time and space. Time relations among events are constituted by the specific physical relations obtaining between them: for instance, the ongoing presence in time of a haunted place. Charged events occurring in a specific place can manifest in perpetuity in future time as a "haunting." To create this perpetuity an action is "charged" through expertly calculated, impeccably executed rituals, sometimes involving the shedding of blood.

Interviewer: How is the expertise to accomplish this gained?

Hoffman: Through what formerly was known as sorcery.

Interviewer: And you think this is what some "serial murders" and "lone nut gunman" type shooting massacres really are, using magical, ceremonial phenomena in space for haunting future time; channeling it in directions where the sorcerers decide it has to go to achieve their supreme objective?

Hoffman: Haunting the future, yes. Another word would be imprinting the future, so that it bears the stamp and image of the sorcerers. Out of that alchemy comes a drastically occluded vision that can't conceive of anything other than what we're told the future will be. And the command ideology has prophesied that humanity will settle for it because they can't see how it can go any other way. Late in the game, when the full Revelation of the Egyptian-thanatos, occult criminality is made manifest, it won't matter. That's Black Jack's wager.

Interviewer: And less of this is hidden by the Revelation of the Method pageantry, so that more can be concealed. That's the "21" Black Jack stage you claim we're in.

Hoffman: Yes, as we're led through the 21 Gateway, certain strategies, tactics and methods of operation remain concealed in the short term, for the purpose of successfully performing, without obstruction, the final revelation, according to what I surmise is a primordial script that gained motive force in the city-of-dark-night that was ancient Egypt, and then fueled by the two-tiered law-givers and secrets-keepers of every eon, and whose ultimate fulfillment is reputedly destined to be "expertly calculated" and "impeccably executed."

Interviewer: For the purpose of?

Hoffman: For the permanent ascendance of the enemy of the human race. There's a persistent legend that Satan can make people stronger, that he wants them to have joy, unlike God who is portrayed as a nay-sayer and killjoy. But actually Satan is the enemy of the human race. His empire consists of abortion and autopsy and the dominion of dead matter.

Interviewer: As a Biblical Christian how do you reconcile this dark future with Scripture?

Hoffman: Because I explore the beliefs and mechanisms of the Cryptocracy, it doesn't follow that I personally believe in their efficacy or fulfillment. When a psychiatrist provides a case study of a psychotic patient's delusions it doesn't signify that he shares those delusions.

The confusion arises in the concept of potency. Unlike an everyday schizophrenic who possesses no more than average personal power or wealth, the psychotics running the occult imperium are potent operators who have convinced large swaths of humanity to buy into their deceptive phantasmagoria. Sociopathic master criminals often possess a considerable capacity to successfully mount swindles and fraud. When this capacity is repeatedly honed, improved and passed down to the heirs of the gnosis by a criminal gang that has utilized these sophisticated techniques of mind control for millennia, the hallucination they project will become a kind of reality for much of humanity.

Interviewer: With quantum physics in mind, don't we have to question what reality is?

Hoffman: The yardstick of quantum physics serves as a check on our arrogance and a reminder that any measurement that falls short of the highest aspiration for truth and the purest curiosity, will be a subjective and corrupted one.

Interviewer: Quantum physics is wrong then in suggesting all of our perceptions about reality are subjective?

Hoffman: We go wrong when we fail to recall that quantum physics itself is a form of measurement. Its quantifications are subject to the same limitations as all other evaluations and computations.

Interviewer: Then we're locked in a cognitive trap set up by an occult reality, with no chance of escape. Trapped by freeze-the-secrets/thaw-the-secrets; and hide-less-to-conceal-more, Revelation of the Method lockdown hypnotic control, dead matter supremacy.

Hoffman: That's the proper belief seeded by Control.

Interviewer: According to you that's our present reality.

Hoffman: That's the present script.

Interviewer: It's our reality, in the present!

Hoffman: No. The present "reality" doesn't exhaust the reality that's out of sight and beyond our comprehension.

Interviewer: I'll anticipate you're going to say, "The reality that is Jesus."

Hoffman: I'm saying we should deal in Nature, Creation and the cosmos. A play has been run on us to believe in polytheism, the notion that there are two supreme beings, Jesus and Satan, and that it has yet to be determined who shall win and reign.

The reality is that the person who raises people from the dead and raises Himself from the dead, is in charge of the universe. In Matthew 28:18 it is written that all authority in heaven and earth has been given to Jesus. The impressive sorcerers and occultists that we've been discussing are in fact pitiful chumps. The dazzling eschatology they've devised with extraordinary virtuosity, the glamor they've employed to induce in us obsequious devotion and shuddering awe, is one act in the infinite theatre of God's inescapable will.

Interviewer: You worked as a hospital orderly in a large psychiatric facility in upstate New York.

Hoffman: Yes, a psychiatric hospital of some fifteen hundred patients with the Twilight Language keyword, "Willard" in its name — Willard State Hospital, a.k.a. Willard Psychiatric Center.

Interviewer: Is there a Twilight Language dictionary? How do you determine what is a key word in this lexicon?

Hoffman: I don't think it's so formal. It's often a matter of intuition and pattern detection. And then too, the phenomenon is shape-shifting. Personally, for me there are a number of ways to try to detect a key word or phrase in this context, most often when it becomes prominently associated with something truly out of the ordinary. The word "wicker" for example, which, as I said earlier, is associated historically with ritual immolation, and etymologically with the bending of reality. Then it crops up in the symbol-laden, serial-killer book, The Silence of the Lambs. Furthermore, a member of the Son of Sam serial murder cult signed his letter to New York reporter Jimmy Breslin, "Wicked King Wicker." Wicker is a palimpsest of Twilight Language, a form of communication which bends the ordinary reality of our half-asleep, workaday consciousness and which can be formed and imprinted through selection, repetition and association: selecting a word that's usually already freighted with etymological weirdness, and then repeatedly associating it with, for example, ritual murder, so that it becomes a type of invocation.

Interviewer: Is there a twilight language separate from human intervention?

Hoffman: That's a worthy question and to explore it we should ask another: how does synchronicity arise and order itself? Is it exclusively manipulated by an extra-human agency? If not, what role does human agency play? Using Mesmer as a navigator, is there a kind of Nikola Telsa-like “tower” or “antenna,” not necessarily purely physical, that attracts and orders synchronicity? If something like that exists, is it aimed, like a weapon or a means of engineering humanity? If so, how does it operate and who is the operator?

Interviewer: Would you say that the ability to perceive these signals or translate this language is not mental illness?

Hoffman: Wouldn’t the ability to detect patterns that actually do have significance as “Twilight Language” be a stepping stone to seeing the operations of the world we inhabit with greater clarity?

Interviewer: Leading to total clarity?

Hoffman: A claim of total clarity overlooks that inherent trickiness of the material universe since The Fall.

Interviewer: Looks like we’re back to Original Sin again.

Hoffman: People imagine that seeing the world as cursed by Original Sin is a needlessly prejudicial and negative form of inevitabilism that creates the condition it presumes to diagnose. The “positive thinker” believes that each person creates the world they perceive around them with their own thoughts, which is true, but only up to a point. One cannot become God through one’s thoughts. It is only within God’s Creation and within the time, space and personnel that God has brought into existence, that viewing all of that created phenomena with a positive view of potentiality, makes it resonate on a higher plane of harmony. And then only to a point, because how do you banish the darkness, the accuser, this satan, this force that is the opposite of love?

We know two world-champion positive thinkers who have written books and founded successful, transformative businesses founded on positive thoughts and affirmations. They traveled a long way ahead and they continue to go that way, but a few years ago they suffered an enormous setback that nearly destroyed all of their work in a major American metropolis. In the end even they had to concede that they were horribly attacked by The Darkness, due to the fact they were manifesting love to such a degree that the Darkness intervened with very serious consequences for their commercial enterprise, which also happened to be philanthropic.

Yes, good comes out of adversity, but the point is that the force we might wish to denominate as The Opposite of Love, is a function of the distorting process wired into the post-Edenic material universe—a Christian would say it manifested "After the Fall." Like the existence of gravity and magnetism, The Opposite of Love is so fundamentally wired into our world it is outside the process whereby phenomena are called into existence by our positive or negative attention.

Interviewer: I'll return to what you said was loaded with negative connotations and ask you, are you willing to say that another name for the "inherent trickiness of the material universe" is Original Sin?

Hoffman: Yes, but only if it's understood to denote an event that occurred after a harmonious primeval relationship with the Creator was sundered. To state that the material universe is inherently tricky from inception, in its very nature, would be to succumb to the error of Platonism—the occult detestation of Creation paradoxically coming up with utopian programs—what Thomas Molnar termed the perennial heresy, the attempt to build a planetary paradise with the concomitant belief that congenitally flawed, postlapsarian human nature can be altered independent of Jesus Christ.

Interviewer: This is bleak. Humans have to huddle in perpetual pessimistic wariness? That's their only path out of the occult?

Hoffman: Where you see pessimism I see a joyful community of brothers and sisters in Christ, having an awareness of human folly and a healthy suspicion of kings, governors, dictators and rulers in general. First, we acknowledge that God is the author of our inalienable human rights. When the Creator is removed from the equation then the Leninist, the Maoist or the neo-Nazi steps in to say that rights are conferred by The Party, and can be legally and ethically withdrawn by The Party. Second, where fallen human nature is acknowledged (which is a supremely anti-occult acknowledgement), flawed human beings will not be entrusted with unrestrained authority.

Interviewer: So all that is good in community and brotherhood is explicitly Christian, and anything outside of it is not? For a collector of Fortean anomalies like you, that's pedestrian.

Watkins Glen

Hoffman: Fortean anomaly? Let's travel to a glen bearing the name of Sherlock Holmes' assistant, Watkins. The date is July 28, 1973. The site is the largest gathering in the history of the United States. 600,000 people in Watkins Glen, New York for the "Summer Jam" rock music festival, featuring The Band, the Grateful Dead and the Allman Brothers, all taking place on the "Psychic Highway"—the 42nd degree of north parallel latitude. Other than cops outside the concert attempting to direct traffic, among those 600,000 people there was no policing and there was no crime reported. There were however dozens of cases of people ill from drug overdoses and two babies were born. A "city" of that size enjoying that level of almost complete freedom from crime, is fairly unique.

Interviewer: It wasn't a Christian gathering.

Hoffman: True. Christians were present, however. There had to have been prayer and supplication in a population of that size.

Interviewer: Still, it's an anomaly. You mention births. No deaths?

Hoffman: One death.

Interviewer: Do you know who?

Hoffman: Yes. His name was Willard.

Interviewer: How did he die?

Hoffman: He burned to death, Icarus-like.

Interviewer: In Watkins Glen? How?

Hoffman: The official story is that he was a 35-year-old sky-diver who parachuted out of an airplane and then caught fire as he flew through the air.

Interviewer: And the unofficial story?

Hoffman: Well there's this labyrinth see, and then there's this Greek son of Daedalus who possessed the secret of it, who's warned not to fly too high. And then there's Willard Smith, age 35, who flew too high over Watkins. Whether he had the secret of the labyrinth I don't know.

I do know that Willard resided in the city of Syracuse in upstate New York. Its namesake is the ancient Greek city of Syracuse; the one-time capital of Greece's Sicilian colony.

Wikipedia and the New York Times, two sides of a counterfeit media coin, both report he carried flares that set his "suit" on fire.

Some of his friends and sky-diving students regarded Willard as a "daredevil." At Watkins he carried aloft an artillery simulator, akin to the M-18 smoke grenades that were somewhat notorious for malfunctioning. And this unstable artillery gadget appears to have exploded prematurely while it was on Willard's chest-mounted reserve parachute.

Willard Psychiatric

Interviewer: You believe Willard is a significant Twilight Language name and you worked at the facility that bore that name. Did anything strange happen there?

Hoffman: One could say that when strangeness becomes commonplace it's no longer strange, which is a description of the process of human alchemy.

Interviewer: Yet this alchemical processing renders the majority of people living in modern times evil, which is very strange.

Hoffman: Not evil, but lukewarm, which T.S. Eliot observed was worse than evil. As far back as 1933 he told Paul Elmer More, "Not many people are alive enough to be evil." He said that the number who need to "borrow vitality and can't pay it back is immense."

Willard itself was indeed a place of high strangeness, much like the Willard Hotel in Washington D.C. and the action in Richard Brautigan's book, Willard and His Bowling Trophies.

I was born and raised in an upstate New York town on the "psychic highway." Willard was approximately 20 miles south of our family home. When I was a child I heard the word Willard and it gave me the willies. I overheard grown-ups talking, sometimes in whispers, other times in anguished shouts and cries, about someone having to be "sent to Willard," or as a threat, sometimes idle, that a person, "Ought to go to Willard!" When I was about twelve I was walking to my grandparent's house on North Main Street, and I witnessed an altercation in a parking lot behind a residence. I recognized a short man who worked for the city highway department, grappling with his wife as she seemed to be trying to enter a car and I heard him say, "They're going to take you to Willard if you keep this up!" It was a refrain, like a fragment from a song; an ear worm one can't entirely dispel.

It seemed in my youth that people in my town of some 20,000 were either going to Willard or coming out of Willard, or they were patients in Willard. The sound of that name conveyed to me a nervous, jangling feeling, as well as a place of confinement. Then when I was in my early 20s I found myself employed there.

Interviewer: Were you afraid to be there?

Hoffman: I was never afraid there. I was sad at times and at other times joyful, and even elated.

Interviewer: Why weren't you afraid?

Hoffman: Willard was located on what might be called a white or crystal stream. I'm not speaking literally, but in terms of the spirit of the place, the genius loci. It was a beautiful location on the shore of Seneca Lake, with magnificent deciduous trees, a fine theatre building that was many decades old at the time. It exuded peace and serenity. In autumn I considered it one of the loveliest places I had ever seen.

Interviewer: No haunted buildings, no feelings of menace?

Hoffman: One building, which had been the original asylum from the 19th century, was alleged by some to be severely haunted. It was vacant save for a few secretarial offices at the front of the building, on the lakeside. I knew an employee who was also a semi-professional thief and he told me of how he would enter the building at night to steal antiques, and as greedy as he was, he had to give up his burglaries because he was too badly frightened on occasion to proceed.

Interviewer: In what way?

Hoffman: With an overwhelming sense of foreboding, which may have led him to hear noises and see lights.

Interviewer: What had happened in that building?

Hoffman: In the 19th century? Misery. People confined, chained, beaten.

Interviewer: Did you ever enter it?

Hoffman: A couple of times in the course of my duties I had to visit the secretarial pool there at the front. I did not feel or notice anything weird or unusual. The building was architecturally distinguished; a kind of solemn Victorian style, but since what frightened the bejeebers out of me in that time (the 1970s), was a garishly lighted, soullessly concrete K-Mart store, that old building seemed benevolent by comparison. The secretaries were women, some of them young, who enlivened the quarters they occupied. I was told that few if any lingered after hours or in the dark, and that none wanted to be alone there, but I don't know how true that is.

Interviewer: Did you have access to the rest of the building?

Hoffman: I could have had access. I had access to almost the entire campus, which was hundreds of acres, including a by-then abandoned farm and orchards. Like most of the employees on the floor, I had the master key that fit the doors of every ward and every room where patients were housed.

Since I was trusted with that key, I could have asked someone to let me in the back part of the old asylum, but I didn't and I can't say why, for certain. I passed it every day and it seemed to have eyes like the House of Usher, but in comparison to the world that patronized K-Mart it just didn't seem sinister to me on the same scale of horror.

I lingered on its lawn and sometimes took my lunch in the shade of its maple trees. I respected it as a fixture of a time and place that had its own context that couldn't and shouldn't be judged by the modern mentality.

Interviewer: What happened to you when you went to K-Mart?

Hoffman: When I went to K-Mart? I felt blinded by its harsh light, that cash register light, the light of commerce without human concord, amid junk for sale, the decent town folk who became ugly in that light. I was uneasy, nervous and even embarrassed when I was in establishments such as K-Mart. I tried to avoid them. I had no luck in places like that. They were more haunting than Willard but not gothically so, not in that classically spooky way we've come to equate with evil.

Interviewer: "Willard" had been a locus of strangeness for you while you were growing up and all of a sudden it became benign?

Hoffman: Sometimes benign, even though death both gradual and violent occurred there, and the stifling of life, the wasting of lives, but also there were lay saints residing there, and by that I mean inmates who were too good, too holy, too kind, to prosper in our society's rat race, and they took refuge at Willard and the extent to which Willard offered them asylum as opposed to treatment, it was a boon.

Interviewer: What role did you play within that context.

Hoffman: I tried to the best of my ability to offer the people confined there what Dorothy Day termed hospitality.

Interviewer: Not treatment?

Hoffman: In the original understanding of an insane asylum, it was a place of refuge and protection for gifted and troubled people who would otherwise be exploited and mistreated by the outside world. In this sense of asylum one offers above all, hospitality.

Interviewer: What was wrong with Willard?

Hoffman The heavy drugging and electro-shock therapy, which were two main forms of what you would call "treatment" when I was employed there. Mental illness becomes iatrogenic —is manufactured—in people by those methods. One woman patient in her 30s had experienced more than a hundred shock "therapies" and was violently insane as a result. She caused the death of a beautiful octogenarian lady patient on the floor above the one on which I worked.

There were some psychodrama sessions that probably did good and there was a young psychologist who had conversations with acute— meaning short-term—care patients, which probably helped them. But the main point of these facilities should be to protect the lay saints from the outside world and protect the world from the possessed. That's what an asylum is and that's what Willard appears to have been.

Interviewer: You had patients who committed suicide, who murdered people.

Hoffman: Yes. One of our patients had had sex with a cow. People took their own lives. A young man who was released into the community on a weekend pass, returned home ten miles down the road and slaughtered his entire family while his father was absent. He killed his mother and his siblings. We had people guilty of infanticide.

We also had poets and pianists and tragic ones who had been there for forty years. Chain-smoking Arthur Rimbauds. Wives of Cornell University professors. Cornell University students. Vietnam veterans with post traumatic stress. A father-son psychiatric team wherein the psychiatrist father had his psychiatrist son committed by court order. Employees who were admitted as patients; all under the aegis of "Willard."

Interviewer: Aside from this mayhem was there anything occult going on?

Hoffman: That's a good question because the Cryptocracy in the past spread the legend and possibly believed it, that certain "mentally ill" people "shine" in the sense of levels of psychic ability or potential, and that these people are used or farmed in some way. I was only at Willard for a little over a year and in that time I can't say I observed any Svengali at work in that way, but the potential was always there. James Shelby Downard believed that something like that happened to him when he was committed to Bolivar State Hospital against his will. He felt he was tortured and abused there. That is perhaps why for the rest of his life he had tremendous compassion for marginalized and damned people he considered genuine scapegoats.

Electro-shock therapy is torture. I was ordered to assist at one shock treatment and that was the first and last time that I did so. I told them they could fire me but I would never help electro-shock another patient again.

Interviewer: Well, was Willard a sinister place or not?

Hoffman: For the brief time I was employed it was both a blessing and a curse for the patients, depending on their circumstances. In the nineteenth century it seems to have been a horrorshow, but what hospital for the insane wasn't in that era?

Interviewer: You see the name Willard as part of the Twilight Language.

Hoffman: I see that someone or some thing, whatever it may be—and I don't discount coincidence, I only ask if coincidence itself is somehow governed and arranged—the name Willard has associations with madness and power that may have, or may have had for a time, an imprinting function on the Group Mind.

But in terms of my experience there, it would be wrong to say it was unrelievedly negative or horrible.

Sometimes I would pose as a patient.

Interviewer: What do you mean?

Hoffman: I worked the day shift, Tuesday through Saturday, and Saturday was a comparatively slow day apart from emergency cases the sheriff would drag in shackled. The main event of Saturday was escorting patients to Hadley Hall, which was the large and lovely old theatre, for a movie. I remember watching a movie there with my patients which was the version of "Tom Sawyer" starring Jody Foster and Warren Oates, with a lovely soundtrack by the Sherman brothers.

Many of my older patients and some young ones were dressed in cast-off clothing that would be valuable today as vintage '50s and early '60s fashions, but which were out of place in the mid 1970s. Sometimes I would dress in the same vintage clothing as my patients and instead of remaining inside the theatre after escorting them there, I sat outside with the patients who were nicotine fiends and kept them company while they smoked. I wanted to see how other employees treated them when they assumed they were alone only with patients present. I remember one lady employee arriving after we seated ourselves outside. She began to be quite rude to one of my patients and I told her so. Thinking that I too was a patient she scolded me to sit down and shut up. When I protested her indignities she raised her hand as if to slap me. It was at that point that I reached into my pocket and fished out the master key that only employees possessed. Fixing her startled countenance with a glare, I dangled the key in front of her eyes and said, "That's no way to treat a vulnerable person."

She was shocked. She scurried into the theatre and I like to think that she afforded the afflicted better care after that.

Interviewer: Were you ever worried that by masquerading as a patient you might cross the line and lose your identity?

Hoffman: I wouldn't call it a masquerade. I permitted percipients to fool themselves. I didn't behave like a patient, I vaguely resembled one on certain Saturdays and the assumptions of those who saw me led them to deceiving themselves concerning my identity. But to answer your question, I saw at least as much insanity outside Willard on the part of well-dressed, well-groomed "respectable citizens," as I did inside. Some considerable portion of the patients at Willard were confined there because they were far more sane that those who did the confining, which is an old story.

Interviewer: Of visionaries labeled as insane?

Hoffman: Yes, but let's be careful not to lose sight of how many sluggards pose as visionary artists to provide cover for their sloth, their irresponsibility and lack of the spark of life. They waste their lives and leech off others. In defense of their behavior they say they are misunderstood and persecuted for their art. It's a cliché.

Interviewer: The yin and yang again.

Hoffman: Two sides of the coin of life. A tossed coin which lands balanced on its edge is representative of a higher state of consciousness. It's a feat.

We have yang, compressed, uptight conformists who accuse those who think differently from the herd of being crazy, and we have yin scroungers posing as gifted artists and accusing their critics of wrongly calling them shirkers. These are the antipodes of life, I guess. In After the Fall, Samuel Beckett expressed these swings of yin and yang destiny when he wrote, "This dust will not settle in our time, and when it does some great roaring machine will come and whirl it all sky-high again."

Interviewer: Do you consider yourself the prophet of the Revelation of the Method in our time?

Hoffman: My family would die laughing if anyone were to call me a prophet.

Interviewer: Well, it's a fact that months before the September 11 terror attacks you published your prediction that the year 2001 would be momentous, would be the gateway to an extraordinary culmination of occult transformation.

Hoffman: God's grace did that. I was only a vehicle for it. Everyone has the potential.

Interviewer: What about a position as consultant on ritual murders?

Hoffman: I wouldn't turn it down. I fulfilled something akin to that when I was a reporter for the Associated Press. I couldn't refuse now helping to bring the actual murderers of those Country and Western fans in Las Vegas to justice in a court of law. I couldn't say no to that. I would be obliged to assist, and I would try to do it, as best I could.

Interviewer: You've suggested that ordinary life may no longer be very possible for people in the digitalized West.

Hoffman: So much is lost in terms of our humanity as we process ourselves into something less. At this stage in the alchemy we're the ideal hypnotic subjects. That's one reason I spent years among the Old Order Wenger Mennonites, and the Amish. To experience human beings whose lives were not invaded by the command language of television, radio and the Internet. I would take my horse and wagon out at 4 a.m. under the summer stars in Holmes County, Ohio, with my buggy's wooden wheels sheathed in steel, rolling over wooden bridges. That "music" was wonderful. In the early evening after the sunset, from the front yard of the farm where we lived, I watched the fireflies dance over fields of shocked barley in inky darkness, no street lights to intrude on the beatitude.

Geophysically, street lights and city lights have blotted out the trillion star night sky that is still visible on the Hana side of Maui, while mechanized and digitalized noise is a plague that robs us of the ordinary blessings of nature. Here in north Idaho there are defunct gold and silver mines, some of which have been stabilized. To enter one of those mines and experience total silence can heal the heart, mind, body and psyche.

Interviewer: This is where people far from industrial civilization have a blessing.

Getting back to the Biblical prophets and warnings. You do believe we have experienced things like that lately.

Hoffman: Oh, sure. The "Terminator Judgment Day" movies were ominous warnings which put the movie-goers and TV watchers—and those to whom those viewers conveyed the narrative—under obligation when they failed to act on the alarm.

"You were warned" is quite an indictment of those who proceed heedlessly. The autonomous "Skynet defense" put into place to render us digitally safe is itself the digital doom. As noted, years earlier Tolkein said it with regard to the "One Ring." Which is what makes me laugh about these elite PhD. scientists who are absolute infants when it comes to technology. If they can pick it up they'll mess with it. It doesn't matter what it is, analogous to infants with matches and blowtorches cavorting inside a paper mill, or skateboarding into traffic on the Interstate. Those who suggest the scientists shouldn't be so reckless and heedless, receive the infant's response, "Why not Da-da? I can dood it, so I gonna dood it." That's the romper room "philosophy" of scientism now. Play God because you can play God. Blowback be damned.

Skynet is a cinematic symbol of the autonomous AI future and it is about as dystopic as one can imagine, but has it slowed our march toward empowering autonomous robots? Not to my knowledge. People have been granted a vision of the consequences, and they go ahead with it anyway because they seem to be in love with death and catastrophe. The negative karma from oblivious arrogance, when it is rendered moral and permissible because "scientists" are at its head, is incalculable. The death wish on this planet is remarkable. The demand for and insistence upon herd-mentality and extinction has not lessened. The Reign of Dead Matter is arriving on schedule. Our Creator declared, "All those who hate me love death." [6]

Interviewer: How then have some of us managed to still be here and be human?

Hoffman: The grace of God.

Interviewer: What is the most recent serial killer type of event that has galvanized you?

Hoffman: Galvanism was the means by which Frankenstein's monster was revived. I hope I have not been galvanized. To answer your question, as we speak, it is the massacre in Las Vegas that strikes me as laden with anomaly.

Interviewer: Tell us about it.

Hoffman: I intend to, but a few preliminaries are in order.

The Psychic Highway

The 42nd Degree of North Parallel Latitude

"All of these changes were powerfully felt in New York State, where some of the most significant new religious movements of the time had their start. A 'psychic highway' followed..."

Sara M. Pike, New Age and Neopagan Religions in America (Columbia University, 2004) p. 43.

Skyline Drive, Bluff Point (Keuka Park) New York

Pre-Columbian: Fifteen acres of mounds and stone circles, including an eight foot monolith. By 1954 the site had been erased.

Nineteenth century witnesses described, "...monuments of stone slabs...still standing in groups of different patterns, some in circles, some in squares and arcs, reminding one of the Stone Henge of England. At the northwest corner was a huge monolith...all about the standing slabs were prostrate ones..."

Jerusalem, New York (approximately five miles west of Bluff Point), 1791:

Founding of the religion of Jemima Wilkinson, the "Publick Universal Friend," the first "transgender, non-binary" leader of a new American creed. The Publick Universal Friend predicted that the fulfillment of some prophecies of the Book of Revelation would begin in April of 1780, forty-two months after "the Friend" had commenced preaching.

Canandaigua, New York, 1826:

Founding of the Anti-Masonic movement which swept the northeastern United States throughout the nineteenth century, after author William Morgan was kidnapped from the Ontario County jail by Freemasons and murdered.

"...William Morgan wrote a book exposing the rituals of Freemasonry. Morgan was kidnapped and (it is presumed) drowned for his perfidy by local Masons. An Anti-Masonic party sprang up overnight; by 1828, Upstate New York was ablaze......a thousand ragged prophets traveled our 'psychic highway'...We had Anti-Masons and reincarnated Christs and enough necromancers to pester the dead till time's end."

Bill Kauffman, The American Scholar, January, 1991

September, 1826: the kidnapping of writer William Morgan by Freemasons, in the Canandaigua, New York jail, on the 42nd degree of north parallel latitude. His assassination would lead to the formation of the largest movement in opposition to secret societies in the history of the United States, headed by former President John Quincy Adams, Lincoln's future Secretary of State William Seward, and U.S. Attorney General William Wirt. [1]

[1] Concerning the theft of William Wirt's head by grave robbers cf. Revisionist History® no. 101 (Feb-March 2019). In England in 1661 Oliver Cromwell's corpse was punished and the head decapitated by order of King Charles II.

Fayette, [2] New York, April 6, 1830:
Founding of the Mormon religion by Joseph Smith, after the putative discovery in 1823 of the "golden plates" at Hill Cumorah (also on the 42nd degree of latitude), from which the the Book of Mormon was supposedly derived. (The Book was published in March, 1830).

Putney, Vermont, 1844:
On the boundary of the 42nd and 43rd degrees of latitude John Humphrey Noyes established his sexual freedom society, the first successful "free love" commune in American history (enduring 40 years). Eventually the Noyes group moved 200 miles west to Oneida, New York (on the 43rd degree line). Under Noyes' supervision, the "Oneida Community" practiced a "complex marriage" in which, in arrangements regulated by Noyes, hundreds of people engaged in serial heterosexual intercourse without benefit of matrimony.

Seneca Falls, New York, 1848:
The founding of Feminism with the first convention for women's rights in western history. [3]

Hydesville (in what is today Arcadia [4]) New York, 1848:
The founding of Spiritualism (mediumistic alleged contact with the dead) by the Fox sisters, which became the fastest growing religion in the mid-nineteenth century continental United States (Hydesville/Arcadia is on the 43rd degree of latitude, but within a few tenths of the 42nd degree line).

"One of the greatest religious movements of the 19th century began in the bedroom of two young girls living in a farmhouse in Hydesville, New York." (Karen Abbott, Smithsonian Magazine, October 30, 2012).[5]

[2] In French Fayette denotes "little fairy," as William N. Grimstad pointed out in his inaugural essay on the significance of this entry in the Twilight Language lexicon. Cf. "Fateful Fayette," (Fortean Times, no. 25, Spring, 1978).

[3] 1848 was a heady year: the California Gold Rush launched in January, and Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels' Communist Manifesto was published in February.

[4] In western lore Arcadia is a pastoral utopia.

Auburn, New York, 1859: Home of the peripatetic abolitionist Harriet Tubman's "Underground Railroad" for the organization of the harboring of escaped black slaves.

Notes

Beginning in 1959 the production company behind Rod Serling's "Twilight Zone" television series was named "Cayuga Productions," after his Cayuga Lake retreat in New York, on the Psychic Highway's 42nd degree line. Between Cayuga Lake and Seneca Lake stood Willard State Hospital.

In 1916, the Fox Sisters' cottage was dismantled and moved 150 miles west, to a Spiritualist center on the 42nd degree at Lily Dale, New York, where it was reconstructed. On September 12, 1955, the cottage burned to the ground.

Beginning in 1967 at 1510 Hydesville Road, in the hamlet of Hydesville, on the original site of the cottage, a replica was built upon the intact stone foundation by spiritualist John Drummond, who buried his second wife behind the structure. That building was destroyed by fire in November, 1983. The Finger Lakes Times (June 18, 1984) reported that 86-year-old Drummond left the site after the fire, announcing "he had a 'calling' to deliver a message to the Mormons in Salt Lake City, Utah."

Poltergeist and similar Fortean phenomena are sometimes alleged to be associated with pre-pubescent or pubescent girls. After discussing past "rappings" in the replica Fox cottage which he arranged to have constructed, Mr. Drummond related to the Finger Lakes Times (October 31, 1983), that there had been no anomalous occurrences at the site in many years, "But perhaps if a young girl—maybe 11 or 15—came in here, they (the rapping) might start again."

In 1852 Ohio's traveling lecturer Joseph Barker was introduced to a medium who supposedly put him in contact with his deceased brother and offered him advice which changed his life. "All this wisdom came through the mediumship of a twelve-year-old girl. As in Rochester (New York), Americans throughout the country found messages from spirits most plausible when delivered through the agency of adolescent girls" (Ibid., Braude, p. 23).

[5] Among the hundreds of thousands (or millions of adherents [cf. Braude, p. 26]), were Mary Todd Lincoln, who held seances in the White House; New York Tribune publisher Horace Greeley, Arctic explorer Elisha Kent Kane and the abolitionists Sojourner Truth and William Lloyd Garrison. He became a believer in 1854 and remained so for the rest of his life. Cf. Anne Braude, Radical Spirits (Boston: Beacon Press, 1989).

On the indeterminate state between our death and resurrection, the New Testament gives no explicit information. References to spirits of the dead are absent. Many Protestant theologians believe that the dead sleep until resurrection (I Thessalonians 4:16, I Corinthians 15:23; Revelation 20:4). Papal theology teaches an immediate judgment after death, and then heaven, hell or purgatory, preceding the general judgment, post-resurrection.

The Willard Factor

"All I have for you is a gesture in combination with a word:
Tenet...We live in a Twilight world..." [1]

Christopher Nolan

Witches are accused of shape-shifting and we may perhaps stand accused of syntagm-shifting.

How much of what we know about command and control mechanisms turns on words? What wisdom teaching is conveyed in the story of Rumplestiltskin? Adam in the Garden of Eden obtains dominion over the earth by naming its inhabitants and constituents. In the beginning was The Word.

The heart of mystery is to confront a person or a force that is unnameable. Such a phenomenon resists our control. In the tale of "Rumplestiltskin" our structural fixation with naming is explored. The queen must sacrifice her infant to an imp should she prove unable to conjure his clandestine name. That she possesses the ability to successfully produce his name is not often the focus of the story. Instead, our attention is directed toward Rumplestiltskin's goblin aspect, which distracts us from the gnomic character of the queen herself. How did she manage to locate and then approach unseen, the secluded wilderness camp of a troll so powerful he accomplishes the alchemical feat of transforming base matter ("straw") into gold? It is by the queen's "wandering" that she catches Rumplestiltskin unawares. She hears him at the precise moment that he happens to shout his secret name. The enigmatic power that allows her to achieve this coup is the sub-rosa dimension of the tale. She is victorious in defeating her enemy because he did not suspect the existence of her power. He did not know the name of that power.

The power of "words over matter" is illustrated by the story transmitted by Mary Baker Eddy's predecessors. A father learns that his daughter has drowned. He collapses, and over the course of several days, takes to his death bed. His attending physician observes somberly that, "He appears to be slipping into a coma." Soon news arrives that his daughter has survived after all. On having those words conveyed, the father revives, fully recovered. Words caused his physical mechanism to begin to shut down, and words brought him back to the land of the living. He had been placed "under a spell" when word was sent that his beloved offspring had died. The spell was lifted when word was received that she had in fact survived.

[1] "Tenet" is a palindrome: a word that is spelled the same way reading backward or forward.

If this process had been deliberately timed and aimed—a life-threatening lie conveyed and later withdrawn—it would be indistinguishable from what we call magic—the sorcery of cursing and healing; as in the spells from the texts of the Egyptians.

In the words-over-matter magic of the Egyptian goddess Isis, knowledge of a word of power, described as someone's personal name, is of tremendous importance. In one illustrative story, Isis dispatches a snake to bite the solar deity Re, who begins to die from the venom. She informs Re that if he will reveal the closely guarded secret of his personal name, she will heal him and he shall live. When he does so, she informs him that the snake was not poisonous. Upon hearing those welcome words he quickly recovers.

In this allegory the Egyptians demonstrated the understanding that to possess a hidden name of a powerful being, appreciably enhanced the power of Isis. This account of gaining the secret word was used to demonstrate that Isis was foremost of the gods and goddesses, "ruler in heaven and earth" by virtue of her words-over-matter technology.

Pharaonic Egypt is a primeval source of Twilight Language (not to be confused with the directions for decoding Buddhist and Hindu texts that contain layers of multiple meanings, known in Sanskrit as sāṃdhyābhāṣā; (cf. Agehānanda Bhāratī [Leopold Fischer], The Tantric Tradition [1965]).

Hieroglyphic writing, arising circa 3000 B.C. and first ascribed in legend to Thoth, was not pictorial in its earliest manifestations. With refinement it became a system of signs possessed of symbolism and incantatory properties. By the power of words occult mastery was obtained or revoked, the dead were summoned or consigned to oblivion, and humans were endowed or destroyed. With this language John Dee and others of the magus class, sought to command both humans and nature, and harness disincarnate beings. The language was referred to by various names, "Enochian," or in Dee's parlance, “Angelic,” consisting of an alphabet and a phonology. There are parallels between the mandalas of Dee’s “hieroglyphic monad” and the Kabbalistic system of gematria (number/word equivalents) applied to the texts of the Bible, but these western occult systems obtain the talismanic function of Twilight Language only in a few respects. Twilight Language is not circumscribed by gematria or Dee’s monad, both of which are artificial constructs that attempt to plot a schematic description of the phenomenon, similar to Cornelius Agrippa’s number-symbol tables in his De Occulta Philosophia.

The Twilight Language addresses, or “speaks,” to the “shadow side,” the primordial Jungian archetypes of the subconscious psyche. The time capsule that was and is Pharaonic Egyptian sorcery aimed, by ritual means, at crossing oceans of time to invoke a future in human history in which the immanent would appear in public, in the collective waking hive mind, through ceremonial transcendent processing of the subconscious. It is our opinion that this is the stage in which those living in the early 21st century inhabit.

With Twilight Language there is a long history. This is the case with Wicker, the root of which is from East Scandinavian, “to bend,” as in the bending of reality.

In his 1637 play “Sad Shepherd” (act 1, scene 5) Ben Jonson wrote, “Hark, hark, hark the foul bird, How she flutters with her wicker wings!”

The associated modern synchronicities are worthy of note. For instance, on December 7, 2011 Michael Carlson wrote concerning the prominent New York Times writer Tom Wicker: “...unlike many columnists, he was in most cases a writer who refused to bend reality...”

In the 2016 “The Magicians” television series episode, “The Strangled Heart,” magician Richard has a conversation with a magician named Julia Wicker:

Richard: “The reason you treat magic like a drug, is because the people that taught it to you act like drug dealers. They buy it and they sell it, and they fight and they fuck for it. Well, that’s not the only way to live.”

Julia Wicker: “That’s the only way I've ever seen.”

Richard: “I’m a very good Magician and I do this. There are good people out there, Julia. People trying to learn about the world and make it a better place. Now, you can be one of those people, you can be a dealer, you can stay here and be nothing.

You get to choose. Look, you think magic is some terrible vice, so bad that you need rehab to get clean, it's not. Magic isn't heroin, Julia. It's a gift."

Julia Wicker: "Oh, god, please. Don't say from God."

Richard: I'm not the guy outside of YMCA yelling at people to repent."

Julia Wicker: "Then what are you, Richard?"

Richard: "Okay, what we call magic is, a set of tools. Leftover from Creation. [Julia scoffs]

Richard: "Think about it. The power to bend reality, to make and unmake."

*Julia Wicke*r: "Won't God be pissed we touched His tools without asking?"

Richard: "God—gods, really, they don't do things by accident. The tools were left for us to find."

In the previous examples we can sort the differences between the ancient usage and the use assigned in or close to our time. The assignment itself, if repeated emphatically with sufficient visibility amid a targeted audience, or the masses in general, creates an imprint, or what hypnotists term an induction. Within a certain charged context the word becomes linked to a pattern that has the quality of a meme.

"Willard" is just a word.

How is the charged context created? Through assignment. Why was the word chosen? Maybe because it gives us, in the parlance of American slang, "the willies."

"To have the willies, to be nervous" (Dialect Notes, 1896).

"You can now visit Winchester House. But we wouldn't advise it if you suffer from the willies." (Felton & Fowler's Best, Worst, and Most Unusual, 1975).

Brand Names

What is certain is that upon the neurological science of word choices and the creation of neologisms depends the multi-billion dollar advertising industry. Brand names like Radeon, Raytheon, Teledyne, Nuplazid, Xodol, Xanax, Zantac, Zoloft, IKEA, DARPA, Graphika, Google, Lexus, Etronixx, Exxon, Stuxnet, Kodak and thousands more, are intentional words selected for their phonetic and visual properties and invested with a particular associated meaning. For example, Nuplazid [i.e. new(ly) placid], is the brand name of the generic drug

Pimavanserin tartrate, an "antipsychotic indictated for the treatment of hallucinations and delusions." Nuplazid's parent company bears the name "Acadia." The psycholinguistic function is as follows: Arcadia, the ancient utopia, and Acadia, belong to the same phoneme.

The utility of certain brand names is obvious. Viagra, proscribed for erectile dysfunction, rhymes with Niagra. Others are not so transparent. The fun/freaky aspect connoted by the brand name "Graphika" suggests a freewheeling graphic design company. However, it's the moniker chosen by a corporation that surveils the Internet for clients such as the U.S. government, including DARPA and the U.S. Senate Select Committee on Intelligence ("Graphika leverages the power of artificial intelligence to create the world's most detailed maps of social media landscapes. We pioneer new analytical methods and tools to help our partners navigate complex online networks"). The clash between the expectation that the Graphika name initially conveys and what it actually denotes, may be intentional. The resulting surprise would be communicated as part of a transmission of a message: Don't assume you know us. Graphika delves below surface appearances and defies first impressions.

A compelling news flash like that is both mildly intimidating as well as intriguing. It relays the impression that one is encountering a potentially highly intelligent, superior organization. It impels us to learn more.

Somehow, whether through intent or sheer coincidence, in modern times the word "Willard" has an association with power, madness and anomalies. Is it a trigger for them?

"Willard" is woven in certain high profile respects, through the religion of Mormonism founded on the occultism of Joseph Smith, one of history's most fervid megalomaniacs.

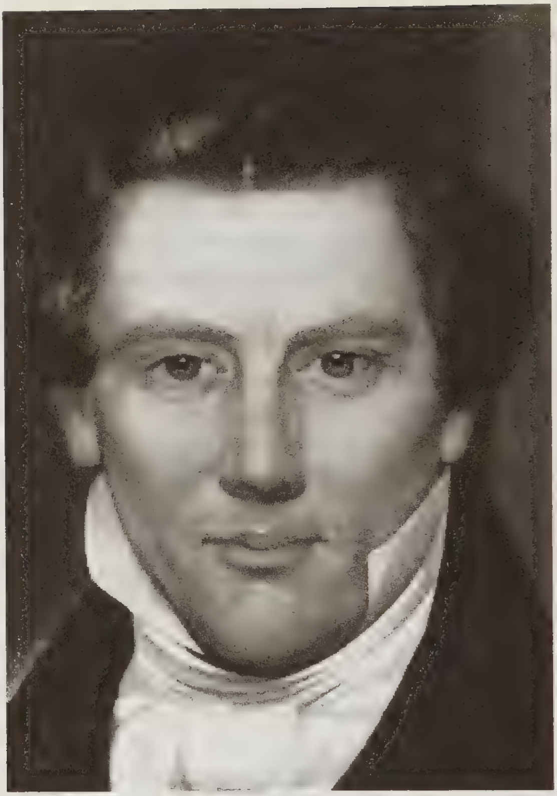
Before we begin our foray into Willard's eerie dimensions, it is incumbent on us to recall a neglected aspect: the goodness and glory once associated with the name.

One of the most ethical individuals in nineteenth century American history was the reformer Frances Willard (1839-1898), who happened to oppose Mormonism (as she relates in her autobiography, Glimpses of Fifty Years [1889, pp. 325-328]). In the Appendix to her book she provides an early Willard family tree:

"Major Simon Willard came from Horsmonden, Kent county, England in 1634, aged thirty-one. The name has been known on English soil for eight hundred years, being five times recorded in the Doomsday Book....Major Willard lived in Lancaster and Groton, Mass. as well as in Concord. Among his immediate descendants are two presidents of Harvard University, also Rev. Samuel Willard, pastor of the Old South Church (he baptized the infant Benjamin Franklin)...and Solomon Willard, of Quincy, Mass. the architect of the Bunker Hill Monument, who refused to accept pay for his services, and of whom Edward Everett said that 'his chief characteristic was that he wanted to do everything for everybody for nothing."

In one era at least of our nation's history, the associations with Willard were mostly positive and no doubt continue to be so for many Americans who bear the name.

Since we're not endeavoring to prove a point, but rather to report a phenomenon, bearing witness to how the name Willard has been employed or incorporated by a putative force, whether intentional, jesting or synchronous, would seem to be a Fortean activity in service to the advancement of human knowledge and consciousness (though Charles Fort would probably object to the missionary tenor of the preceding statement).



"I have more to boast of than ever any man had. I am the only man that has ever been able to keep a whole church together since the days of Adam. A large majority of the whole have stood by me. Neither Paul, John, Peter, nor Jesus ever did it. I boast that no man ever did such a work as I. The followers of Jesus ran away from Him; but the Latter-day Saints never ran away from me…When they can get rid of me, the devil will also go."

WILLARD HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Willard Hotel, Washington D.C.

Founded in 1850

President-elect Abraham Lincoln completed the writing of his First Inaugural address at the Willard, where he lodged from February 24 to March 4, 1861. He left Willard at noon on the 4th to be sworn in as President. Julia Ward Howe wrote the lyrics to "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" at the Willard in November, 1861. In 1963 Martin Luther King penned his "I Have a Dream" speech at the hotel.

In the summer of 2001, Steven Spielberg shot the final scene of the movie, "Minority Report" at the Willard Hotel. Principal filming took place in the "Willard Room" and in the hotel's "Peacock Alley."

Plans for the Federal Reserve Bank were laid at the hotel prior to 1913. In 1916, Willard Hotel was the site of organizing for Woodrow Wilson's League of Nations by Wilson's advisor, Edward M. "Colonel" House, and in Europe by American international banker Willard Straight.

"...the Willard Hotel more justly could be called the center of Washington than either the Capitol or the White House..."

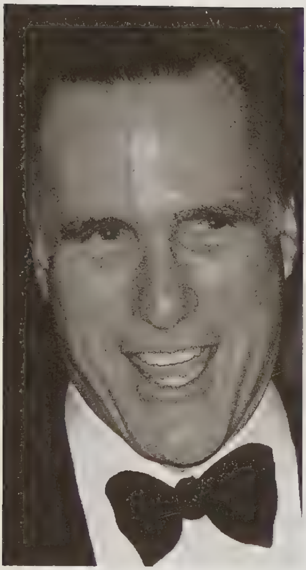
Hyrum Willard Marriott; J. Willard Marriott

J. Willard Marriott, founder of the Marriott hotel chain and the Marriott School of Business, was born in 1900 at Marriott Settlement, Utah, the eldest son and second of eight children of Hyrum Willard Marriott and Ellen Morris. ("My father...had good genes" — Richard Marriott).

At the age of 19, J. Willard Marriott served as a Mormon missionary. In the 1980s Willard Marriott donated at least $1 million to his namesake Willard "Mitt" Romney's political campaign. After his death, enterprises controlled by his family donated more.



Willard "Mitt" Romney

Parley Parker Pratt is the great-great-grandfather of U.S. Senator Willard M. Romney (R-UT), former governor of Massachusetts and the 2012 Republican candidate for President of the United States. Pratt was a confidant of Mormon founder and U.S. Presidential candidate Joseph Smith, who he met in 1830 on the 42nd degree of north parallel latitude at Fayette, New York, birthplace of the Mormon church. Pratt was a founding member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, which would become the governing body of the Mormons after the death of Smith. Pratt was a serial adulterer who had twelve "wives," many of whom were married to other men at the time. He fathered thirty children. Parley Parker Pratt was killed in 1857 by Hector McLean, the estranged husband of Pratt's twelfth "wife," Eleanor McLean.

Joseph Smith had at least thirty-eight mistresses, concubines and wives at the time of his death. As in the case of Senator Romney's ancestor, many of these women were legally married to other men. (cf. George D. Smith, Nauvoo Polygamy, 2011, and Todd Compton, In Sacred Loneliness, 1997). Smith, a Freemason, was gunned down in 1844 in Carthage, Illinois by a masonic mob, after it was learned that in the nearby city of Nauvoo, Smith had appropriated the secret rituals of the masonic lodge and incorporated them into the rites of his "Church of Latter Day Saints."

"Sunday Night, Bloody Night" is an inmates-take-over-the asylum-themed 1972 film (a storyline plotted by Edgar Allan Poe in "The System of Doctor Tarr and Professor Fether"). The plot revolves around an insane asylum established in a mansion located in "East Willard." After several years, the director frees the inmates of Willard asylum. They proceed to massacre the staff and take over the town, filling positions as mayor, sheriff and other government offices. Actors in the cast include John Carradine, Patrick O'Neal and Andy Warhol's erstwhile transgender actor, "Candy Darling."

Willard, Utah

Named for Willard Richards, a Freemason and confidant of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, and an architect (with Smith) of the occult rites of the Mormon religion, derived from masonic ceremony and gnosis. In 1843 Richards married the Longstroth sisters, Nanny, 14, and Sarah, 16. Willard Richards is the co-author of History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (1858); which is considered by Mormon leaders as an authoritative early chronicle of the religion.

Willard Bliss

"The death of President James Garfield in 1881 was initiated by two bullets fired from a "Bulldog .44" handgun by the mentally ill assassin Charles Guiteau (a former resident of John Humphrey Noyes' Oneida Community), and abetted by Willard Bliss, the physician who didn't believe in the germs and infection that would kill his patient seventy-nine days later. As an exercise in incompetence and careerism, the entire episode qualifies as tragedy."

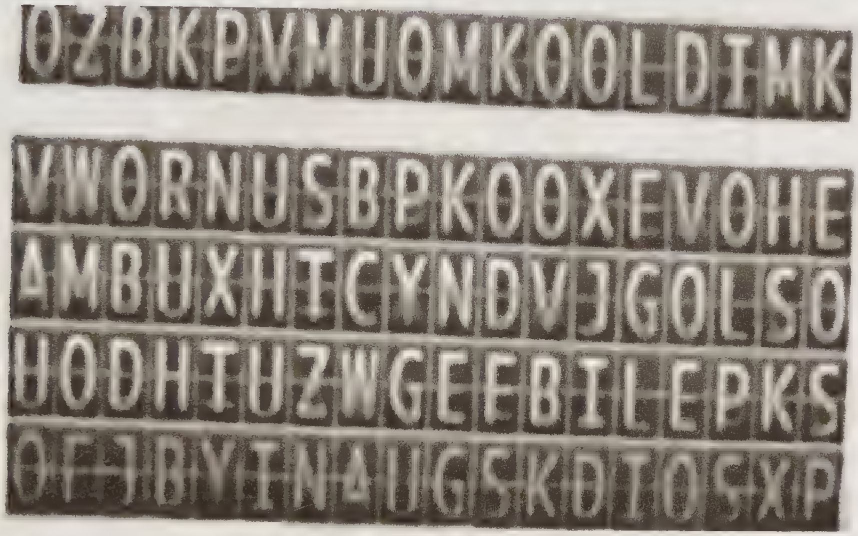
Subliminals in a TV Commercial that Denies and Mocks Them



The Progressive Insurance television commercial titled "Theory" (probably short for "Conspiracy Theory"), was nationally broadcast in 2017 over the weekend of February 25-26.[3] It appears to mock two conservatively dressed men who are shown in a dark basement analyzing TV commercials for evidence of subliminal messaging. They're portrayed as middle-aged moma's boys, and losers so pathetic in their hair-splitting pedantry that they argue over the meaning of the word "awoken."

The message may or may not be construed as: if you want to be able to get married and move out of your frowzy old mother's basement, don't investigate the possibility of Twilight Language in TV commercials; leave that to the "experts" and thereby become a more attractive, respectable, conforming consumer.

The satire aspect could perhaps be interpreted as intended to distract from the suppressive intent of the commercial.

[3] No accusation of wrongdoing is here made in regard to the Progressive Insurance company. Their commercial can be taken at face value as merely harmless satire and nothing more.

In one scene the mother informs her son the sleuth, "They're just commercials."

This 2017 commercial itself contained significant words flashed at high speed at the start of the ad, constituting what might be construed as a subliminal message, though not necessarily a negative or malicious one.

From among the first scenes in the commercial, we see scrambled letters arranged in lines and flashed in less than one second.

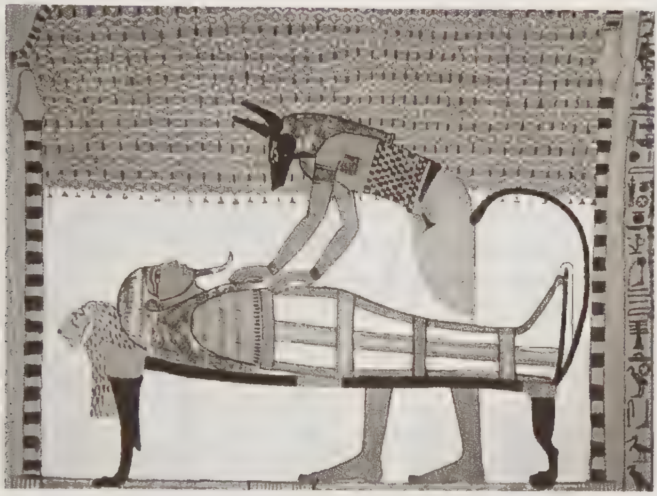
In the first line is the word "OZ."

In the second line is, "WORN US...KOOX."

The third line mimics ad agency branding: "AMBUX" (American Money).

The fourth line contains the words "FBI" and "BILE."

Anubis, Overlord of the Cosmic Graveyard



Black Jack commands dead matter

If there is one Egyptian deity who zoomorphically personifies the reign of dead matter, it is the dog-headed one, Anubis, older than Osiris, worshipped throughout the Pharaonic age—he who is the funerary deity presiding over the death-obsessed nation as overlord of the graves in the cemetery that the priests determined lay in the "desert West"—which, for James Shelby Downard and William N. Grimstad brought to mind our West—the crucible of the Trinity Site and the Jornada del Muerto; the Black Rock Desert where this writer's ally Jim Keith (author of Secret and Suppressed), was fatally injured in a "freak accident" at "Burning Man"; the Nevada that was home to atomic bomb explosions heedless of the "white trash" downwind who suffered the post-detonation consequences; the West of Arthur Manby, who went "headless in Taos;" of Monolith Moab, and of Death Valley, the setting for the final scene of Frank Norris' fateful diorama of the white American future, in McTeague (handcuffed to a dead man); and of a town called Truth or Consequences, in "The Land of Enchantment."

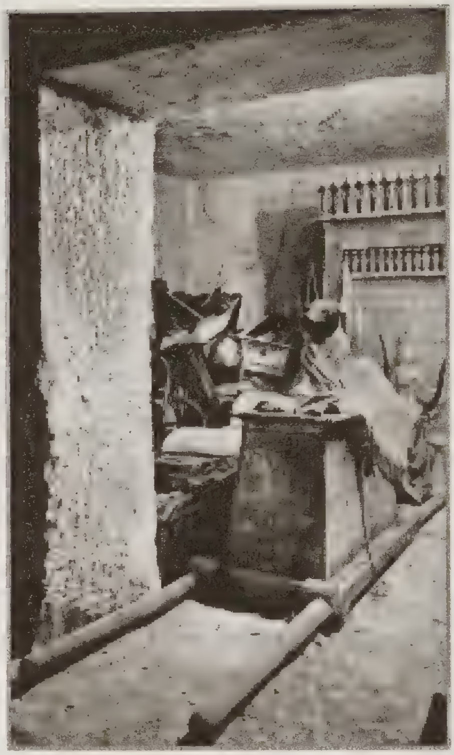
By the rubrics of sympathetic magic, hungry dogs scavenging for putrefying flesh and bones in early cemeteries was transformed into symbols of the cultivation of the dead in the person of Anubis imy ut ("the embalmer"), the jackal-headed mummy magus and autarch of ceremonial autopsies — Khenty-Imentiu ("Foremost of the Westerners").

After Howard Carter opened the 3,400-year-old Tut time capsule in 1922, revealing an idol of the jackal-headed one seated upon a shrine of gold leaf and facing west, Anubis' star ascended anew and a mental virus entombed for millennia disgorged its spores in the corridors of our Cynopolis.



He is the unnamed one: Anubis is his title, not his personal name, which is unknown. [4]

According to Carter, to Anubis is ascribed the saying, "I have caused the path to be mistaken."

The Oxford English Dictionary states that the word jackal "shows association with the proper name Jack." In English a root of the word jackal is Jack-Call. [5]

Our Egyptian "Jack" is always depicted as being black from the neck upward; thus: Black Jack.

[4] Late Egyptian texts name him Inpu or Anpu, the former having an etymological root denoting decomposition. This appears to be a a non-sequitur contrived centuries after the rise of Anubis, in an attempt to solve the baffling mystery of his namelessness. We have no real clue to the name, as opposed to the title, of the jackal deity.

[5] In a prescient text written by D. Pell in 1659 we read, "The lion...will not seek his prey himself, but sends his *Carter(*er) or Jack-call to run about to seek it" (emphasis supplied).

It was he who ritually operated on ("embalmed") the corpse of Osiris himself. [6]

The jackal's counterpart in the heavens is the "dog star" Sirius (Canis major). In Pharaonic Egypt a five-pointed star is emblematic of Sirius and associated with Anubis and the menstruant Sothis, whose sanguinary efflux was viewed as tantamount to the annual flooding of the Nile. The average menstrual cycle is five days and the many five-numbered devices, from the Pentagon to the Pentagram, are intended to evoke the power of the menstrual prodigy; viz. the bleeding that does not kill or wound. It is this "miracle" that is the secret of the so-called "Holy Grail," which has mystified researchers for centuries. [7]

In the "astral clock" (calendar) of ancient Egypt, the new year began with the reappearance of Sirius in the eastern sky; the brightest star visible from earth. Sirius was the celestial object of paramount importance in the Pharaonic cosmology. Satan in Pharaonic theology is personified by Set ("Seth"), the god of crime and disease who was ritually invoked by means of Twilight Language, spells and amulets.

According to the myth, Set blinded Horus, the son of Isis and Osiris, in one eye, and was in turn castrated due to his links to sexual violence and "unnatural desire." Set's legendary consort was the Semitic goddess Astarte. We observe his similarity to Anubis in a 20th Dynasty icon (p. 144), which shows Set crowning Ramsses III. In that depiction, Set bears a resemblance to Anubis. In his hand he is shown carrying the tether ("ankh cross") by which animals and slaves were roped.

[6] In his corpse work Anubis is assisted by the graveyard goddesses Nephthys ("guardian of the head of Osiris"), and Isis. "Black" in this context is not a racial allusion.

[7] Concerning the awe in which the menstrual period was beheld by the ancients, and as the earliest source of the "Holy Grail" fable, Mary Daly's study in Gyn/Ecology (Beacon Press, 1990), is indispensable.

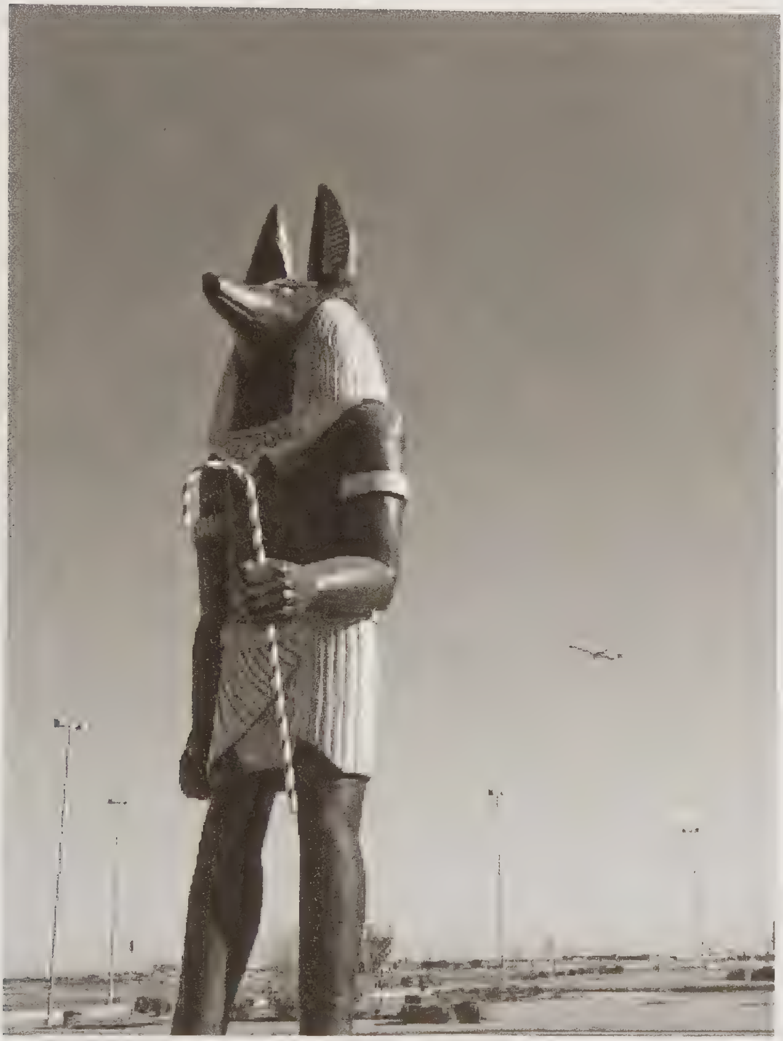
In the Jack-Call of the 21st century American necropolis, the theology of the Egypt of the Pharaohs is a ubiquitous symbolic and ceremonial legacy.

In 2010 a statue of Anubis, 26 feet tall and weighing ten tons, was erected at the Dallas-Fort Worth airport in Texas. Some would say it served as a tutelary deity.

The media supposed it was a whimsical accompaniment to the touring King Tut exhibit (the statue's "guard" aspect is however, acknowledged in the headline of the article):



"Anubis, that wacky Egyptian god with the head of a jackal and the body of a human, is hanging around Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

"Actually, a 26-foot-tall statue of Mr. Anubis, known as the god of the dead or the underworld, was installed Friday at Founders Plaza, at the airport's northwest corner. There he'll stand for a while, watching airplanes take off and land with the other Founders Plaza planewatchers.

"Mr. Anubis, with his back to the airport as he faces north, is there to celebrate the King Tut exhibit at the Dallas Museum of Art." (Terry Maxon, "Anubis Stands Guard at D/FW Airport," The Dallas Morning News, December 19, 2008).

It would be more difficult to spin a playful tale about NASA having placed its asteroid exploration vehicle under the patronage of King Osiris ("Osiris-Rex"), for which the craft was named in 2020. Its stated purpose is to bring the origin material (prima materia) of our solar system, which NASA believes may be present on the asteroid "Bennu," to earth (prima terra).[8]

Don't hold your breath waiting for a NASA spacecraft to be named King Jesus. He who is the "stone" rejected by the builders of our national pagan psychodrama, is nevertheless the cornerstone of Creation (Matthew 21:42).

[8] The asteroid pursued by Osiris-Rex is named after the Egyptian avian deity "Benu," a mythical being synonymous with the phoenix of the Greeks: "repeatedly newly arising like the sun." In our book, The Occult Renaissance Church of Rome (2017), we study the virulence of the seemingly inescapable Egyptian meme over the past five hundred years of western history.

"Little Egypt"

"American folklore has long been filled with violent heroes: exploits of Memphis badman Stagolee, who shot his friend with a .45 and supposedly took over leadership of hell from the Devil, were still being honored during the 1950s and 1960s in 'toasts,' performed on street corners and passed down from generation to generation..."

Memphis Pyramid, Memphis, Tennessee

Also known as the "Temple of Doom." Constructed in 1991 by the city of Memphis and Shelby County, overlooking the Mississippi River; it is reputedly 2/3 the size of the Great Pyramid of Giza.

Curfew Reimposed; Guard Sent Back

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP)—Nobel Laureate Martin Luther King Jr., father of non-violence in the American civil Rights movement, was killed by an assassin's bullet Thursday night.

King, 39, was hit in the neck by a bullet as he stood on the balcony of a motel here. He died less than an hour later in St. Joseph Hospital.

Gov. Buford Ellington immediately ordered 4,000 National Guard troops back into the city. A curfew, which was clamped on Memphis after a King-led march turned into a riot a week ago, was reimposed.

Police said incidents of violence, including several fire bombings were reported following King's death.

ELVIS, KING OF ROCK, DIES AT 42

ELVIS PRESLEY, the rock star whose pelvic wiggle and primal scream launched contemporary pop music, died last night—aged 42.

Memphis was once the capital city of ancient Egypt and from the beginning of the Third Dynasty a royal burial ground of kings. "...the city of Memphis was founded by Menes, legendary unifier and first king of Egypt..."

Toby A.H. Wilkinson, Early Dynastic Egypt [1999], p. 293.

The Mississippi River is likened in the minds of some people to the Nile. "As it (southern Illinois) narrows to a tip, the distance between the two mighty rivers, dwindles from eighty to forty to twenty miles until, at Cairo, you see the Ohio meet the Mississippi. Locals call this the 'land between the rivers,' or 'Little Egypt.'"[9] (Think of Thebes, Karnak and Cairo, Illinois). In Little Egypt in 1858, Lincoln and Douglas debated the future destiny of the United States.

Cahokia

Circa 1000 A.D., there were between one hundred twenty and two hundred packed earth pyramids covering over 3,200 acres at Cahokia Mounds in southern Illinois, "Ancient America's great metropolis on the Mississippi." At Cahokia, "The large central pyramid…is comparable to or larger than the areas covered by the Pyramid of the Sun at Teotihucan and the Pyramid of Khufu in Egypt.."[10] 22 miles south of Cahokia, natives reported the terrifying depredations of a flying, man-eating "Piasa" creature with an anthropomorphic face.[11]

The Piasa "Bird"

"The first white explorers of the Mississippi River noted strangely pictured rocks at different places along its way. The most striking of these was the one on the bluff at the point where afterward the city of Alton was built. This represented the Piasa or Devil bird…There is a narrow ravine between the city of Alton and the mouth of the Illinois River through which a small stream runs to empty into the Mississippi. This is known as the Piasa. Near the mouth of this stream bluffs of sandstone rise upon which the representation of the Piasa birds were made....they were horrible to see. The legend of the Piasa briefly told is this (as related to P.A. Armstrong in 1827): 'Many thousand moons before the arrival of the paleface, a bird of such dimensions that he could easily carry off a buffalo, lived in the locality of these pictured rocks. At one time the bird tested the flesh of an Indian and ever after, one of the Piasa birds would watch opportunity to dart upon an Indian and bear him into one of the caves of the bluffs to devour him. Hundreds of warriors were devoured in this way..." [12]

Drawing of the Piasa by William Lewis, April 3, 1825

The head of the Piasa is that of a bearded man with a fierce visage. The head is surmounted with antlers. Piasa denotes "man eater" in the language of the Illini natives.

Of Louis Joliet and Father Jacques Marquette's voyage on the Mississippi in 1673, historian Francis Parkman writes, "Presently they beheld a sight which reminded them that the devil was still lord paramount of this wilderness. On the flat face of a high rock, were painted in red, black and green a pair of monsters—each 'as large as a calf, with horns like a deer, red eyes, a beard...and a frightful expression of countenance. The face is something like that of a man, the body covered with scales; and the tail so long it passes around the body...' Such is the account which the worthy Jesuit gives...The rock where these figures were painted is immediately above the city of Alton. The tradition of their existence remains, though they are entirely effaced by time. In 1867 when I passed the place, a part of the rock had been quarried away...'

"St. Cosme who saw it in 1699, said it was even then very faint; and (Prof. John) Russell, who saw it in the 1830s says the Indians had almost entirely destroyed it with their bullets and arrows." [13]

"Prof. John Russell of Jersey County, Illinois visited the bluff in March, 1848...He says, 'My curiosity was principally directed to the examination of a cave connected with the tradition as one of those to which the bird had carried its victims...After long and perilous clambering we reached the entrance, about fifty feet above the river...the shape of the cave was irregular, but so far as I could judge, the bottom would average about twenty by thirty feet. The floor of the cave throughout its whole extent was one mass of human bones." [14]

Another "Little Egypt" Dances — in Dallas

On October 16, 1963 an exotic dancer with the moniker "Little Egypt," commenced a ten day engagement at a private supper club in Dallas, Texas known as the "Gay Life." According to an advertisement in the Dallas Morning News of October 19, 1963, Little Egypt was performing at Jack Ruby's Carousel Club during her sojourn in Dallas.[15]

Almost as though he had a seat in that front row at the Carousel Club, Elvis Presley's lyricist Jerry Leiber penned the erotic song, "Little Egypt." [16] Presley performed "Little Egypt" in the 1964 movie "Roustabout."

Though the dancer's manager, Charles Curtis, admitted that he and Little Egypt knew Jack Ruby personally, he may have been embarrassed by the public notice of her performance at Ruby's "nude entertainment" establishment and subsequently denied that it had occurred. Jack Ruby shot to death Kennedy assassination-patsy Lee Harvey Oswald.

[16] Mr. Lieber, who teamed with composer Mike Stoller, wrote "Little Egypt" in 1961. He also penned the words to "Hound Dog," "Jailhouse Rock," "Love Potion No. 9" and "Kansas City," among other hits. "Love Potion No. 9" concerns an aphrodisiac elixir:

"I told her that I was a flop with chicks
I've been that way since nineteen fifty-six
She looked at my palm and she made a magic sign
She said, 'What you need is love potion no. 9."

Little Egypt (song)

By Jerry Lieber (excerpt)

"I went and bought myself a ticket
And I sat down in the very first row
They pulled the curtain but then
When they turned the spotlight way down low
Little Egypt came out a-struttin'
Wearin' nothin' but a button and a bow
Singin' ying-ying, ying-ying
Ying-ying, ying-ying,
She had a ruby on her tummy
And a diamond big as Texas on her toe
She let her hair down
And she did the hoochie-coochie real slow,
When she did her special number on the zebra skin
I thought she'd stop the show..."

A Little Egypt reference is in "Naked Women and Beer," a ditty by Country and Western royal Hank Williams Jr:

"Naked women and beer
We got it all in here
For your eyes and your ears
They show it all in the clear
Way up north and down south
Whoo, somebody shut my mouth

"Now I ain't sayin' it's right
But I ain't sayin' it's wrong,
But myself I enjoy the sight
Of pretty girls dancing to their songs,

"And it's been like that
Since way back when —

From Little Egypt to the Vegas Strip [17] –
And when the music starts groovin'
And the girls start movin'
Ain't nothin' gonna make them quit..."

Beale / Beall / Baal

At its founding in Memphis, Tennessee in 1841, Beale Avenue (later Beale Street), featured mansions to the east and merchants and music to the west.

In Memphis, Beale was known as "the underworld." During the Roaring 20s, virtuoso musicians gathered on Beale, including Louis Armstrong, Memphis Minnie and many others, "Giving Birth to the Blues."

I've seen the lights of gay Broadway,
Old Market Street down by the Frisco Bay,
I've strolled the Prado, I've gambled on the Bourse
The seven wonders of the world I've seen
And many are the places I have been.
Take my advice, folks and see Beale Street first.
You'll see pretty Browns in beautiful gowns,
You'll see tailor mades and hand me, downs
You'll meet honest men and pick-pockets skilled
You'll find that bus'ness never closes till somebody gets killed.

You'll see Hog-Nose rest'rants and Chitlin' Cafes
You'll see Jugs that tell of bygone days
And places, once places, now just a sham,
You'll see Golden Balls enough to pave the New Jerusalem.'
You'll see men who rank with the first in the nation
Who come to Beale for inspiration...

[17] The Luxor Pyramid was constructed on Nevada's Las Vegas Strip in 1993.

In a review of Peter Guralnick's Sam Phillips: The Man Who Invented Rock 'n' Roll (2015), August Kleinzahler wrote:

The "short ride along Beale Street turned out to be the most important experience of Phillips's young life...

"The city of Memphis commands a bluff on the eastern shore of the Mississippi. It's a blasted, crime-ridden shell of a city nowadays, and Beale Street a tawdry tourist attraction, but when Phillips arrived it was a thriving trade center...with a population of around 400,000.

"...Eleven years later he opened the Memphis Recording Service in a small space at 706 Union Avenue, and two years later set up an independent record company there called Sun Records...

"If I could find a white man who had the Negro sound and the Negro feel, I could make a billion dollars,' Phillips said in the early 1950s.

"That white man walked into his studio in June 1953, ostensibly to record two songs for his mother but almost certainly with the hope of impressing Phillips and being taken up by Sun...Elvis was 19 at the time, making his living as a truck driver, hanging around Beale Street..."

(London Review of Books, February 8, 2018, pages 27-28).

"Far from the glamour of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, her eccentric aunt and cousin, former socialites who were both named Edith Beale, lived in squalor in Grey Gardens, a sprawling house in East Hampton, N.Y., along with...the decaying trappings of their earlier lives in high society. Among these trappings, the Beales' heirs say, was an oil painting of the former first lady as a teenager, bequeathed in lieu of a financial inheritance to the elder Ms. Beale by her brother, John Vernou Bouvier III, who was Mrs. Onassis' father and a well-to-do stockbroker known as Black Jack."

(New York Times, February 16, 2018 p. A26).

"The Magruder Farm in Darnestown, Md., has a history both famous and infamous. Before being called Magruder Farm, the property had gone by several names, including Springfield, the Maples and Iler Farm...This property can be traced back to Ninian Beall, who acquired thousands of acres, starting in 1750. Beall's son-in-law Hardage Lane inherited part of the land in 1799 and renamed his portion Springfield...

Ross H. Snyder, a lawyer, and his wife, Jennie, bought the farm in 1941 as a summer home before moving there permanently in 1946 with their son and daughter. They renamed it The Maples. In November 1946, their 14-year-old son, Robert, took his father's shotgun and shot his father, mother and sister in the kitchen because he was upset with them. After going to see a movie with a friend, he walked into a Bethesda police station and confessed to killing his parents and sister." (Kathy Orton, Washington Post, February 16, 2018) [18]

An anonymous informant said of the former Beall property: "It is beautiful. And historic. But it is also haunted. I'm surprised so many lived there for so long. Maybe the ghosts aren't aggressive, but they are there."

This writer was unable to discover subsequent news reports concerning the outcome of his prosecution, or the life of Bobby Snyder after 1946.

FLDR

What are the mechanics of the "union of opposites" — the collusion of certain humans with the ascendance of dead matter? Some sense of it can be gained from observing the utilization of the "FLDR" algorithm, which employs a different game of hazard from the one principally identified with Black Jack:

> "A new algorithm, the Fast Loaded Dice Roller (FLDR) has been invented for accelerating the fundamental building blocks of random number generation. FLDR software simulates the roll of dice to produce random integers. The dice can have any number of sides, and they are 'loaded,' or weighted, to make some sides more likely to come up than others. A loaded die can still yield random numbers — as one cannot predict in advance which side will turn up — but the randomness is constrained to meet a preset probability distribution. One might, for instance, use loaded dice to simulate the outcome of a baseball game; while the superior team is more likely to win, on a given day either team could end up on top. Incorporating this kind of uncertainty will help machines make humanlike predictions and better simulate phenomena that rely on probability." [21]

Furthermore, in the language of software developers and hackers there is this jargon: "Jailbreaking is a form of privilege escalation, which is the act of exploiting a bug, design flaw or configuration oversight in an operating system to gain elevated access to resources that are normally protected."

Is breaking out of jail "a privilege"?

Jail-breakers are described as those who "exploit...configuration oversights" that are "normally protected." Are there "configuration oversights" in Twilight Language matrixes which, while "normally protected" can be "exploited" by outlaws ("jailbreakers") in "abnormal" situations and circumstances? If we wanted to talk back to those who embed twilight language in pop culture, would we want to "bug" them" and taunt them with their "design flaws" by calling ourselves the "Jailbreaking Collective"?

[21] Cf. Stephen Ornes, Quanta Magazine, July 8, 2020, and Steve Nadis, MIT News (May 28, 2020).

Shelby was interested in the word “Eureka!” and we have poked around in the provenance and possible symbolic meaning of the phrase, “six degrees of separation;” as well as, “By Jingo!” a fairly common exclamation in the 1950s, but originally a word used by conjurors four hundred years prior. How did it migrate, and why?

Due to the “self-help” mass movement, people are undertaking “affirmations”—a kind of (mostly) benevolent self-hypnosis involving spoken words, beginning with “I am”—“I am beautiful. I am strong. I am becoming stronger. I am becoming more beautiful,” and so forth. These practices are based on faith in the power of words.

The same psychology advises awareness of the negative prescriptive power of spoken judgments, such as “My wife is an idiot,” “My boss is a jerk” or “My son is a fool,” in the belief that stating those words creates a reality in which they become true. Whereas saying aloud, “My wife is brilliant,” “My boss is basically good,” and “My son is growing in wisdom,” creates a reality where those people take on those attributes.

We’re not as much interested in discussing the probable truth or falsity of these propositions, as the fact that the population is becoming more aware of and sensitive to, the power of words.

There is also the Rupert Pupkin Effect. He’s the Robert DeNiro character in Martin Scorcese’s movie, “The King of Comedy.” Rupert Pupkin’s lack of talent is irrelevant: he succeeds because he can’t process rejection or defeat.

The self-help psychology movement is sometimes criticized as “magical thinking.” It’s as if the common folk are being discouraged from doing what elite adepts undertake, after painful initiations.

On the other hand, Jesus was affirming a reality when He told the truth about the Pharisees in no uncertain terms. He was admonishing sinners, and his disapprobation was a recognition of the state of their brokenness. Jesus’ words didn’t create that condition.

Adolf Hitler was schooled in “positive thinking” by his “Thule” handlers in the early 1920s. [22] He ended rather badly though, as the most completely defeated head of a modern state in recent history.

[22] Cf. Michael Hoffman, Adolf Hitler: Enemy of the German People (2019).

These themes and topics can be analyzed only up to a point, after which intuition takes over to such an extent that subsequent utterances will be classed as whimsy, or at best, informed speculation and conjecture within the "non-fiction" academic sphere.

Is the matter handled best outside that sphere, as literature? Shelby Downard, like Abraham Lincoln and Joseph Sobran, was more than intrigued by Shakespeare's Macbeth, [23] and who isn't fascinated by Lewis Carroll's Alice books? The list of the authors in this genre is long: Poe, Edward Bulwer-Lytton, Huysmans, Yeats, Lovecraft, [24] Charles Williams, Tolkein, Arthur C. Clarke, Heinlein, Philip K. Dick, William Hjortsberg.

We dare to opine that Fortean phenomenon, taken to its deepest dimension, is haunted, and almost always confounds every sleuth on its trail. So it may be that the pursuit of it, the pure "because it's there" George Mallory motivation, more than arriving at a final destination or conclusion—is what we surmise Charles Fort understood in his study of—not so much weird phenomena per se—but its effects on humanity, including in terms of processing and conditioning us toward "induced" beliefs. The investigation of how a phenomenon like Twilight Language processes humanity might be more productive than the study of the pathways and "wiring" of the communications themselves, in that the phenomena often exhibit evanescent qualities.

We propose that contrary to notions of deliberate orienting and positioning, sometimes Twilight Language human agents transmit and direct it by "surfing" the mysterious momentum of the language's own magnetism, rather than propelling it by precisely calibrated agency. Art, as much as neuro-linguistic technics, is at work, linked to the invocation and subsequent navigation of coincidence ("synchronicity"), a "science" that is a kind of sorcery (or sorcery that has developed into a science).

[23] Mr. Downard's interest centered in part on the identification of President Lyndon B. Johnson with the assassin of King Macbeth in Barbara Garson's "satirical" 1967 play, "Macbird!" starring Stacy Keach. This identification whispered a destabilizing viral message to an American Hive Mind that had been repeatedly reassured by "the authorities" that Lee Harvey Oswald alone was responsible for the death of Camelot's king.

[24] Michel Houellebecq's H.P. Lovecraft: Against the World, Against Life, translated from the French by Dorna Khazeni (Orion, 2008), offers unusual insight into the life and vision of the seminal horror author.

To the objection that such a “loose” interpretation opens the exploration of Twilight Language to non-empirical literary realms of imagination and fantasy, we plead guilty.

We would however remind those who object, that a tale crafted by the Tübingen intriguers in the early years of the seventeenth century, scripted the birth of science under occult auspices, a suzerainty which led to the scientism that has bedeviled humanity ever since.

Moreover, as a matter of epistemology, we encourage the reader to question the supposition that the alchemical workings of this imaginative “Rosicrucian Ludibrium” are antithetical to avant-garde laboratory science.

If FLDR “randomness...constrained to meet a preset probability distribution...(i)ncorporating this kind of uncertainty (in)...phenomena that rely on probability” — is not a sorcerous summoning of a fantasy script into the material world, then what is?

The Sorcerer's Marathon

April 19, 2011 was the sixteenth anniversary of the catastrophic bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; the eighteenth anniversary of the fiery massacre in Waco, Texas; and the two hundred thirty-sixth anniversary of the American revolutionary battles of Lexington and Concord, Massachusetts.

In "Hour 1" of American Public Radio's "Performance Today" broadcast of April 19, 2011, the concerts featured included "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; a performance from Marathon, Florida ("right in the middle of the Florida Keys") consisting of the grim, funereal "Élégie" of Gabriel Fauré; yet another elegy—this one performed in Lisbon, Portugal, site of the catastrophic 1755 earthquake and tsunami—and finally, a phoenix ("Firebird") invocation.

In the movie "Red Dragon," centered on Hannibal Lecter and an occult serial killer who slaughters families, the final, attempted massacre takes place in Marathon, Florida, the home of an FBI occult "profiler."

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" performance was originally broadcast as part of a March 18 Radio France fund-raiser for the March 11 Japanese earthquake/Tsunami victims.

"Performance Today" host Fred Child expressed on the air his feeling that the choice of "Sorcerer's Apprentice" for the benefit of victims of the "most violent earthquake ever recorded" was perhaps "cringe-inducingly inappropriate."

Recall that the Disney movie "Fantasia," scored to a soundtrack of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," features a magically-induced, drowning whirlpool and out-of-control flood.

A question often asked when seemingly recondite symbolism such as this is pointed out: "Is it coincidence or conspiracy?"

We don't propose an answer in this particular instance, except to say, if it is a communication then it is an excerpt, part of a story; and if it is intelligible to the percipient, then it may be something other than a random or accidental phenomenon.

This doesn't necessarily make it a "conspiracy." It could be what Poe termed a "diddle," but even in that case, macabre japes sometimes tend to induce thought and reflection, after the grin, which Mr. Poe said follows a diddle.

Pike Bites the Dust

Graven Image of Freemasonry's "Supreme Commander" Toppled in Flames

On the eve of Summer Solstice 2020, the graven image of Albert Pike, the chief of ninetenth century Freemasonry and Satanism in America, was toppled and burned in Washington D.C. This could not have happened in decades past. Hallelujah.

On the Internet, we received objections from reactionaries to the preceding jubilation. One man wrote, "The image of Pike's fallen statue wasn't toppled by those protesting against Satanism and the NWO (New World Order). It was toppled by brainwashed millennial, Marxist-trained college kids who are leading us into the NWO!"

Another stated, "The rabble who tore it down most likely don't have a clue about the Masonic associations. To them it's just another toppled statue of an oppressive 'dead white male' which needed to be done away with as part of the drive to usher in the revolutionary aims of the Left."

These objections from individuals afflicted with the myopia of Right wing allegiance and partisanship, do not address the point.

The point is the humiliating optics for the masonic Cryptocracy.

Pike was Supreme Commander of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, Southern Jurisdiction, the most powerful masonic organization in America, if not on earth. His Satanic magnum opus, Morals and Dogma, was an occult catechism embraced by hundreds of thousands of Masons for many decades. In it, Pike detailed the god—or should we say gods—of the Freemasons—the deities of ancient Egypt:

> "...the BLAZING STAR...Originally it represented SIRIUS, or the Dog-star, t the forerunner of the inundation of the Nile; the God ANUBIS, companion of ISIS in her search for the body of OSIRIS, her brother and husband. Then it became the image of HORUS, the son of OSIRIS, himself symbolized also by the Sun, the author of the Seasons, and the God of Time; Son of ISIS, who was the universal nature, himself the primitive matter, inexhaustible source of Life, spark of uncreated fire, universal seed of all beings.
> "It was HERMES, also, the Master of Learning, whose name in Greek is that of the God Mercury. It became the sacred and potent sign or character of the Magi, the PENTALPHA, and is the significant emblem of Liberty and Freedom, blazing with a steady radiance amid the sweltering elements of good and evil of Revolutions, and promising serene skies and fertile seasons to the nations, after the storms of change and tumult... The Blazing Star in our Lodges, we have already said, represent Sirius, Anubis, or Mercury (Hermes), Guardian and Guide of Souls...by its genial influence dispenses blessings to mankind."

Pike referenced a being who allegedly traveled from a planet in the solar system of Sirius and taught mankind, "the worship of the Gods..." [1]

This entity is known by many names. One is Oannes; another is Satan. Pike taught that Sirius is the "emblem" of the "All-Seeing Eye." [2]

Furthermore, Pike's loathing for black people is indisputable. Writing in his Memphis Daily Appeal newspaper, he referred to "the abuse of the privilege of voting by 50,000 ignorant negroes…Tennessee will not always bear the disgrace of negroism."

[1] Morals and Dogma [1942], p. 376.

[2] Ibid., p. 506.

In Pike's poem "Ariel," in stanzas 21, 22 and 39 he evinces his vociferous support for the enslavement of black people.

Unlike in times past, on June 19 of the year MMXX, the "Invisible Empire" was unable to keep Albert Pike's icon from being X'ed out—toppling into the dust, in flames. For a symbol-obsessed cabal that once scaled stratospheric heights in America, this national humiliation was an ominous portent.

In 70 A.D. Titus the pagan razed the Temple of Jerusalem to the ground. Something similar occurred with Pike's graven image in A.D. 2020 when it was toppled and set afire. Deuteronomy 7:5: "But thus shall you deal with them: you shall...burn their carved images with fire."

Burning was an Old Testament prescription for idols, as testified by Moses, as well as Asa, Josiah and Jehu. Pike's idol, erected by the "Supreme Council" of Freemasons in 1901, stood in a place of honor in our nation's capitol for 119 years and would have probably stood for another 119 years were it left to the reactionary Right wing, which masquerades as upholders of the Word of God while claiming that the Left's iconoclasm is impurely motivated and therefore cannot be salutary in this instance. But it was those anarchists who fulfilled Deuteronomy 7:5 and 12:1-3, as well as Exodus 20:4, 32:20 and 34:13, not armchair "Conservatives" or those in "Holy Orders."

Revolutions devour their own. Pike's Thelemic grandchildren have coiled and bit their erstwhile patriarch, the celebrated secret society avatar of demonic invasion. Twas ever thus. One of Satan's aliases is בַּעַל זְבוּב, in English, Baal-zebub, "The Lord of the Flies."

As noted, there will be a Right-wing reactionary antithesis to the Left-wing revolutionary thesis. The antithesis will be backed by "Conservative" dupes who can't (or won't) see the hidden hand at work in their own circles. We shouldn't be hoodwinked into choosing sides in the phony dialectic process of Left/Right. The Right and the Left are both responsible for the ascendance of the Money Power over humanity.

The fall of the graven image of Pike is an occasion for rejoicing. May it be a harbinger of the fall of the Cryptocracy itself, which has ruled our nation by assassination, bribery and the massacre of innocents.

Is it any wonder why many of America's youth are angry, however mistaken and misdirected they may be on many points? They see at least some of the intolerable criminal politics and horrendous financial oppression to which we who have "waxed cold" (Matthew 24:12) accommodate ourselves.

It took a group of Leftists to remove Pike's accursed monument which haunted the capitol for over a hundred years.

In Matthew 24:15-16, referring to the Roman legion that would, in 70 A.D., visit God's justice on the Temple of Jerusalem, Jesus termed that army, "the Abomination of Desolation."

A similar "abomination" exacted justice on the graven image of Albert Pike. It could be that God's hand was in that retributive act as well.

After its downfall, "conservative" President Trump pledged to re-erect the monument to the Satanist. Of all the historical statues that were overthrown by vandals in 2020, restoring Supreme Commander Pike's idol in the capitol of our nation was Mr. Trump's supreme priority.

What a coincidence.

The Moab Monolith

Since the gateway opened on Sept. 11, 2001, every year since has been "charmed." Year MMXX with its "20/20 vision" (as Matthew Bell has perspicaciously termed it), is significant for debuting the "crowned" (corona) COVID19 "peril to our land" national emergency.

2001 had been ushered in on January 1 with the appearance of a "mystery metal monolith" in Magnuson Park in Seattle. In 2020, on November 18, another "mystery metal monolith" was unveiled in southern Utah during our "moment of national peril."

Was the discovery truly accidental or part of a timetable of revelation? What may be its role in processing the Group Mind of the masses?

In 1951 Arthur C. Clarke's short story, "The Sentinel" (also known as "The Sentinel of Eternity") was published.

Clarke wrote of a monolith, an artifact of alien origin, which triggers evolutionary shifts among hominids in target populations. This is the theme of the influential science fiction movie, "2001: A Space Odyssey."

Correspondents have written to say, "Year 2021 seems to coincide with the 26,000 year procession of the equinox and the earth's passage through galactic center."

Chatter about a "26,000 year procession through the galactic center" reminds us of the apocalyptic talk about the thousand-year-old, long count "Mayan Calendar" apocalypse, falsely prophesied for December 21, 2012.

Whatever places us in a psychic pressure cooker is suspect.

Whoever claims the authority to know a 26,000 year procession is imminent, or the Mayan Calendar is about to be certainly fulfilled, is a clairvoyant for the ages.

Consider the mental state of those whose lives are so impoverished they have a psychological need to go from one end-of-the world prognostication to the next, ever more frazzled as they do so.

Imminent End Time expectations are seeded among our more vulnerable people by the agents of paralysis. Their intent is to cause us to intensely psychologically light up for a time, and then burn out permanently.

What is the significance of the attention the Cryptocracy accorded the monolith in Utah in the final months of 2020?

One point of interest is the lack of reporting in 2020 on its predecessor in Seattle in 2001.

Allusions were made to Kubrick's fictional "2001" movie, but not to the monolith that debuted at the start of the new millennium in the park named son of "Magnus" (black oxide of manganese produced by blending lead. The resulting manganese, "in color and weight like a lodestone" [magnet], which "from ancient times was used in the manufacture of [a looking] glass").

In 2020, "...The monolith's mysterious appearance amid the rocky desert sparked excitement among the hominids who circled it, intrigued and perplexed.

"But unlike the alien structure made famous by the epic film adaptation of "2001: A Space Odyssey," the metal monolith discovered Wednesday (November 18) by public safety workers in southeastern Utah is quite real.

"The workers were scouring the red-rock region by helicopter for bighorn sheep when a crew member spotted the object, the pilot, Bret Hutchings, told KSL-TV...(it was) the strangest discovery he's made in years of flying over the Utah desert.

"The state Department of Public Safety will not disclose its exact location...

"For now, the monolith is delighting science-fiction fans all over the Internet, who couldn't help but note the uncanny resemblance to the mysterious structure in "2001" that came from aliens and sped up human evolution." [1]

Using satellite imagery, amateur sleuths lost no time finding the Utah site. It was located near Lockhart Basin Road, 17 miles southwest of the city of Moab, on the 38th degree of north parallel latitude. In the days following the monolith's discovery, thousands of people poured into the area.

The timing of the "discovery" is noteworthy—in addition to being in the midst of the COVID19 panic, the "discovery" was announced to the world forty-two days before the 20th anniversary of the 21(200]1]) Gateway.

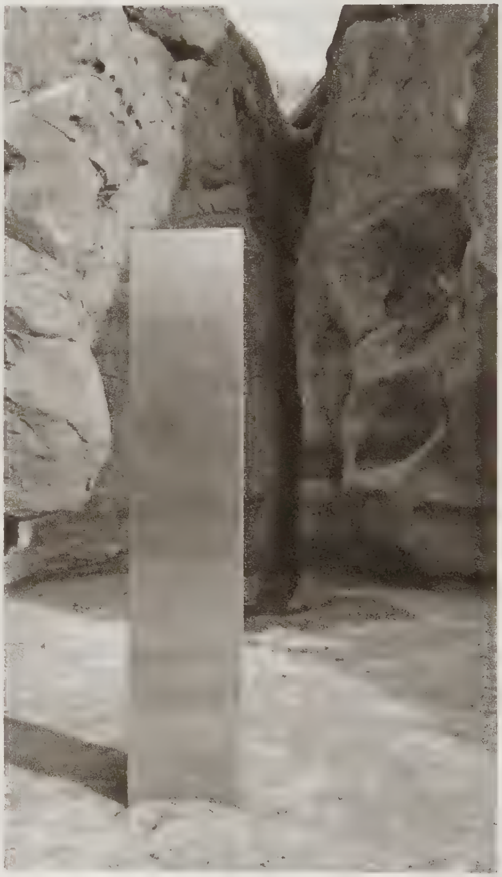
[1] Marisa Iati, "A mysterious metal monolith was found in a remote part of Utah. Um, so who put it there?," Washington Post, November 24, 2020.

It was said that the airborne "discoverers" had been on a routine search for "big horn."

Some observers have commented on an alignment between the "phallic" monolith and the "vaginal" crack in the rock formation. From the photograph (below) it appears that the alignment was precise.

As for who erected and installed it, that remains a matter of conjecture and dispute.



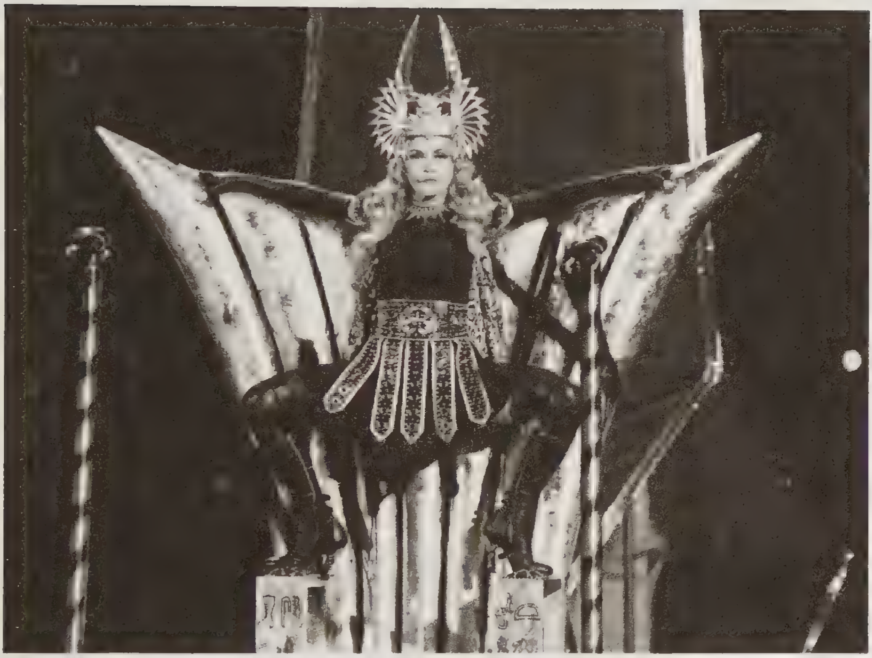
Friday, November 27, nearly as soon as it was unveiled before an amazed world, it was reportedly removed by a group which journalist Meaghen Brown of Outside magazine (December 23, 2020) said consisted of:

> "...four slackliners... Homer Manson, an anonymous companion, Sylvan Christensen and Andy Lewis...in their haste, the group lost the top of the monolith".

Superbow half-time perfomer Andy L. "Sketchy Andy," (also known as "Skandy") Lewis of Moab allegedly took responsibility, along with the others, for tearing down the monolith and posting a video of their operation on a Facebook page.

The video shows the monolith dumped in a wheelbarrow.

Was that an evolutionary or devolutionary move?



The rock star Madonna in a "gold-colored cape and wearing an ancient-Egyptian headdress" while seated on a throne in Indianapolis, the "Crossroads of America," February 5, 2012 during Super Bowl XLVI (46).

The Chicago Tribune described Madonna's ritual as an "S&M party in Ancient Egypt."

Andy "Sketchy Andy" Lewis performing with Madonna at the 2012 Super Bowl halftime pageant.

CBS News reported that as of 2012, Madonna's ceremony with Moab's Andy L. Lewis was the most-watched Super Bowl halftime spectacle in history, with 114 million viewers – more than the football game itself (which was viewed by an estimated 111.3 million people).

In 2020 Mr. Lewis was a 34-year-old "talented slackline performer who specializes in high-altitude stunts on a slack tightrope," as well as rituals like the one he enacted for Madonna's 12-minute pagan goddess impersonation during the 2012 Super Bowl pageantry.

The English newspaper Mirror published a photo of Lewis naked while he balanced on a high elevation tightrope (not at the Super Bowl). In 2014 Mr. Lewis allegedly pleaded guilty to interfering in an investigation of illegal BASE ("building, antenna, span, earth") jumping at Arches National Park, north of Moab. He was reputedly fined and put on probation.

Sylvan Christensen, also of Moab, told the New York Times that he was part of the group that "...removed the Utah Monolith because there are clear precedents for how we share and standardize the use of our public lands, natural wildlife, native plants, fresh water sources, and human impacts upon them.'

"He went on to suggest that the area, especially during a pandemic, was imperiled by the increasing number of visitors —and by the 'Internet sensationalism' surrounding the monolith. 'People arrived by car, by bus, by van, helicopter, planes, trains, motorcycles and E-bikes," he said.

Outside magazine (December 23) however, pointed to the junk that the environmental purists who removed the monolith nonetheless allegedly "regularly erect in the desert" for their own purposes: "Lewis posted a video of the monolith...followed with a lengthy post about the reasons they removed it and the ways in which a monolith is different from the slacklines, climbing bolts, and space nets that he and his friends regularly erect in the desert. (Among other things, the crew has been accused of taking a hypocritical stance on human impacts to the desert.)"

After negotiations between those who razed the monolith and the Federal government, as of this writing what remains of it is in the "custody" of the Bureau of Land Management.

By December, 2020 there were numerous copycat monolith "discoveries" and installations.

Sightings were reported in Romania, on the Isle of Wight, in the Netherlands and Colombia. In the U.S., monoliths appeared in Glenwood Springs, Colorado, atop Pine Mountain in Atascadero, California, and in Joshua Tree National Monument.

A farcical story element manifested in the course of the spectacle. A dwarfish (three-foot) monolith materialized December 3, 2020 in downtown Fayetteville ("Little Fairy") North Carolina.

Referring to "monolith mania," the New York Post newspaper reported that on December 8, 2020, "Video obtained by Storyful showed a rowdy crowd—apparently fed-up with the mystifying, multiplying metal objects—toppling one (monolith) that had appeared in a San Diego parking lot on Tuesday.

"...a candy shop in Pittsburgh even commissioned one of the objects—a 10-foot tall, 24-inch wide triangle of plywood covered in sheet metal—to place outside the store...The owner of Grandpa Joe's Candy Shop, Christopher Beers, freely admitted to the gimmick, which he said was a way to remind people to support small businesses."

The monolith which appeared January 1, 2001 in Magnuson Park, Seattle, Washington

"The monolith stirred worldwide speculation when it appeared in November."

Whether intentionally timed or "just a coincidence," considering its "discovery" a few weeks before the new year in the high western desert, one might venture to say that the concentrated focus on the Moab Monolith ceremonially prepared the American psyche for Black Jack 2021.

A SLOW MUSIC

"The actors in the old tragedies, as we read, piped their iambics to a tune, speaking from under a mask, and wearing stilts and a great head-dress. 'Twas thought the dignity of the Tragic Muse required these appurtenances, and that she was not to move except to a measure and cadence. So Queen Medea slew her children to a slow music..."

Part I: Truth or Consequences

Americans have not yet recovered from the post-traumatic stress brought on by the public slaughter of our President in Dallas — the two major symptoms of which are feeling numb and being afflicted with amnesia. Even in an alternative online magazine like Salon, in a long November 2013 article on the JFK assassination, the author did not recall the findings of the U.S. Senate's Church Committee or the investigations and prosecution initiated by New Orleans D.A. Jim Garrison.

What little we do remember about the conspiracy to kill our President leaves us feeling impotent. Thousands of seductive delights and web sites compete for our gaze. The colossal modern machine that has our daily lives ensconced in personal comfort and submerged 24/7 in Internet-TV-movies-video-games-stadium sports and those cathedrals of consumerism called shopping malls, allow us little time for deep reflection, but plenty of attention deficit. The machine grinds on. The rat race beckons. The noise accelerates. Tempus fugit.

The Cryptocracy knows this and factors it into its planning for spectacular crimes, from King-Kill/33 to Sandy Hook/13. They know there will be some investigation, some doubt about the official story and a few heroes who will step forth to risk their lives to pursue the perpetrators. The Cryptocracy counts on the apathy and amnesia which their ritual crimes hypnotically induce in the population to blunt the effects of what little opposition their unholy enterprise may encounter.

The Bible tells us that Yahweh commands us to "Be still and know that I am God." Without quiet, without that stillness, we can't know the Lord or His truth as He wants it revealed for the empowerment of His people. We were not destined to be shackled to Satan on the road to the robot-reign of dead matter in a drone-ruled police state. As sons and daughters of Jesus Christ we ought to strive for something higher and better, for ourselves and our posterity.

The Dallas Morning News, the Dallas Times Herald and the Fort Worth Star-Telegram newspapers all photographed three drifters under police escort near the Texas School Book Depository shortly after the assassination. [3] These photographs were transmitted nationwide. The men who were pictured in them became known in the public mind as the "three hobos" or the "three tramps." To this day these pictures are among the most enduring, iconic images of the assassination. Conspiracy sleuths have focused on attempting to discover the identity of the three men and have missed the masonic symbolism of the image itself. It was James Shelby Downard who first linked the photo of the three men in Dallas to the masonic legend of the "Juwes," the "Three Unworthy Craftsmen."

According to media and police accounts, three men were "taken off a boxcar in the Dallas rail yard immediately after President Kennedy was shot," described as drifters, detained as suspects and then released a few days later. Dallas police claimed (falsely) to have lost the records of their arrests as well as their mugshots and fingerprints. "What a coincidence" that of all the suspects in Dallas on November 22 in addition to Oswald, these three were the only ones to get caught in the police dragnet and make a splash in the media. Why was a photograph of three hobos made so prominent?

To answer that question we need to recall that Dealey Plaza was occult sacred space, the site of the first masonic temple in

[3] "The railroad yards are across the street from the (Texas School Book) Depository and up behind the grassy knoll and picket fence." James DiEugenio, Reclaiming Parkland.

Dallas; then we must travel back in time to Victorian England, to the "Dealey Plaza" of that era, London's "Mitre Square," where the horribly mutilated body of Jack the Ripper victim Catherine Eddowes was discovered. A portion of Eddowes' apron had been torn off, soaked with blood and placed in a passageway in the square. On the wall above the blood-soaked apron a masonic message had been scrawled in chalk: "The Juwes are the men that will not be blamed for nothing."

Only a Freemason or a close student of Freemasonry could have written those code words, which is why Sir Charles Warren, Commissioner of Police and one of the highest Masons in the land, rushed to the scene, forbade the police photographer from photographing the wall, and summarily erased the words. Juwes was not a misspelling of the word Jews; nor was it an allusion to Jews. Juwes is a masonic reference to mythical "ruffians," the "Three Unworthy Craftsmen"—the apprentice Masons *Ju*bela, *Ju*belo, and *Ju*belum—the Juwes of lodge legend who, it was said, had assassinated Hiram Abiff, the architect of King Solomon's Temple, which forms part of the "the basis of masonic ritual."[4]

It might be said that the photo of the latter-day Jubela, Jubelo, and Jubelum in Dallas in the wake of the assassination of John F. Kennedy was the signature of the Brotherhood, and that it conveyed an esoteric signal above the heads of the majority of Americans: "This was our work."

Mr. Downard observed another factor in occult murder conspiracies which he termed "cryonic" — a freeze-thaw process in which information about accomplices, perpetrators and planners is frozen during the time when the trail is hot and they can be apprehended, interrogated, tried and punished. Subsequently, as part of a process he called "The Making Manifest of All that is Hidden" and the "Revelation of the Method," the information is incrementally "thawed" many years (or decades) later, when the case is cold, those involved are mostly dead and interest is mostly academic. James Douglass, writing in 2008 in an important book esteemed by Robert F. Kennedy Jr., JFK and the Unspeakable, states: "...the conspiracy that most Americans have thought was likely (can) now be seen in detail...we know what happened in Dallas..."

Agreed. It was known in the late 1960s by District Attorney Jim Garrison in New Orleans, by certain cowed journalists, and by the Kennedy family inner circle, yet it remained frozen stiff, like a cadaver in a cryogenics lab, awaiting resuscitation by future powers. Well, the future is here and what does the knowledge bring us?

Primarily it summons within us the sensation which the Cryptocracy intends to evoke: wonder and awe in the face of so virtuoso a masterpiece of conspiracy which could murder the President of the United States in the street, just after high noon, and evade the consequences for decades.

While the suspected Kennedy assassin Charles Harrelson was alive and accessible within the U.S. Prison system, this writer attempted to interest investigative reporters in interviewing him. We went so far as to meet with his son, actor Woody Harrleson, in California. All Establishment doors were slammed shut and even among conspiracy researchers there was no concerted drive to interview the elder Harrelson while he was alive. But now that he's dead the conspiracy community has new interest in him.

If we are to accept Mr. Downard's prognostication, then the full truth about the Israeli attack on the Navy ship USS Liberty in 1967 which killed 34 American sailors and wounded more than 171, will only become widely known after no possible harm can come to any of those who led the attack or covered it up (beginning with President Lyndon Johnson, according to testimony by Admiral Thomas Moorer, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff[5]).

The same will be true of the Son of Sam murders in New York, the Oklahoma City bombing, the 9/11 terror attacks, the D.C. sniper in Washington D.C., the Boston Marathon bombings, and so forth. In each case there is enough information available to lead to prosecutions now, but two criminal elements stand in the way: the government's mouthpiece media, and the secret society assets who comprise the personnel of the U.S. Attorney's offices, FBI and municipal police agencies.

Mr. Downard discovered the Revelation of the Method to be a powerful tool of the Cryptocracy, among the most formidable mind control devices in the psychological warfare arsenal. He was also fascinated by the white rabbit in Alice in Wonderland. Alice repeatedly encounters the creature inexplicably. In the early stages of its appearance, it seems as though the rabbit was included for comic relief or as a curiosity. What struck Shelby was the fact that when Alice saw the rabbit rushing off to an important appointment, unknown to her the creature was actually hurrying to her trial. To Mr. Downard this represented Truth-or-Consequences manifested by the Revelation of the Method: the people to whom it is revealed are on trial and under obligation to act. Their failure to act is a dereliction of duty; a grave sin of omission. Each additional revelation constitutes another count added to the indictment of the American people—the consequences of our refusal of truths placed in the open that we do indeed see. (John 9: 39-41).

In the medieval era rulers couldn't reveal to the people the crimes they were committing against them, without risking blowback in terms of insurrection and national upheaval. This was true in British America and in the days of the Early American Republic, and to a certain, though lesser extent, in the 1960s and early '70s with the massive Vietnam protests and black uprisings (on a scale far beyond the turmoil of 2020).

One of the goals of Idaho's Senator Frank Church and his "Church Committee" in the U.S. Senate in 1975 and 1976 was to compile evidence that the CIA assassinated people. Americans found it hard to believe, and the Agency in that era was compelled to deny it. Now "our" government pursues assassinations openly; with drones and by other means. Here is the Revelation of the Method before our eyes — for instance, in the FBI's barely disguised execution of Ibragim Todashev on May 22, 2013. [6]

Americans are immersed in Spectacle. We may jog five miles every day and work strenuously at our job, but our national profile is that of spectators spellbound by the sight of our own funeral. As we stated in KingKill/33, the booklet we wrote with Mr. Downard in the 1970s, something died in the American people on November 22 and has continued to die after 9/11 and the other state-sponsored (or condoned) ritual murders. There is only so much that can expire inside of us before we are little more than empty husks, which may explain the fascination with zombies in American pop culture — the walking dead on the screen being representations of ourselves.

In 1991 a bored librarian at the Dallas Public Library referred to the assassination file log which the library maintained for researchers, as “the Kennedy junk.” [7]

Truth or Consequences is a television game show and a town on the 33rd degree line of north parallel latitude, in the “Land of Enchantment” (New Mexico). Truth-or-Consequences is a principle that forms the core of the Revelation of the Method from which the American people are in perpetual flight. We wish to be amused and our amusements take the form of seeking to be deceived. We ardently desire to be enchanted. James Shelby Downard’s vocation was that of a disenchanter, an unpopular role. He situated the assassination of John F. Kennedy in terms of Sir James Frazer’s study, “The Killing of the Divine King,” from The Golden Bough. In pre-Christian times this killing was perpetrated for purposes of fertility, to supposedly “green” the land. In Texas in 1963 it was performed on the psychodrama stage in Dealey Plaza, south of the 33rd degree of latitude, where, on the westward portion of that line, the atomic bomb had been exploded at the Trinity Site. Kennedy was immolated on the third fork of a triple convergence of streets adjacent to the Trinity River. For Downard this siting was no coincidence or accident. He was the first to declare it part of a ceremonial immolation consecrated for that very purpose, as precisely as the rituals, gestures and rubrics in the Lodge itself are performed.

Twilight Language Psychodrama

Frazer’s volumes furnish numerous precedents for King-Kill/33, but for Shelby the strongest parallel was found in the killing of King Duncan in Shakespeare’s play, Macbeth. In both killings we observe an elaborate ceremonial work of enchantment, replete with the theatrical elements of staging, choreography, iconography, dramatis personae and cryptic language loaded with arcana. Mr. Downard believed that some of the planning for the Kennedy assassination took place in the Storyville district of New Orleans, and Shakespeare, New Mexico. Kennedy’s administration was repeatedly identified as

[7] Josh Alan Friedman, “Jack Ruby: Dallas' Original J.R.,” wfmu.org/LCD/20/ruby.html

Camelot, and the mystical sheen of that Arthurian parable has haunted America's subconscious ever after. Among the circle of his assassins stands his Vice-President, Lyndon Baines Johnson (LBJ), of the Scottish clan of Macbeth by the way of the Baines. [8] Johnson was referred to in the media of the time as a type of the Scottish king-killer Macbeth—under the moniker "Macbird." Kennedy's wife Jacqueline was regarded as a queen of eros and high style and Kennedy has been called the most charming and handsome of all American presidents. On the day of her husband's immolation, the President and the First lady flew aboard the plane dubbed the Angel and landed at Love Field.

The killer assigned to permanently eliminate the talkative scapegoat Lee Harvey Oswald, was Jack Ruby. In the jeweler's trade a "jack ruby" is a fake. In Gaelic the word Kennedy denotes éidigh ceann, "ugly head" which is an apt description of the shattered head of our president on the day in which he had his appointment with destiny. His autopsied "ugly head" is among the most photographed in history. After he was shot, Mrs. Kennedy had tried to retrieve a piece of her husband's head from the trunk of the presidential limousine. Secret Service Agent Clint Hill, who had been stationed on the vehicle behind Kennedy's car, testified that the "right rear portion of his (Kennedy's) head was missing." [9]

Before the President left for his death in Dealey Plaza, he was serenaded in a ceremony in Washington D.C. by the Black Watch of Scotland, a military unit descended from government militia who had been allies of England's King George II, and consequently, in the eyes of some people, comprised of traitors to the Highland Scots. In the eighteenth century the Black Watch helped to hunt down remnants of the Highland army. Among the original clans affiliated with them was Clan Munro, which traces its patrimony from among the followers of Malcolm II, who was an ally of Mac Bethad mac Findlaích (Macbeth).

[9] Cf. "JFK Autopsy Materials," assassinationresearch.com/v2n2/pittsburgh.pdf "Parkland Hospital Dr. Robert McClelland said that 'probably a third or so, at least, of the brain tissue had been blasted out'...In an interview he gave to the Journal of the American Medical Association, Jim Humes said that ⅔ of the right cerebrum was gone." (DiEugenio, op. cit.).

In Freemasonry, Scotland possesses a distinct fascination. The most powerful masonic order in America was named the Scottish Rite. It was headquartered on the 33rd degree line of north parallel latitude in Charleston, South Carolina.

We may be accused of doing rhetorical backflips in order to attempt to make a connection between the killing of Kennedy and a masonic type of ritual. Even if this were true, it would be in preference to the bland obscurantism which the Establishment has employed to conceal a conspiracy most foul. Actually however, we are only seeking to have our people accept the evidence of their own eyes and intuition, rather than the sales pitch of the hucksters of media misdirection. Throughout the late 1960s and the 1970s, a majority of the American people did not accept the lone nut conclusion of the Warren Report, and this national dissatisfaction with the fabricated story led men of valor, such as New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison and Idaho's Senator Frank Church, to convene official investigations which have contradicted important assertions formerly fixed in stone by Justice Earl Warren and his cabal, led by Allen Dulles, the CIA director President Kennedy had fired.

We have referred to a "haunting." This haunting, in keeping with the Truth or Consequences dictum, can go either way. It can serve as a revival of the American fighting spirit, or it can lead to submission to a death script crafted for the acceleration of our spiritual and mental decline. Joan Mellen subtitled her account of Garrison's prosecution of certain Kennedy assassination conspirators, "The Case that Should Have Changed History." The same can be said for the investigations initiated by the Church Committee in the U.S. Senate, and of its important successor, the House of Representatives' hearings, 1976-1978. They ought to have sparked a rising of the people whereby a second American revolution made a clean sweep of the criminal-occult networks deeply entrenched in the U.S. government and its kept press.

The maxim, "Treason doth ever prosper, for if it prosper none dare call it treason," can be compared with our own observation that evil reigns when evil-doers gain advantage from it. No one was ever punished for slaughtering John F. Kennedy. Under those circumstances, evil continues to reign.

When this writer met with Hollywood actor Woody Harrelson in a San Francisco cafe some years ago, it wasn't to rub shoulders with the rich and famous. It was to convince Woody that this writer should be granted access to Charles Harrelson, his imprisoned father, the Mafia assassin of Judge John Wood, for the sole purpose of getting the elder Harrelson to provide, with his son's blessing, the names of the people who may have directed him to fire an assassin's rifle on November 22 in Dallas, which is our personal opinion of the elder Harrelson's role. Woody Harrelson, who once told the press, "My father was a CIA agent," began to weep when I asked him if his father killed Kennedy. He refused to facilitate my request to visit his incarcerated father. Charles Harrelson died in prison, taking his secrets with him. Woody is more successful than ever.

Let us contemplate an old adage, "Tell me who writes a nation's stories and I care not who writes its laws." The System encouraged the use of the word "Camelot" to describe the Kennedy administration. The System promoted a play about Lyndon Johnson, "Macbird," which cast him in the role of a king-killer. Kennedy was murdered on a site replete with masonic significance and symbolism. Humor us, as we suggest that the plot of this bardic psychodrama has more influence over America than we may imagine; that it is an initiator and signifier of a process of human devolution whereby the earth is prepared for Elizabethan Dr. John Dee's prophecy of the coming Reign of Dead Matter and the subjugation of humanity.

The killing of President Kennedy was hugely demoralizing to the American people. Despite his many transgressions and foibles, he was a standard-bearer for a future vision of peace, prosperity, and health. He was endeavoring to return America to the dimensions of a Jeffersonian Republic rather than a National Security State fueled by a Cryptocracy reaping enormous material prizes from perpetual wars and empire. Fact: after Kennedy died, the National Security State was almost immediately hugely engorged, culminating in 500,000 American troops committed to a southeast Asian backwater. The dimensions of this monstrosity have only grown since then, mestastisizing under Bill Clinton and especially George W. Bush, culminating in the government staging the 9/11 terror attacks and a decade of wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Every effort to defeat the dragon runs into a blackened sense of the inevitability of its triumph.

Much of the resistance today is halting and spasmodic. How does this pertain to the prophesied Reign of Dead Matter? A truly demoralized, degenerating being, once human and now barely so, can look in the mirror and see his own dissolution and destruction and be unable to compel himself to do what is necessary to save himself. Hollywood movies that are viewed by millions, such as "Terminator 3: Rise of the Machines," and "Terminator Salvation," feature robot networks that are granted autonomy by the U.S. military. These robots then conquer the world and enslave the remnant of humanity that has not been exterminated. Robots are of course dead matter. These films, whether by serendipity or intent, offer us a Truth or Consequences warning about our future.

The "Dr. Dees" of our time shill for the reign of robots over humanity. Law Professors Kenneth Anderson of the Brookings Institution and Matthew Waxman of the Council on Foreign Relations wrote in the Wall Street Journal, eighteen days before the 50th anniversary of the killing of the King of Camelot: "Contrary to what some critics of autonomous weapons claim, there won't be an abrupt shift from human control to machine control in the coming years. Rather, the change will be incremental: detecting, analyzing and firing on targets will become increasingly automated, and the contexts of when such force is used will expand. As the machines become increasingly adept, the role of humans will gradually shift from full command, to partial command...and so on. This evolution is inevitable as sensors, computer analytics and machine learning improve...and as similar technologies in civilian life prove that they (robots) are capable of complex tasks..."

Notice that the Reign of Dead Matter is described as "inevitable." These elite law professors revealed that humans will incrementally cede control to militarized robots: "the role of humans will gradually shift from full command, to partial command...and so on." Why the weasel phrase, "so on"? Why the reluctance to state outright, without beating around the bush, that the ruling class intends to grant Artificial Intelligence (AI) complete autonomy over the most advanced lethal weapons and their use? This fact portends the rule of machines over a disarmed or at the least, vastly outgunned humanity. Proceeding further on this continuum of perverse and degenerate futurism, we are being persuaded that it is a fixture of absurdly antiquated notions of personal privacy and quality of life, to expect that the surveillance of our lives by the NSA, and the militarization of local police forces, can or will be halted in subordination to our Constitutional rights.

The futurism projected by the script-writers teaches us that the evils imposed on us are inescapable. An "inevitable" dark future is being designed which commands acceptance through an external visualization implanted in our minds.

It does not have to be. We the living choose the contours of our lives. The future need not be commanded by pulse-pounding, digital phantoms. We can, by the grace of God, turn our nation in any direction in which we will it to proceed. The strength of our hidden masters is entirely illusory. They serve a cosmic loser, the devil.

In a godly society, the perpetrators who killed Kennedy would have been found out, apprehended and, after a fair trial, publicly hanged in Dealey Plaza. Much of the spiritual fog infusing our collective national soul with demonic incentives for a Dead Matter future, would have dissipated as a result.

But the success of the Truth or Consequences gambit in the assassination of a president, the impunity with which it was perpetrated before the eyes of the nation, emboldened the Cryptocracy to further gambits, from the killing of the "Black King of Memphis" (M.L. King), and Robert F. Kennedy in 1968, to the shooting of George Wallace in 1972, and the Oklahoma City, Pentagon and Twin Towers attacks. The police state now coalescing would be dust in the wind without the success of those conspiracies. Our failure to bring to justice the masterminds of these crimes is what ensures that the empire of criminal politics continues. Those who insist that these successes on the part of the Cryptocracy are due solely to the enemy's command of geo-politics, covert operations and brainwashing, and refuse to countenance the Cryptocracy's use of ritual magic for shaping and processing the human psyche, are hopelessly outclassed in this great battle.

Forgive us if we see in the death march from atomic bombs first initiated at the Trinity Site on the 33rd degree, and the Killing of the King near the Trinity River south of the 33rd degree, a pattern. Ancient pagans sacrificed their king in the superstitious belief that his blood fertilized the earth and made crops grow, and children springing to life in greater numbers and vitality.

The King of Camelot was slain for very different reasons. He was sacrificed as part of the Jornada del muerto, the long journey to make dead matter the monarch over life. The aircraft named Angel delivered the King and Queen of Camelot to Love Field where, shortly afterward, the king's head was shattered, and his brains rendered garbage for the street sweeper, after which Ruby was nationally televised blowing the guts out of a scapegoat. Post-assassination, the former First Lady, the survivor of tremendous trauma upon whom we have compassion, descended into a porn theater habitué and a lover of stunted millionaires; ending her life in the arms of a wealthy, obese adulterer, about whom she said, "I admire his success." Her personal Jornada del muerto does not differ materially from that of millions of other members of the audience at the immolation of her king.

We do not insist on proving the intentionality behind this alchemical devolution. You are welcome to accept that it is all just a coincidence. Pusillanimity in thrall to a tyrannical master is often the last thing a scoffing slave will notice.

The assassinations of John Fitzgerald Kennedy and Lee Harvey Oswald recount an archetypal scapegoat scenario. Are we prepared to accept the Cryptocracy's monopoly on discernment and interpretation, or can we see and think independently of it?

We are made in the image and likeness of God, and it is by the decisions we make in our personal lives that this battle will be lost or won — in those profiles in courage, as President Kennedy termed them — where, at risk to our personal security and comfort, we refuse the blandishments and bribes of the rich and powerful in order to do what we know to be right.

For the counter-cultural Christian, life is an incandescent protest of the System and of the reprobated majority, who, in their frivolous inconstancy, are beguiled by the world, particularly now, when poll-driven "majorities" determine morality (or its overthrow) by popular vote; as if the implementation of the Ten Commandments could be decided by a plurality of Golden Calf worshippers.

Part II The Conspiracy

Lee Harvey Oswald, November 22, 1963, 7:55 p.m. [10]

"I spoke in Clinton, Louisiana last month, at the oldest working courthouse in the United States, I believe. The judge who introduced me asked the audience how many believed that Lee Harvey Oswald was guilty. Not a single hand went up. That audience knew the Warren Report was nonsensical because it was in East Feliciana Parish, in the hamlets of Clinton and Jackson, that Oswald appeared in the company of Clay Shaw, and a CIA contract pilot named David Ferrie, in the late summer of 1963, three months before the assassination. In the audience were actual witnesses, including the barber who cut Oswald's hair."

— Prof. Joan Mellen, January, 2006 [11]

Richard Case Nagell

Richard Case Nagell, who was profiled in Dick Russell's controversial biography The Man Who Knew Too Much (2003), was an Army counterintelligence officer from 1955 to 1959, and a CIA asset under Desmond Fitzgerald, with responsibility for monitoring the KGB. On Sept. 7, 1963, Nagell contacted J. Edgar Hoover warning of the impending assassination of President Kennedy. Fearful of being made part of the assassination conspiracy, on Sept. 20, Nagell walked into a bank in El Paso, Texas with a gun, fired two bullets into the ceiling and then calmly waited for the police to arrest him. He served 54 months in prison and thus removed himself from the assassination and its aftermath. On October 31, 1995 the Assassinations Records Review Board (ARRB) sent a letter to Nagell requesting access to documents in his personal possession concerning President Kennedy's death. On November 1, Nagell was found dead "of natural causes" in the bathroom of his home in Los Angeles.

[10] After his arrest, Oswald asked for New York attorney John Abt to represent him, or any lawyer who was a member of the ACLU and would believe in his innocence. ACLU members came to the jail on November 22 but were told that Oswald did not seek legal representation. Cf. Douglass, JFK and the Unspeakable, p. 365.

Rose Cheramie

On November 20 in Eunice, Louisiana, Rose Cheramie, who had a reputation as a drug addict and had worked for strip club proprietor Jack Ruby at his Silver Slipper Lounge and Pink Door club, told Louisiana State Policeman Francis Fruge that two men she met at the Silver Slipper planned to assassinate the president when he came to Dallas. Historian James Douglass in JFK and the Unspeakable has identified the men as Sergio Arcacha Smith and Emilio Santa, Cuban exiles who worked for the Central Intelligence Agency. Aracha Smith visited former FBI agent Guy Bannister's office at 544 Camp Street in New Orleans prior to November 22. Bannister was an associate of both Lee Harvey Oswald and Arcacha Smith. The later shared an office with Bannister in New Orleans, at the address Oswald printed on his "Fair Play for Cuba" leaflets which he publicly distributed.

Trooper Fruge subsequently became part of New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison's investigative team. "Fruge showed photographs of Cubans provided by Garrison to Hadley Manuel, the manager of the Silver Slipper. Of the two men he had seen with with Rose (Cheramie), Manuel identified Sergio Arcacha Smith...Will Fritz, the Dallas police captain, told Fruge of diagrams of the Dealey Plaza sewer system that had been found in Arcacha's Dallas apartment." [12]

According to James DiEugenio in his book Reclaiming Parkland, CIA agent E. Howard Hunt helped Aracha Smith establish the "Cuban Revolutionary Council," an anti-Castro organization. Cheramie was hospitalized November 21, at the East Louisiana State Hospital, where she told hospital staff that Kennedy would be killed the next day. How did a lowly exotic dancer with a drug habit possess this information?

[12] Mellen, p. 208.

On Sept. 4, 1965, less than 22 months after she made her statements, Cheramie's body was discovered at around 3 a.m. on a highway east of Big Sandy, Texas.

She was either the victim of a bullet to the head, or a car that had driven over her head. The ambiguity rests in the fact that her autopsy results have been "lost."

The state of Texas refused District Attorney Garrison's request to have her body exhumed. Among the many omissions of the Warren Commission Report of 1964, the elision of the accounts of major witnesses such as Cheramie render the Report on par with the heavily compromised 9/11 Commission Report issued four decades later.

Julia Ann Mercer

At around 11:00 a.m. on November 22, 23-year-old Julia Ann Mercer was driving through Dealey Plaza when she noticed a man with a rifle case exit a truck driven by another man who she would later recognize as Jack Ruby. The man toting the case carried the apparent weapon up the grassy knoll. Ruby remained in the truck. After telling friends about what she saw, she was questioned for hours by the FBI and Dallas police.

On November 23, 1963 she picked Ruby out as the grassy knoll man's driver from photographs of several men supplied to her by the FBI. Fearing for her life, Mercer went into hiding.

Mercer was the wife of a former Illinois Congressman. Her initial eyewitness affidavit was recorded by the Dallas Sheriff's Office on November 22 and can be read at jfkassassination.net/russ/testimony/mercer.htm

When she met with Garrison in January, 1968 he showed Mercer her statement as printed in the Warren Commission Exhibits. Reading them, she shook her head. She told Garrison,

"These have all been altered. They have me saying just the opposite of what I really told them." [13]

Lee Harvey Oswald

Oswald had served as a radar operator for the CIA's secret U-2 spy plane. The best evidence extant points to him as a CIA counter-intelligence asset sent to the Soviet Union as part of "ZR/RIFLE." According to Senator Church's Committee to Study Governmental Operations, the CIA's Richard Bissell developed the ZR/RIFLE assassination team, shielded by "forged and backdated documents" and with contingency plans for "blaming Sovs" (Soviets) for assassinations that became public or were intended to be made public.

CIA assassination scapegoats like Oswald were to have a fraudulent "201" personnel file and appropriate Soviet connections. The Church Senate Committee and the House Select Committee on Assassinations (HSCA) discovered that CIA Counter-Intelligence Chief James Jesus Angleton's department had a 201 file on Oswald from 1960 onward. Former CIA Director Allen Dulles told the Warren Commission on January 27, 1964, that no CIA employee, even under oath, should ever say truthfully if Oswald was in fact a CIA agent. [14]

"...one of (Richard) Helms's most trusted associates, David Phillips, also known as Maurice Bishop, met with Oswald two months before the Kennedy assassination...Sen. Richard Schweiker of Pennsylvania stated, 'Oswald had intelligence connections...the fingerprints of intelligence' were all over him." [15]

Oswald was working for both the FBI and the CIA. Texas Attorney General Waggoner Carr informed J. Lee Rankin, the Warren Commission's general counsel that "Oswald was an undercover agent for the FBI." The FBI agent in New Orleans in 1963, William Walter, testified to the House Select Committee on Assassinations that "Oswald did indeed have 'an informant's status with our office." [16] J. Edgar Hoover ordered all Louisiana FBI agents to refuse to cooperate with District Attorney Jim Garrison. "...we are not becoming involved in any way in Garrison's investigation," Hoover said.[17]

On October 16, 1963 Oswald gained employment at the Texas Book Depository overlooking Kennedy's November 22 parade route, by means of Ruth Paine, a friend of Oswald's wife, Marina. Paine was introduced to the Oswalds in February, 1963 by CIA contract worker George de Mohrenschildt, who subsequently received $200,000 from the Haitian regime of CIA asset Papa Doc Duvalier, for "geological" work, even though De Mohrenschildt was not a geologist.

On October 23, 1964, J. Edgar Hoover wrote Warren Commission counsel J. Lee Rankin urging him not to release FBI "reports and memoranda dealing with Michael and Ruth Paine and George and Jean de Mohrenschildt." De Mohrenschildt died of a shotgun blast in Florida in 1977.

Michael Paine, Ruth's estranged husband, was the stepson of Arthur Young, inventor of the Bell helicopter. Michael Paine's mother was a friend of Mary Bancroft, the mistress of CIA director Dulles. Ruth Paine's father, William Avery Hyde, received a three year government contract in 1964 with the CIA-connected Agency for International Development. Ruth Paine's sister, Sylvia Hyde Hoke, was an employee of the CIA in Virginia.

On pp. 290-298 and 459-462 of JFK and the Unspeakable, James Douglass astutely debunks the official story of Oswald's supposed killing of Police Officer J.D. Tippit, based in part on Douglass' interviews with surviving witnesses who were movie patrons or employees of the Texas Theatre, as well as with journalist and future Dallas Mayor Wes Wise. [18] Mr. Douglass documents that the CIA used an Oswald lookalike for the killing of Tippit. This double was a passenger in a car bearing license plates taken from an automobile registered to Carl Amos Mather, an employee of a Texas communications company that did contract work for the CIA.

Douglass also demonstrates, "the FBI's consistent record in covering up, falsifying and destroying evidence that might incriminate the government in the assassination" (p. 462). This is an assertion he repeatedly substantiates. In the case of both agencies, to paraphrase Douglass, comprehending their involvement does not mean that we can limit the responsibility for the JFK assassination to the Mafia assassins who served the CIA,[19] the CIA itself, the Secret Service (which in addition to its other traitorous acts, spirited the president's corpse out of Parkland Hospital before Dallas coroner Earl Rose could perform an autopsy), and the FBI.

[18] Mayor Wise saved the Texas School Book Depository from destruction in the early 1970s. Guy Bannister's dual New Orleans headquarters (544 Camp Street/531 LaFayette) with one entrance, was razed in 1973, thereby permitting PBS "Frontline" in 1993 to lie and claim that the two addresses did not lead to the same office, as many witnesses (such as Bill Turner of Ramparts magazine) and D.A. Garrison, had always maintained.

(For more on the Parkland Hospital chicanery cf. JFK: Conspiracy of Silence [1992], by the dying president's Parkland surgeon, Dr. Charles Crenshaw).[20]

Oswald was interrogated for twelve hours after the president's death with no tape recording and no stenographer present.

If anyone imagines that tape recording technology was too unreliable or primitive in 1963 to have been part of a major case, they should recall that in that year FBI agents had been surreptitiously recording several hours' worth of Martin Luther King's activities in private residences, with adequate audio fidelity.

Follow the trail of Oswald from the moment he met David Ferrie in the Civil Air Patrol, to the point near the end of his life—the attempted phone call he made to military intelligence officer John Hurt the day after he was arrested in Dallas. Remember that in the Marine Corps Oswald was a lowly radar operator who had been singled out for testing in Russian language proficiency.

Oswald was being trained in the language as part of a future assignment — which a bogus hardship discharge enabled him to do — defect to Russia. He was sent to Russia as a phony defector and returned to the USA being maneuvered across a chess board.

William Pitzer

In November, 1963 Lt. Commander William Pitzer was director of the Audio-Visual Department of the Naval Medical School. He took photos and 16mm movie footage of President Kennedy's cadaver at Bethesda Naval Hospital, including close-ups of his frontal throat wound and rear head wound. He concluded from the photographic evidence that the president had been shot from the front, contradicting the Warren Report. Pitzer was shot to death on October 29, 1966, four days before he was scheduled to retire from the military and accept a television broadcasting opportunity that appeared to include broadcast of his Kennedy cadaver film footage, which went missing after his death.

Jack Ruby

According to the Establishment's leading JFK conspiracy denier, Vincent Bugliosi, Jack Ruby "was no more of a mobster than you or I..."

Researcher James DiEugenio documents that Ruby was an associate of Joseph Civello, who was present at the 1957 Apalachin meeting in New York of U.S. mobsters, including Sam Giancana and Vito Geovese. Ruby was also an associate of Lewis McWillie, who resided in Cuba under Fulgencio Batista's regime, where McWillie managed the Tropicana Hotel in Havana, which was co-owned by Mafia boss Santo Trafficante and the mob's financial intellect, Meyer Lansky. Elaine Mynier, McWillie's girlfriend, testified that Ruby "would do anything for McWillie..."

"In the late 1950s...Ruby, a Chicago mob functionary transplanted to Dallas, ran guns to Fidel, so that the Mafia could hedge its bets on the next Cuban government by supporting both the dictator Batista and the insurrectionist Castro. The CIA monitored the shipments...After Castro turned Communist, the CIA and Customs encouraged shipments to anti-Castro forces...in January 1959...Ruby began to supply weapons, now with CIA support, to anti-Castro Cubans...working with another CIA-connected gun-runner, Thomas Eli Davis III." [21]

Even Warren Commission investigators Leon Hubert and Burt Griffin noted in a Commission memo, "The most promising links between Jack Ruby and the assassination of President Kennedy are established through underworld figures and anti-Castro Cubans..." [22]

After Oswald's arrest, in the evening of the assassination of President Kennedy, Ruby infiltrated Dallas District Attorney

Henry Wade's press conference, posing as a reporter. Ruby corrected Wade when the D.A. erred in stating that Oswald had been working for the "Free Cuba Committee," which was a Right wing organization.

Ruby interrupted him to state, in front of the assembled reporters, that Oswald had actually worked for the "Fair Play for Cuba Committee," a Left wing organization. Just a few hours after the assassination of the President and a strip club sleazebag was exhibiting more knowledge about the mysterious Lee Harvey Oswald than the Dallas District Attorney.

Dallas police received three different phone calls early Sunday, November 24, the day Oswald was shot, warning that he would be killed. In one call, as reported by Dallas Police Officer Billy Grammer, the caller said, "If you move Oswald the way you are planning, we are going to kill him."

Hence, "In spite of this series of warning calls...the authorities, instead of transferring Oswald secretly...Oswald's police guards once again led him...right into the vicinity of a waiting Ruby...Dallas authorities seemed to have had higher orders. They in effect gave Ruby an easier opportunity to kill Oswald..." [23] Officer Patrick Dean was in charge of Oswald's security detail. The House Select Committee on Assassinations concluded that Patrick Dean was a key figure in Oswald's shooting. Dean refused to speak to the Committee.

When Oswald's murder was televised live, it was perhaps the most shocking event ever shown on American television. Ruby shot Oswald at 11:21 a.m. Ruby was signaled by the blast of a car horn. "The first horn goes off at almost the exact second that Oswald emerges...The second horn goes off about a nanosecond before Ruby plunges forward to shoot Oswald" (DiEugenio). Ruby wrote his epitaph in terms of the horns. In a letter obtained by Bill Diehl of the St. Louis Post Dispatch, he wrote that he was gravely ill and about to be hospitalized. He concludes with the words, "If you hear a lot of horn-blowing, it will be for me, they will want my blood."

In 1996 former Deputy Sheriff Al Maddox testified that before he died, Ruby told Maddox that he (Ruby) had been part of a conspiracy to silence Oswald. When he was terminally ill, [23] Douglass, 368. As for who those "Dallas authorities" might be: "Earle Cabell, the mayor of Dallas when Kennedy and Oswald were killed, was the brother of Charles Cabell, Deputy Director of the CIA under Allen Dulles..." (Douglass, pp. 482-483, and Garrison, On the Trail of the Assassins, pp. 118-121).

Ruby told Dr. Werner Teuter that he had been "framed to kill Oswald."[24]

After shooting Oswald and while in custody, Ruby asked to speak with Gordon McLendon, a veteran WWII Naval Intelligence officer and manager of "Liberty Radio Network" in Dallas. Fifteen years later, in 1978, McLendon formed a partnership with David Atlee Phillips, former Western Hemisphere chief of the CIA, and Stansfield Turner, CIA director, to rehabilitate the agency's public image.

According to D.A. Jim Garrison: "Ruby...was working for the intelligence community...as a member (associate) of the Mafia, part of which had become subservient to the CIA...he was actively engaged in the assassination. He delivered one of the riflemen to the grassy knoll, as one witness (Julia Ann Mercer) observed; although the government, the FBI, changed her testimony, I subsequently got the true testimony from her...Jack Ruby knew what he had to do to Oswald because he (Ruby) was already a key player in the assassination plot. He had carried out the dangerously visible task of delivering a gunman to the grassy knoll...The CIA could hold Ruby in reserve for the murder of Oswald, in case Oswald was not killed by the Dallas police in the Texas Theater, as turned out to be the case."[25]

Dorothy Kilgallen

Kilgallen was the only reporter to whom Jack Ruby is believed to have confided during a private interview. Her father was James L. Kilgallen, a fearless Catholic journalist for the Hearst newspapers who investigated the Lindbergh baby kidnapping. His daughter was a tough-as-nails reporter for the New York Journal-American and a panelist on the nationally televised "What's My Line?" CBS game show. She was known for her keen wit and independence. In 1954 she questioned the official story of the bludgeon slaying of the wife of physician Dr.

[24] "Framed" is the right word. Another example: Oswald's alleged right palm print and left fingerprint of his index finger on the bag containing the rifle occurred when the Dallas police showed him the bag and allowed him to handle it. There is also the possibility that the bag in evidence did not match the Texas School Book Depository paper samples and was fabricated to frame Oswald. DiEugenio demonstrates the confused and questionable provenance of the bag.

Samuel Sheppard, who was wrongfully convicted of the murder. She has the distinction of being the first nationally prominent reporter to ask questions about a possible Kennedy assassination conspiracy.

One source has stated that when "Kennedy was assassinated...Dorothy was devastated. Ten months before, she had taken her young son Kerry on a tour of the White House...To their surprise, President Kennedy invited them into the Oval Office and was extraordinarily kind."

Miss Kilgallen began asking tough questions of the authorities. She had a valuable contact within the Dallas Police Department who furnished her with a copy of the original police log that chronicled the minute-by-minute activities of the department on the day of the assassination, as shown in radio communications. This allowed her to report that the first reaction of Chief Jesse Curry to the shots in Dealey Plaza was: 'Get a man on top of the overpass and see what happened up there.' Kilgallen noted that Curry lied when he told reporters the next day that he initially thought the shots were fired from the Texas School Book Depository. Dorothy challenged the credibility of Howard Brennan (who supposedly gave police a description of the shooter). She wrote articles about how important witnesses had been intimidated by the Dallas police or FBI." [26]

Kilgallen died at age 52. In a November 9, 1965 obituary, the New York Times stated, "In August, 1964, officials of the Warren Commission expressed distress that a Kilgallen column had contained testimony before the commission by Jack L. Ruby, the convicted murderer of President Kennedy's assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald." Asked by the FBI to reveal her source for the testimony, "She stated that regardless of the consequences she will never identify the source to anyone." [27]

"One of the biggest scoops of Kilgallen's career came when she obtained the 102-page transcript of Ruby's testimony to the Warren Commission. Readers were shocked at the hopelessly inept questioning of Ruby by Chief Justice Warren..." [28]

In March, 1964, during his trial for killing Oswald, Kilgallen had a private interview with Jack Ruby, whose lawyer, Joe Tonahill, stated, "This interview with her was a very significant point in his (Ruby's) classless life.'

Tonahill affirmed that Ruby 'cooperated with her in every way that he could..." [29]

Kilgallen conducted research in Dallas and New Orleans. She stated, "If it's the last thing I do, I'm going to break this case." [30]

Before her death on November 8, Kilgallen had written in her September 3 newspaper column, "This story (the JFK assassination conspiracy) isn't going to die as long as there's a real reporter alive..."

She perished of acute poisoning from three kinds of fast-acting barbiturates—secobarbital, amobarbital and pentobarbital, combined with alcohol. Kilgallen's friend, Marlin Swing, "laid the blame for Kilgallen's death on Italian-American criminals...."

A sophisticated Stanford University dropout with a reputation as a ladies man, Ron Pataky was an associate of mobster Sam Giancana. Someone had Pataky inveigle his way into Dorothy's life. He wined and dined her over the course of several months, pledging his eternal love and having access to her and her home at all hours. After her mysterious death, Pataky published a grimly sardonic poem, "Never Trust a Stiff at a Typewriter." It reeked of the vitriol which the Chicago mob felt for the reporter who intended to use Ruby's disclosures against the Kennedy assassination conspirators. In the poem, Pataky "asserts there's a way to quench a gossip's stench' that 'never fails.' He notes, 'One cannot write if zippered tight,' and that somebody who's dead can 'sell no tales!" [31]

At the time of her death, Kilgallen was under contract to Random House (headed by her friend and fellow "What's My Line?" panelist Bennett Cerf), for a book to be titled, "Murder One." [32] She was known to possess a folder containing her

Seven days after Dorothy's death: "Dr. James Luke, a New York City medical examiner, said she died from 'acute ethanol and barbiturate intoxication, circumstances undetermined.' That was not a common phrase for his office to use...Even though the circumstances of her death were listed as 'undetermined,' for some reason the police never bothered to try to determine them....

"Since Dr. Luke had gone to the scene the day of Dorothy's death and then did her autopsy, it would have been customary for him to sign her death certificate. But he did not do so. Instead, it was supposedly signed by Dr. Dominick DiMaio. Asked about this, Dr. DiMaio was nonplussed. 'I wasn't stationed in Manhattan (where Kilgallen died),' he asserted. 'I was in Brooklyn. Are you sure I signed it? I don't see how the hell I could have signed it in the first place. You got me. I don't know why. I know nothing about the case. I never handled it."[34]

According to journalist Sara Jordan, Kilgallen's biographer Lee Israel told her, "Ordinarily in the case of a woman's suspicious death, the police would go out and at least ask pro forma questions of the people who were around her the night before. But the New York cops did nothing. I mean nothing." [35]

Bill Hunter, Jim Koethe and Tom Howard

Jack Ruby shared an apartment in Dallas with George Senator. When Senator learned that Oswald had been shot he telephoned an attorney, asking for legal representation for his roommate, before it was announced that Ruby was the killer. [36] Within approximately 48 hours of the shooting of Oswald, Senator met with a trio, consisting of attorney Tom Howard, and reporters Jim Koethe of the Dallas Times Herald and Bill Hunter of the Long Beach Press-Telegram. By March of 1965, eight months before Kilgallen's own demise, all three men would be dead. In April of 1964 Bill Hunter was shot to death by a Long Beach policeman. The cop was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to three years probation. On September 21, 1964, Jim Koethe was found dead in his apartment. The Dallas County coroner ruled that he had died of a broken neck by a blow to the throat. 48-year-old Tom Howard's death in 1965 was attributed to a heart attack.

Jim Garrison

The death of witnesses connected to the Kennedy assassination conspiracy was effective in intimidating other witnesses, including those who New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison required to prosecute suspect Clay Shaw. Among those witnesses who, out of fear, would not reveal what they knew to Garrison, were Richard Case Nagell, Alfred Moran, Herbert Wagner, Woodrow Hardy and Vernon Gerdes.[37]

Robert K. Tannenbaum, one of the HSCA lead investigators, located a memo from the office of CIA Director Richard Helms: "It revealed how the CIA had followed, harassed and attempted to intimidate Jim Garrison's witnesses." [38] Joan Mellen's A Farewell to Justice documents the staggering level of harassment under which the intractable Garrison labored as he proceeded to prosecute CIA agent Clay Shaw for the murder of the president. Garrison was opposed by J. Edgar Hoover, by the Kennedy family led by Robert F. Kennedy, and even by Texas Governor John Connolly who rejected the magic bullet theory, yet "harbored animosity toward Jim Garrison." For much of the rest of his life Garrison was harassed with false charges of racketeering, homosexual acts, [39] Mafia bribes, corruption, and income tax fraud, by government agencies and the CIA's friends in the media. [40]

[38] Mellin, p. 344. The HSCA hearings were valuable for the important raw evidence and testimony they gathered at a time when the assassination trail was relatively "hot." Its formal conclusions however, were nearly as wayward as those of the Warren Commission. Other than acknowledging that a conspiracy to kill the president probably had occurred, the HSCA whitewashed the CIA and the FBI of any culpability.

[39] In 1969 Garrison's supposed homosexual partner was alleged to be Pierre Bezou, the son of Clay Shaw's friend, James Bezou. The elder Bezou "committed suicide" five years later. Coroner Frank Minyard regarded Bezou's cause of death as suspicious.

Garrison prosecuted Shaw, the CIA's Louisiana handler of Lee Harvey Oswald—twice. Once as an accessory to the murder of the president, for which Shaw was acquitted, and a second time for perjury in claiming he had never worked for the CIA and did not know Bannister, Ferrie or Oswald.

The perjury case was assigned to Judge Herbert Christenberry whose wife had written to Shaw, congratulating him on his initial acquittal.

In the autumn of 1969, in the midst of preparations to prosecute Shaw the second time, Garrison stood for reelection as district attorney. New Orleans' two major newspapers endorsed Garrison's opponent, Harry Connick, the lawyer who had been part of Shaw's defense team and whose well-funded mayoral campaign outspent Garrison ten to one. Nonetheless, the people of New Orleans reelected Garrison.

On June 1, 1970, a Justice Department Strike Force opened in the city, the sole purpose of which was to put Garrison behind bars. Garrison's physical health deteriorated and he began to play around with other women, causing his wife Liz to leave him.

On behalf of D.A. Garrison, New Orleans Prosecuting Attorney Irvin Dymond had asked Clay Shaw on the witness stand during his trial for perjury, "Have you ever worked for the Central Intelligence Agency?"

Under oath, Shaw answered, "No, I have not."

On May 28, 1971, Judge Christenberry dismissed all of the perjury charges against Shaw.

As part of the cryonic process, 21 years after Shaw's perjury acquittal, the facts of the documentary record were thawed: the CIA's History Staff surveyed CIA files that had been made available to the HSCA between 1977 and 1979. Among 64 sequestered boxes of documents there was one revealing Clay Shaw to have been a CIA employee. In 1992 the CIA's PROJFILES "CIA Matters" division of its History Staff released the document. The History Staff's Director, J. Kenneth McDonald admits, "These records do reveal, however, that Clay Shaw was a highly paid CIA contract source until 1956." Shaw had indeed perjured himself. The CIA's own staff revealed the truth, two years after Garrison was in his grave.

[40] Bobby Kennedy was perhaps warned privately that support for apprehending the perpetrators of his brother's murder would result in more Kennedy deaths. Bobby was not killed until it appeared that his election as president was likely. The notion that without the power of the presidency, RFK should have pursued his brother's killers, is questionable. Mellen implicates Bobby in a plot to assassinate Castro, which Jim Douglass refutes (cf. Douglass, pp. 250-252).

On June 29, 1971, a Federal agent planted an envelope containing a sum of cash in Garrison's drawer. On June 30 Federal agents raided his home in search of the "bribe money." On December 3, 1971 Garrison was indicted in federal court for income tax fraud and conspiracy to obstruct law enforcement. The case went to trial on August 23, 1973; Judge Christenberry presiding.

Garrison represented himself and addressed the racially mixed jury for three hours. Garrison's estranged wife and five children sat in the front row of the spectator's section in support of their embattled husband and father. Mellen recounts how, defining the Declaration of Independence as a document designed to protect individuals from government, Garrison requested that the jury stand as a shield, protecting him from the Federal government which had made a systematic effort to frame him. He admitted that he was not without flaws, "It has been nearly 2,000 years since the last perfect man was on earth," but insisted that he was innocent of the charges against him. Don't let the devil triumph, he advised the jury, his voice cracking with emotion. Two black jurors were seen to weep. The jury returned a unanimous verdict of not guilty. The "Federal Organized Crime Strike Force" packed its bags almost as soon as the jury delivered its verdict. It seems the Feds believed there was only one source of organized crime in New Orleans. Local Mafia boss Carlos Marcello's operations were of little interest.

Toward the end of 1973 Garrison was again facing reelection. Never a man with mercenary motives, his court battle had left him broke. He lost by 2200 votes to Harry Connick, who began destroying Garrison's official assassination conspiracy records upon taking office.

Garrison was indicted and tried again in March, 1974 for income tax evasion. This time the jury acquitted him in less than an hour, but his marriage to Liz was now finished and his health was compromised. Nonetheless, ever the fighter, in 1978 Garrison ran for the Louisiana Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, with money he obtained by mortgaging his property.

Black civil rights organizations endorsed his opponent, who had a $100,000 campaign chest, compared to Garrison's $40,000. Black voters however, supported Garrison and he became an appeals judge.

Garrison had a flair for writing. He penned an account of his investigation, On the Trail of the Assassins. It was published in 1988 and made into the movie, "JFK," filmed in 1990 and distributed in 1991.

Garrison had never been a businessman; he had never been motivated by money. He included his editor and the publisher of his book On the Trail of the Assassins on substantially more of the profits he received from selling the movie rights to the book to Oliver Stone, director of 'JFK,' than he was contractually obligated to do so. One of his sons, who by then was an attorney, objected, telling his father that he was being overly generous. "Son," Garrison said, "these people did me a favor. They published my book when no one else would."

Mr. Garrison received approximately $135,000 for "JFK" in movie royalties and a consulting fee. He was apparently owed more, but the movie studio reneged. He was at least able to pay off his mortgage and the delinquent property taxes on his home on Owens Boulevard. He deposited the remainder of the money, about $85,000, in a non-interest bearing account.

When his son advised him to put the funds into an interest-bearing account, Garrison told him that he did not desire to receive usury. [41]

Toward the end of his life he and Liz were remarried. He died of natural causes in 1990, at age 70. His tombstone in Metairie, Louisiana is emblazoned with the words, "Let Justice be done though the heavens fall."

Dallas Police

On November 22 at 10:30 a.m., Sheriff Bill Decker withdrew security from Kennedy's scheduled motorcade, ordering his deputies and detectives pulled from the surrounding area. Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry issued a similar order to his force. According to William Manchester, Curry told his men to "end supervision of Friday's crowd at Houston and Main," which was a block short of the ambush site. Chief Curry later wrote that he was merely carrying out orders issued to him by the Secret Service, which also directed local police motorcycles to ride in the rear and not alongside the president's car.

U.S. Secret Service

The hypnotic mindset of the deniers of a conspiracy to kill the president is on display in virtually any photograph of the president and First Lady in the Dallas motorcade. The president's limousine is shockingly exposed to gunfire (or any other lethal object). Kennedy is riding in the slow-moving limousine, without protection. Examine photos of the motorcade when it traveled through "Bloody Elm Street" in Dealey Plaza: there are no Secret Service men on or around Kennedy's car and there is no motorcycle escort next to it.[42]

The President was a sitting duck. Can the conspiracy deniers truly say that this was a coincidence? An "accident"? Even in 1963, presidential protection was meticulously planned every step of the way. In many previous JFK presidential motorcades Secret Service Agents rode on his limousine and a motorcycle escort flanked it. Where this was not strictly the case, U.S. troops lined the route facing the crowd and Secret Service agents and policemen were stationed atop buildings. None of these precautions were in place in Dallas. Kennedy's protection had been withdrawn. Anyone with eyes can see that. It is in plain view. This is an "emperor has no clothes" observation. In Dealey Plaza, the conspiracy to murder him was "hidden" in plain sight. It is a sinister joke on every American.

How do the conspirators attempt to get away with this? By insulting our intelligence with the lie that Kennedy himself ordered his protection removed. In addition to the Warren Report, famed Establishment historian William Manchester is one of the earliest sources for the allegation that the president had ordered protection withdrawn from his limousine. In his sanitized best-seller, The Death of the President, Manchester wrote, "Kennedy grew weary of seeing bodyguards roosting behind him every time he turned around, and in Tampa on November 18, just four days before his death, he dryly asked

[42] Agent Clint Hill briefly mounted the rear of the President's limousine four times in Dallas prior to the assassination and quickly dismounted. He was not on the vehicle when the shots were fired.

Agent Floyd Boring to 'Keep those Ivy League charlatans off the back of the car. Boring wasn't offended. There had been no animosity in the remark..."

One problem with Manchester's claim: Boring was not interviewed for Manchester's book and he denied ever hearing Kennedy make the statement attributed to him. In a recorded interview with Vincent Michael Palamara, Boring stated, "I never told him (Manchester) that." Agent Gerald Blaine was probably Manchester's source for the fake story. He was interviewed by Manchester on May 12, 1965. Not everything about the Kennedy conspiracy is revelation of the method — Manchester's research material and witness notes for his book are "under seal" at Wesleyan University until 2067.

"Official history has claimed that the president was difficult to protect and had even ordered the Secret Service to take certain actions that left JFK wide open for assassination...In fact, JFK was very cooperative and did not interfere with the Secret Service." [43]

In 1992 the former Special Agent in Charge of the White House Secret Service Detail, Gerald A. "Jerry" Behn, a 28-year-veteran, was tape-recorded informing author Palamara, "I don't remember Kennedy ever saying that he didn't want anybody on the back of his car."

Boring, the aforementioned Assistant Special Agent in Charge, a 23-year-veteran, stated to Palamara in a recorded interview on September 22, 1993, "JFK was a very easy-going guy...he didn't interfere with our actions at all."

Assistant Special Agent in Charge Rufus Youngblood: "President Kennedy wasn't a hard ass...he never said anything like that (removing agents from the limo)."

Secret Service Agent Arthur L. Godfrey, when asked if Kennedy ordered the agents not to observe standard security procedures replied, "That's a bunch of baloney; that's not true. He never ordered us to do anything. He was a very nice man..."[44]

Special Agent in Charge Robert I. Bouck told Palamara that having agents on the back of the limousine depended on factors independent of any alleged Presidential "requests."

[44] Ibid., p. 24.

James J. Rowley was Chief of the United States Secret Service in 1963. Under questioning by Warren Commission Chief Counsel J. Lee Rankin, Rowley testified that: "No President will tell the Secret Service what they can or cannot do...sometimes it might be as a political man or individual he might think this might not look good in a given situation. But that does not mean per se that he does not want you on there (the rear of the limousine). And I don't think anyone with common sense interprets it as such." [45]

Rowley's predecessor as head of the Secret Service was Urbanus E. Baughman. He wrote, "Now the Chief of the Secret Service is legally empowered to countermand a decision made by anybody in this country if it might endanger the life or limb of the Chief Executive. This means I could veto a decision of the President himself if I decided it would be dangerous not to."[46]

What this testimony reveals is that even if the lie were true, and Kennedy had ordered his security detail to leave him and the passengers in his automobile open to attack, the Secret Service agents in charge would have had to have been traitors and conspirators to have complied with him.

"At least two (Secret Service) agents lied to the Warren Commission. Even worse...they implicitly pinned the blame on the fallen president himself, hinting that Kennedy's recklessness or fatalism— not anything the agents had done in Dallas — ignited a tragic series of events. Kennedy's critics still chant the mantra that the president brought it upon himself. These outright lies and half-truths cannot absolve the Secret Service for losing the life of a president..." [47]

President Kennedy's vulnerability to attack in Dealey Plaza is so clearly an indication of the Cryptocracy's intent to slaughter him that the System has had to marshal a substantial array of "explain-it-away" literature. This includes the Warren Report, books by Manchester and Jim Bishop; Gerald Posner's Case Closed and Gerald Blaine's The Kennedy Detail, which was published in 2010, only after the agents who would have contradicted him were dead (cf. Palamara p. 22, for a list of those agents).

[46] U.E. Baughman, Secret Service Chief (Harper and Row, 1963), p. 70. Asked about the behavior of the Secret Service in Dallas, former Chief Baughman told US News and World Report (Dec. 23, 1963), "I can't understand why Mrs. Kennedy had to climb over the back of the car, as she did, to get help..."

[47] Philip Melanson, The Secret Service, pp. 58-59.

Former Secret Service agent Abraham W. Bolden Sr., author of The Echo from Dealey Plaza, wrote: "I was dismayed at the continued attempts by former agents to deny culpability in the assassination...I was hoping that the former Kennedy bodyguards would show a modicum of contriteness ... instead of trying to blame Kennedy's assassination on the president himself."

Secret Service Agent Emory P. Roberts was one of three shift leaders on President Kennedy's security detail in Dallas. Roberts was the commander of the Secret Service follow-up car. At Love Field, Kennedy's motorcade was filmed leaving the Dallas airport and this footage has been preserved: "...when viewing slow motion black and white video footage of the Love Field departure, one can see agent Donald J. Lawton jogging at the rear of the limousine on JFK's side only to be recalled by none other than Emory P. Roberts, who rises in his seat in the follow-up car and, using his voice and several hand-gestures, orders Lawton to cease and desist." [48]

After the assassination, Roberts received a political appointment as special assistant to President Lyndon Johnson, while still a member of the Secret Service, in violation of Treasury Department rules (the Service was part of the Treasury until being absorbed by the Department of Homeland Security). Roberts was further promoted to the post of Inspector of the U.S. Secret Service in the Nixon administration.

The U.S. Secret Service appears to have done more than contribute to Kennedy's murder by omission. When suspected shooters were confronted in Dealey Plaza by local policemen and bystanders after the president had been hit, the suspects flashed Secret Service credentials. "The assassins of the president controlled the crime scene from the beginning. When witnesses instinctively stormed the grassy knoll to chase a shooter who was apparently behind the fence at the top, they immediately encountered plainclothesmen identifying themselves as Secret Service agents." [49]

[48] Palamara, pp. 8-9.

"Dallas Police Officer Joe Marshall Smith was one of the first people to rush up the grassy knoll and behind its stockade fence....he smelled gunsmoke right away. He told the Warren Commission that when he encountered a man in the parking lot behind the fence, 'he showed me that he was a Secret Service agent....He saw me coming with my pistol and right away showed me who he was. The man, this character, produces credentials from his hip pocket which showed him to be the Secret Service. I have seen those credentials before and they satisfied me and the deputy sheriff." [50]

"Besides withdrawing security from Dealey Plaza and the presidential limousine, the Secret Service also planned the turn that slowed Kennedy's limousine to a crawl.[51] That forced slowdown completed the setup for the snipers in waiting. The Secret Service advance man, Winston G. Lawson, approved the fatal dogleg turn in Dealey Plaza when he and the Dallas Special Agent in Charge, Forrest V. Sorels, did their dry run over the motorcade route on November 18. Thus, not only did the Secret Service plan and coordinate a turn that flagrantly violated its own rule of a minimum forty-four-mile-an-hour speed for the presidential limousine. Through orders from Washington, the agency responsible for the president's security created a vacuum of security—in Dealey Plaza, all around the limousine, and on the surrounding buildings as well...the only 'Secret Service Agents' in Dealey Plaza when the shots were fired were impostors and killers, bearing false credentials to facilitate their escape and coerce witnesses into handing over vital evidence that would vanish." [52]

Mary Pinchot Meyer

Mary Pinchot Meyer had been President Kennedy's lover and confidant, reportedly giving him LSD on one occasion. Her influence over the president was said to have been considerable. Before noon on October 12, 1964, in Washington D.C., on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal towpath, the 43-year-old scion of a distinguished American family was shot twice in an execution-style murder: once in her head, and once through her back, at close range; the second shot penetrating her right lung and aorta. The .38-caliber murder weapon was never found. Her ex-husband was Cord Meyer, a CIA agent working within the CIA's Directorate of Plans under Richard Helms.

[50] Douglass, ibid.

[51] "Clint Hill's Warren Commission testimony and Paul Landis' report confirms that...when the shooting commenced...the limousine was slowing down from an original speed of only around 11.2 mph." Cf. Palamara, p. 10.

[52] Douglass, pp. 272-273. There were of course Secret Service men in Dealey Plaza — riding on the limousine behind Kennedy.

After her death her diary came into the possession of CIA executive James Jesus Angleton. A black man, Ray Crump Jr., was the scapegoat. He was charged with the crime and eventually acquitted in July, 1965. The investigative journalist on Meyer's case, Leo Damore, was found shot to death in 1995. Authorities ruled his death a suicide. His book on Meyer was nearing completion. Peter Janney's Mary's Mosaic: The CIA Conspiracy to Murder John F. Kennedy and Mary Pinchot Meyer (2012), is a worthwhile source of information.

Evidence Tampering

As in the hasty demolition of the Murrah building, target of the Oklahoma City bombing, and the FBI's removal of the tiny cabin of accused Unabomber Ted Kazcynski in Lincoln, Montana, against the orders of the county sheriff, to a secret district of an air base; as well as the inordinately rushed demolition of the Twin Towers in New York City in 2001, the key evidence in the JFK hit, the 1961 Lincoln Continental in which he died, was whisked away by the Secret Service and then completely gutted, rebuilt and repainted.

Folklorists often draw macabre parallels between the assassinations of Lincoln and Kennedy (such as, "Kennedy died in a Lincoln and Lincoln died in a Ford"). However, there is no comparison between the two men with regard to the fate of the scenes of their deaths. Ford's Theatre is a meticulously preserved, solemn national shrine to Lincoln, while the Lincoln limousine in which President Kennedy had been murdered was ghoulishly returned to service in 1964 where, for the next thirteen years, it ferried four presidents — Johnson, Nixon, Ford and Carter — as they and their passengers ate, drank, smoked, swore, laughed and dozed. Johnson in particular must have enjoyed quite a few laughs in the same luxury vehicle where President Kennedy's head exploded.

Aside from the grinning that such a disrespectful end for the King of Camelot's death carriage evoked within the Cryptocracy, is the fact that the Secret Service made any forensic crime scene investigation of the limousine impossible. This amounts to felony evidence-tampering.

That some Secret Service men did not care for the president is likely. The official explanation for the antipathy is Kennedy's numerous trysts with various girlfriends. Agent Tim McIntyre, who rode in the limousine behind JFK in the Dallas motorcade, "felt abused" by his service to Kennedy, claiming that JFK's adulterous acts were equivalent to liaisons with prostitutes, thereby making his Secret Service guards accomplices. On ABC-TV McIntyre stated, "...if you have a procurer with prostitutes paraded in front of you...you're asking yourself, 'well, what do they think of us?"[53] If his offended sensibility was sincere, why wouldn't a pillar of moral rectitude like Agent McIntyre quit the service? Or could it be that the tale of shocked Secret Service sensibilities is a cover for other, more esoteric sources of opposition, such as a desire to be on the winning side in the forthcoming coup[54] that would make Lyndon Baines Johnson president.

Vincent Bugliosi

Since Gerald Posner's propaganda for the government's lone nut theory (Case Closed) was discredited, former Charles Manson Family prosecutor Vincent Bugliosi stepped forth as the Establishment's go-to guy in support of the guilty-until-proven-otherwise, trial by media that has been used to substitute for the criminal trial Oswald never received.

In compiling his rebuttal to Bugliosi, Reclaiming Parkland, James DiEugenio noted the prodigious output of Bugliosi. DiEugenio waded through Bugliosi's huge tome, Reclaiming Crocker, former US ambassador to Afghanistan and Iraq: "Immediately after 9/11, while serving in the State Department, I sat down with Iranian diplomats...Back then, we had a common enemy, the Taliban and its Al Qaeda associates..The Iranians were constructive...at one point they even produced an extremely valuable map showing the Taliban's order of battle just before American military action began...We forged agreements on various security issues and coordinated approaches to reconstruction. And then, suddenly, it all came to an end when President George W. Bush gave his famous 'Axis of Evil' speech in early 2002. The Iranian leadership concluded that in spite of their cooperation with the American war effort, the US remained implacably hostile to the Islamic Republic." New York Times (online) November 3, 2013. 2. History (W.W. Norton, 2007), which consists of 1600 printed pages and additional files on an accompanying CD-ROM for a total, according to DiEugenio, of 2646 pages. Bugliosi's big book has since been pared down and recycled in 2013 as Four Days in November. It has also been been filmed as the blockbuster Hollywood movie "Parkland," produced by Tom Hanks, accompanied by a tie-in volume, also titled, Parkland. A November, 2013 National Geographic television special, "Killing Kennedy" based on a silly book co-authored by Bill O'Reilly, formerly a headliner for Fox News—is evidence of ceaseless corporate support for the moronic "lone nut" theory, which the media have sought to resurrect like a rotted scarecrow from an autumnal cornfield.

This trial by media, with reporters acting as mouthpieces for crooked police, Federal agents and prosecutors, helping to convict defendants who are owed the presumption of innocence, has been the bane of our system of justice. Big Brother's preconceived assumptions of guilt are trumpeted with little skepticism or moderating shades of gray, in a process Mark Lane termed, "Rush to Judgment." Exactly one day after the president was assassinated, Captain Will Fritz of the Dallas Police Department had the chutzpah to announce that the case was already closed: "We are convinced beyond any doubt that he (Oswald) killed the President. I think the case is clinched."

Oswald was killed while under the "protection" of the government. After his death it would have been the decent, honorable and traditional American thing for the Warren Commission and the media to proceed to accord Oswald the presumption of innocence and a vigorous defense. The opposite occurred. As early as January, 1964 the Warren Commission presumed he was guilty, not innocent. On the day Oswald was arrested, Dallas District Attorney Henry Wade appeared on national television and stated that Oswald had killed the president. A mere 48 hours later, on November 24, the New York Times published the front page headline, "Evidence Against Oswald Described as Conclusive." On November 25, the Associated Press declared Oswald guilty of the assassination. One week after President Kennedy was assassinated, on December 1, the Washington Post assured the American people, "...all the police agencies with a hand in the investigation...insist that the case against Oswald is an unshakeable one."

Time magazine's December 13 issue asserted, "Oswald, acting in his own lunatic loneliness, was indeed the president's assassin." Newsweek rubber-stamped this "lunatic" sentiment in its December 16 issue.

When, in September, 1964, the Warren Commission released its twenty-six volumes of supporting testimony and exhibits, the New York Times printed a glowing review the very next day. The editors at the Times had somehow read and corroborated the contents of the Commission's entire gigantic opus within 24 hours.[55] Thus was born the notorious "lone nut" profile that the media and authorities would trot out for Sirhan Sirhan, James Earl Ray, Arthur Bremer, David Berkowitz, James Holmes, Stephen Paddock, Nikolas Cruz, etc.

Bugliosi and O'Reilly's literary productions and movie tie-ins are the culmination of this depressingly familiar, interminable process. What is so obtuse about prejudicial publicity, and police statements of conclusive guilt made in the immediate wake of a major arrest, is that every reporter who has worked the police beat, as well as every cop worth his salt, knows very well that an investigation only truly begins with the apprehension of a suspect. When some government official or news media outlet either declares, or strongly implies, that the case is "clinched" soon after the alleged perp has been arrested, it is fair to surmise that we are being hoodwinked.

Priscilla Johnson is alleged to have been a CIA-planted journalist whose disinformation about Oswald was published the weekend after the president's assassination in the pages of the Boston Globe, Dallas Morning News and Christian Science Monitor. Her 1977 book, in line with the Warren Commission's "findings," Marina and Lee, is in the same mold. The New York Times published an adulatory review. She is one of Bugliosi's major sources on Oswald.

DiEugenio states that FBI "agents in the field...got the drift: Oswald had acted alone. Therefore any evidence to the contrary would be most unwelcome. As FBI supervisor Laurence Keenan told Anthony Summers: "Within days (of Nov. 22, 1963) we could say the investigation was over. Conspiracy was a word that was verboten. The idea that Oswald was a confederate or was part of a group or a conspiracy was definitely enough to place a man's career in jeopardy..."

[55] A half century later and the Times was still at it: "New York Times executive editor Jill Abramson hijacked a large chunk of her paper's Sunday Book Review on November 3, 2013 to ponder the Kennedy mystery. And after deliberating for page after page on the subject, she could only conclude that there was some 'kind of void at the center of the Kennedy story' and that 'the historical consensus seems to have settled on' the lone gunman theory." -David Talbot, Salon, Nov. 6, 2013.

Comedian Bugliosi on Hoover: "J. Edgar Hoover, since his appointment as FBI Director in 1924, at once formed and effectively ran, perhaps the finest, most incorruptible law enforcement agency in history."

Other disinformation assets in the media, such as Max Holland, Patricia Lambert, James Phelan and PBS "Frontline" reporter Scott Malone, attempted to obstruct or malign the reputation of New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison.

The CIA has been directly involved in planting stories and manipulating the media. An April 4, 1967 CIA directive titled "Countering Criticism of the Warren Report," is addressed to "Chief, Certain Stations and Bases." It is mainly concerned with hampering Garrison, who is referred to in the document as "the critic." It advises that the CIA should "employ propaganda assets to answer and refute the attacks of the critic." [56]

At the New York Times, reporter Martin Waldron is alleged by Joan Mellen to have falsified the testimony of witnesses at Garrison's trial of Clay Shaw. The Times even declared Garrison unfit for public office, and when its columnist John Leonard expressed skepticism toward the official Kennedy autopsy report, Leonard's column "evaporated in later editions of the Times."

In his own book on Mr. Bugliosi, Mr. DiEugenio is temperate and civil, and strives for objectivity, praising Bugliosi for writing he produced critical of Bill Clinton and George W. Bush.[57] Bugliosi meanwhile, employs pejoratives and invectives while denouncing as conspiracy theorists those who doubt President Kennedy was killed by a lone nut, yet Bugliosi is on record as stating, concerning the assassination of Robert F. Kennedy, "We are talking about a conspiracy to commit murder...a conspiracy the prodigious dimensions of which make Watergate look like a one-roach marijuana case."

[57] The Betrayal of America; also No Island of Sanity: Paula Jones vs. Bill Clinton; and The Prosecution of George W. Bush for Murder. The latter is a powerful indictment that deserves to be reprinted. Was it written to make amends for the disinformation Mr. Bugliosi propagated concerning the Tate/LaBianca murders and the assassination of President Kennedy?

DiEugenio lists the many historically accurate points made by Oliver Stone in his movie "JFK," which Bugliosi denounces as complete fiction. DiEugenio asserts that Stone, if anything, understated the case and did not go far enough in making certain conspiracy points. DiEugenio acknowledges the inevitable dramatic license which Stone sometimes took to move the story along but which did not falsify the truth of the film's central thesis.

Future U.S. President Gerald Ford altered the Warren Report at the last minute, changing the wording of the location of Kennedy's back wound (solving the otherwise inexplicable high-exit-wound dilemma). Bugliosi says this was a benign error on Ford's part. Ford would become president after the resignation of Richard Nixon. Ford's administration was a seedbed for personnel destined to play a key role in criminal politics. Ford named George H.W. Bush as CIA director. Ford promoted Dick Cheney to White House Chief of Staff and made Donald Rumsfeld a high official in the Pentagon. The Neocon war party was energized as never before by President Ford who, together with Allen Dulles and Alan Specter, was among the most duplicitous Warren Commission members involved in the concealment of the conspiracy against John F. Kennedy.

Critics of the Warren Commission besides Jim Garrison were Gary Hart and Dave Marston of the 1975 Senator Frank Church Committee ("United States Senate Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities"); the first chief counsel and the deputy counsel of the HSCA, Richard Sprague and Robert Tannenbaum, and their replacements, Robert Blakey and Gary Cornwell; and Jeremy Gunn, the Director and Chief Counsel of the Assassination Records Review Board (ARRB). [58] (The public furor which arose in the wake of the film "JFK" led Congress to pass the 1992 "President John F. Kennedy Assassination Records Collection Act," from which the ARRB came into existence).

Warren Commission members Rep. Hale Boggs and Sen. Russell Long, were full-fledged skeptics. Long's own private investigator, Philip Corso, did not believe that the alleged murder weapon, the Mannlicher Carcano rifle, could have performed as alleged. Coros believed rogue CIA agents killed Kennedy. Senator Russell began to criticize the Warren Commission in public beginning on November 20, 1966. Russell did not believe in the "magic bullet" and was convinced that the FBI and CIA deceived the Warren Commission. Hale Boggs, the Commission's only Catholic member investigating the murder of the nation's only Catholic president, stated that "Hoover lied his eyes out to the Commission —on Oswald, on Ruby, on their friends, the bullets, the gun, you name it."[59] Boggs was subsequently killed in a plane crash in Alaska.

Mr. Bugliosi used the New Orleans District Attorney who succeeded Garrison, Harry Connick, as a witness against Garrison and filmmaker Oliver Stone, without mentioning that Connick was implicated in destroying Garrison's prosecution records which, by law, were left at the D.A.'s office; Connick is also alleged to be connected to rogue prosecutions in which certainly innocent defendants (such as John Thompson) were targeted for prosecution. Perhaps most damning of all, Connick had been a defense attorney for CIA asset Clay Shaw.

DiEugenio documents the corruption of Wade, the aforementioned Dallas D.A. at the time of the assassination, who is reputed to have railroaded many defendants over the years and whose office withheld twelve boxes of Kennedy assassination documents from the ARRB. Wade is praised unstintingly by Bugliosi.

DiEugenio has sections devastating to Bugliosi: on Marina Oswald, on the paraffin tests administered to Oswald after his arrest; Oswald's lack of proficiency as a marksman; the testimony of Texas School Book Depository employees Williams, Arnold and Adams; the president's autopsy, including the missing notes and the fact that the military limited the autopsy, that Humes destroyed the notes and the first draft of his own autopsy report, and the datum that the autopsy pathologists did not examine Pres. Kennedy's clothing.

John Stringer testified that he did not take the pictures of Kennedy's brain that are in the National Archives. It was Dr. Malcolm Perry who performed the tracheostomy on the president. During a press conference in Dallas and to reporters from the Boston Globe—Perry said three times that the wound in the neck was an entrance wound—but to the Warren Commission, under pressure from Secret Service Agent Elmer Moore, Earl Warren's "bodyguard," Perry repudiated his original testimony. (Bugliosi does not mention Moore in his nearly 2700 pages).

Oswald, Shaw and Ferrie

Vincent Bugliosi states that Oswald and Ferrie did not know each other and that Guy Bannister and Oswald were not connected.

Ed Voebel, Fred O'Sullivan and, according to HSCA investigators L.J. Delsa and Bob Buras, several other witnesses such as Jerry Paradis, testified Ferrie and Oswald knew each other (cf. John Armstrong's book, Harvey and Lee). There is a Civil Air Patrol photograph of them together.

As stated on page 187 herein, Clay Shaw, David Ferrie and Oswald were together in the summer of 1963 in two small Louisiana towns, Clinton and Jackson, in sparsely populated East Feliciana Parish, approximately 90 miles north of New Orleans. "John R. Rarick, district judge for the Feliciana parishes...was having his thick black hair cut at the Jackson barber shop of his supporter, Lea McGehee...'Oswald was here,' McGehee told Rarick. It had been late summer of 1963." [60] The FBI knew about it through Reeves Morgan, a witness who was a member of the Louisiana state legislature.

Other witnesses to the presence of Shaw, Ferrie and Oswald in East Feliciana Parish were Morgan's daughter Mary, and son Van; Gloria Wilson and Andrew Dunn, and Gladys Palmer, a woman who had worked as a stripper at Ruby's Carousel Club.

"During that summer (1963), Gladys Palmer had been seen often with Lee Harvey Oswald...Gladys had been spotted with Oswald at two bars east of Baton Rouge: the Audubon and the Hawaiian Lounge...D.J. Blanchard, an engineer at 'East' (Louisiana State Hospital), saw Gladys drive with Oswald to the Audubon...." [61]

There is no reference to Gladys Palmer in the Warren Commission Report.

[61] Mellen, pp. 215-216.

“As (Anne) Dischler and Fruge continued to interview the residents of Clinton and Jackson, a narrative emerged: Oswald, Clay Shaw and David Ferrie had driven into Clinton...Oswald got out of the car (a black cadillac), and joined the already long line of black people waiting to attempt to register to vote...It appears to have been September 19 (1963)...”

The registrar of voters, Henry Earl Palmer, told Garrison’s investigators, “Oswald registered to vote up here.” Palmer said that he allowed him to register because Oswald mentioned that he knew Cuban-American psychiatrist Dr. Frank Silva, the medical director of “East,” the hospital in which Rose Cheramie had predicted that Kennedy would be killed, and where Oswald (or his double) [62] applied for a job in September, 1963.

“Maxine Kemp, who...worked in personnel, confirmed that Oswald had applied for a job...Receptionist Bobbie Dedon identified Oswald from his photograph...a ‘former Army intelligence officer’ told the populist writer Ned Touchstone that a man who looked like Oswald and used his name had applied for work at East. He had arrived in a big automobile ‘believed to belong to a wealthy New Orleans man.’ Palmer gave his description of the two white males sitting in front in the black Cadillac as it waited for Oswald. He identified David Ferrie in a photograph from his ‘heavy eyebrows.” [63]

A cop in Clinton identified Shaw: John “Manchester was a law enforcement officer and it was to him that the driver of the black Cadillac had shown a driver’s license in the name of ‘Clay Shaw.’ It was to (Officer) Manchester that the driver admitted that he worked for the International Trade Mart.” [64]

Witnesses Corrie Collins, Henry Palmer, and William Dunn saw Shaw, Ferrie and Oswald together in the town of Clinton.

Two witnesses died mysterious deaths — Gloria Wilson in 1964 of suspected poisoning, and Andrew Dunn, who was found hanged in the Clinton jail in 1968. “Anne Dischler discovered that Gloria had left a diary locked in her private drawer...

[62] “...there were quite a few men that summer and autumn who went around calling themselves ‘Oswald” (Mellen, p. 209). Jim Douglass has information on Oswald’s doubles: cf. pp. 221-227, 334-335; 351-354.

[63] Mellen, pp. 217; 219-223.

[64] Mellen, p. 235. In February, 1968, Hugh Aynesworth, working for Shaw’s defense team, tried to bribe Officer Manchester. If he would leave Louisiana and not be a witness for the prosecution he would be guaranteed lucrative employment out of state. Manchester said no.

"When her sister Flo went to collect Gloria's possessions, the diary was gone." [65]

Mr. Bugliosi denies all of this witness testimony and charges Garrison with fraud and having removed two investigators, Francis Fruge and Anne Dischler, when it was in fact the state police who had removed those two from Garrison's staff at the same time that Life magazine was pressuring Louisiana Governor John McKeithen to hinder Garrison. [66]

In 1978 the House of Representatives Select Committee on Assassinations determined that there was a "clear indication" that Oswald was with Shaw and Ferrie in Clinton and Jackson, Louisiana. [67]

"Clay Shaw was a CIA operative who, as director of the Centro Mondiale Commerciale in Rome (Italy), joined fellow agents like Ferenc Nagy, who since 1948 had worked for the CIA under the direction of Assistant Director of Central Intelligence, Frank Wisner...

"In November of 1943 Shaw enlisted in the Army...Military intelligence discovered him. Never having seen a day of combat, Shaw rose to the rank of major as aide-de-camp to General Charles O. Thrasher, who was in charge of transferring German prisoners of war to the French. Thrasher was a man of such cruel disposition that he horrified the French liaison officer.

"Appalled by Thrasher's callous treatment of the German prisoners in his charge, Major William H. Haight swore out a deposition against him for the inhumane means by which he handled and transferred the Germans, who were being starved to death and were in a condition 'worse than the former

"The House Select Committee on Assassinations was hastily voted into being in 1976, after some witnesses who'd been called to testify before Frank Church's earlier Senate Intelligence Committee turned up dead or missing. (Chicago's Sam Giancana was murdered while cooking sausage in his basement, five days before he was scheduled to testify, wounded around the mouth and throat to signify the price of becoming an informant; Jimmy Hoffa disappeared; and Vegas's Johnny 'Mr. Smooth' Rosselli, who'd mediated between the CIA and the mob in plots to kill Castro and who evidently, in closed session, had been overly forthcoming to the Church Committee about the Kennedy plot, was discovered floating—legless, stabbed, and shot—in an oil drum in Dumfoundling Bay, north of Miami...the CIA, aided by a fishy liaison named George Joannides, held back from the House Select Committee a raft of relevant documents..." (Nicholson Baker, op. cit.).

German concentration camps.' Shaw moved with ease through an Army Counterintelligence group called the 'Special Operations Section.' Still without having stepped onto a battlefield to face enemy fire, he was to receive a Croix de Guerre, and a Legion of Merit from France, and a similar decoration from Belgium.

"Returning to New Orleans, he joined a CIA proprietary, the Mississippi Shipping Company, run by a fellow homosexual, Theodore Brent. When the (Central Intelligence) Agency sponsored the first of its international trade centers in New Orleans (there would be another in Rome), its 'principal backer and developer' was a lawyer named Lloyd J. Cobb, who had received his Covert Security Clearance from the CIA in October 1953...The International Trade Mart was run by CIA operatives...The Trade Mart donated money to CIA asset Ed Butler...Every consulate within its bowels was bugged...(Shaw) hired fellow single men and could be spotted in his Thunderbird convertible filled with boys...when Theodore Brent died, he left Shaw a legacy, a legal defense fund for gay men that Shaw dispensed as 'Clay Bertrand.'" [68]

David Ferrie piloted the plane which flew Shaw to Cuba in 1959 as part of a CIA project to refine Cuban nickel at a Louisiana refinery through the Freeport Sulphur company, which Vincent Buliosi does not mention. L.P. Davies Jr., Charles Krop and Betty Rubio also testified to seeing Shaw with Ferrie. Bugliosi does not mention them.

According to Prof. Mellen, "Shaw knew Oswald's mentor David Ferrie so well that he co-signed a loan for a him a week before the assassination so that Ferrie could rent a plane and fly to Dallas." Ferrie was never called to testify before the Warren Commission.

Lyndon Johnson

Recent findings of Kennedy assassination conspiracy investigators such as Phillip F. Nelson, point to Vice President Lyndon Johnson having had a significant or even decisive hand in the murder, which appears to have been managed by operators who had the cooperation of clandestine networks tied to two CIA heads, former director Allen Dulles and future director Richard Helms, as well as CIA Deputy Director of Plans Richard Bissell. Strong suspicion has also been cast on Air Force General Curtis LeMay.

[68] Mellen, pp. xvii and 130-132.

In 1966 Helms was named CIA director by President Johnson. (Dulles and Bissell had been fired by JFK). Helms ran the CIA until 1971, when he was replaced first by James Schlesinger and in 1973 by the reform-minded William Colby, who had acted criminally in Vietnam, but for whatever reasons was attempting to make amends by exposing Helms and discharging "James Jesus Angelton and the entire top brass of the (CIA's) counterintelligence division." Colby implicated Helms in the CIA overthrow of Salvador Allende, which led to Helms being convicted of having perjured himself before Congress.

Colby died under mysterious circumstances April 27, 1996 in Maryland. Though he was no longer with the Agency at the time of his demise, "the CIA had exclusive control of the death scene." [69]

Decades after King-Kill/33, investigators like Jim Douglass say they still do not know who in the Cryptocracy gave the direct order to assassinate the president. Others, including Phillip F. Nelson in his powerful work, LBJ: The Mastermind of the JFK Assassination, believe that Lyndon Johnson was the ring-leader. Our own best surmise is that without the Vice President's knowledge and consent the November coup could not have gone forward. We now know that Johnson faced imminent political ruin and removal from the 1964 ticket, if Kennedy was not killed or incapacitated. "His involvement in scandals with his aide Bobby Baker and business tycoon Billy Sol Estes were about to make headlines. During the summer of 1963, Life magazine had been developing a major feature story concerning Vice President Johnson and his scandalous dealings. The in-depth story was scheduled for publication in late November...The story, according to James Wagenvoord, at that time the chief assistant to Life's Publishing Projects Director, Phil Wooton, had been researched by members of the senior staff at Life who had a direct line to Bobby Kennedy...On (President) Kennedy's death, research files and all numbered copies of the nearly print-ready draft were gathered up...and shredded." [70]

[69] On Colby's strange death and the aftermath, cf. Randall Woods, Shadow Warrior (2013), pp. 2-5.

According to his foremost biographer, Robert Caro, in The Path to Power (The Years of Lyndon Johnson, Volume 1), pp. 275 and 535, Johnson's lifetime obsession was to be President of the United States.

In 1966 the "Grassy Knoll Press" published MacBird by Barbara Garson, a modern play penned in mock-imitation of Shakespeare's various tragedies, with special emphasis on Macbeth ("Macbird"), who is meant to represent Lyndon Baines Johnson. In Shakespeare's play, the witches anticipate Macbeth's murder of Duncan, King of Scotland and prophetically greet Macbeth as Thane of Cawdor and "king hereafter." In MacBird the witches say, "All hail MacBird that shall be President!" Garson's play, in line with Shakespeare's, has Johnson as the guilty killer going slowly mad, and "Robert" (Kennedy) as JFK's avenger. MacBird sold over half a million copies as a book and had over 90 stagings worldwide. Theater critic Dwight Macdonald writing in the December 1, 1966 NY Review of Books: "...the murder in Dallas paralleled the one in Dunsinan— Johnson-Macbeth contrived the murder of Kennedy-Duncan."

Here was the Killing of the King story being further imprinted on the psyche of the American people, with the boldface parallel between Lyndon Johnson and Macbeth, after having John F. Kennedy identified as the leader of Camelot. Is this another "hide in plain sight" gambit of the Truth or Consequences revelators?

Oswald was made to look like a commie pinko. The original intent of this set-up was to fan the flames of US/Soviet tensions which JFK had been seeking to extinguish. Kennedy assassination conspirator Lyndon Johnson discarded the part of the script that had Oswald acting on behalf of Castro or Krushchev. The general impression of Oswald as a Communist was left to fester however (where it remains today), but no move was made on the part of Johnson's administration to hold Communist governments responsible for the president's death.

[70] Peter Janney, Mary's Mosaic, 307-308.

From the Left comes the idea that Kennedy was killed by a Right wing conspiracy. DiEugenio, misquoting Joan Mellen in her book, A Farewell to Justice, (p. 227), claims that White Citizens Council publisher Ned Touchstone, who opposed JFK when he was alive and was a self-admitted associate of the Kennedy-hating General Edwin Walker, intimidated a key JFK conspiracy witness (Gladys Palmer) into silence.

DiEugenio: "Others (witnesses) like lawyer Billy Kline, were intimidated by the aforementioned rightwing forces in the town...There was also Gladys Palmer, a potentially very important witness, who was talked to by local rightwing heavies Jack Rogers and Ned Touchstone. She then forgot all about seeing Oswald." DiEugenio cites Prof. Joan Mellen's book, p. 227, as his source.

Here is what Joan Mellen actually wrote on p. 227: "On August 22, Fruge and Sciambra found Gladys at her home on Evangeline Street. She had already been interviewed by Jack Rogers and Ned Touchstone, she said testily. She did not know anything 'that would lend any assistance.' She had never seen or heard of Lee Harvey Oswald 'in her life' before the assassination. She had never heard of Jack Ruby until he shot Oswald."

It's quite a leap for Mr. DiEugenio, who in other respects is an astute investigative journalist, to say "rightwing heavy Ned Touchstone" talked to Gladys, and then in the very next sentence state, "She then forgot all about seeing Oswald," as if her feigned amnesia was connected to Touchstone — a connection which Mellen, who seems to accept Touchstone as a sincere JFK conspiracy investigator (cf. Mellen, 210-211), did not make. Mr. Touchstone spent much of his journalistic career supporting Jim Garrison and denouncing the Warren Commission. Another key witness who was not intimidated was McGehee. Ned Touchstone was married to June A. McGehee. [71]

Something that both James Douglass and James DiEugenio don't take the time to refute are theories by Left-wing groups who are known to affiliate with Gerald Posner, claiming that Jim Garrison's investigation was an operation of the extreme Right wing in America.[72]

[71] In another JFK synchronicity, Touchstone's daughter Lia, married a man named Tippit.

[72] Cf. for instance, mcadams.posc.mu.edu/clinton4.htm

DiEugenio and Douglass seem oblivious to this canard. Douglass and many other Kennedy conspiracy investigators insist that the president was killed by a Right wing CIA that benefited from hate-propaganda against him stirred up by radical Right groups like the John Birch Society, one of whose leaders was among those who placed an advertisement in the Dallas Morning News of November 22, accusing the president of treason (for the text of the advertisement cf. Douglass, 369-370). The ad was placed by Bernard Weissman, Larrie H. Schmidt, William Burley III and John Birch Society coordinator Joseph P. Grinnan, who was a Texas oilman, under the name of a fictitious organization, "The American Fact-Finding Committee" (Douglass, p. 483).

By means of this advertisement, the JFK assassination conspiracy yet again becomes all things to all people: what was a supposed Left-wing plot on the part of Oswald in the CIA's planted Soviet "expatriate" and missionary for Castro performance, becomes a Right-wing plot involving Birchers and Texas oilmen. Choose your poison.

The oft heard canard about the involvement of H.L. Hunt and "Texas oilmen" has a CIA origin: "In March of 1968 D.A. Garrison was given a manuscript, variously titled 'The Plot' and 'Farewell America' which was a 'ragtag jumble of disinformation designed for no other purpose other than to distract Jim Garrison from naming the CIA as his chief suspect...' The book pinned Kennedy's killing on 'Texas oil interests and the Hunt family.' The...litany of false sponsors appears: Drennan, Wheat and Gale, Minutemen and Birchites...The author, Herve Lamarre, turned out to be...a scion of French intelligence doing the CIA a favor." [73]

To what degree was the "Right wing hate propaganda" that greeted President and Mrs. Kennedy in Dallas, a put-up job by the Cryptocracy? If Oswald was a patsy made to look like a Left wing conspirator, why is it so improbable that there were Right wing patsies made to look as though they were behind the JFK assassination?

Jim Douglass comes out of the Catholic Left for whom a Communist war criminal like Nikita Krushchev, who butchered, at the very least, hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians, was a partner for peace.

When Mr. Douglass posits the CIA as "Right wing" he should distinguish between the military-industrial complex's Establishment Right, and the anti-Establishment populist Right of leaders such as Willis Carto and Ned Touchstone. Carto published and promoted the work of Kennedy assassination researcher and attorney Mark Lane. Carto's Liberty Lobby and Spotlight newspaper were sued for defamation by CIA conspirator E. Howard Hunt for having printed an exposé of Hunt provided by former CIA agent Victor Marchetti. Mark Lane, who successfully defended Liberty Lobby in court, provides a valuable account in his 1991 book Plausible Denial.[74]

Some Left-leaning Kennedy assassination investigators make the knee-jerk assumption that the U.S. government in the 1940s, '50s, '60s and '70s was a bastion of sincere conservative anti-communism. A study of top U.S. government operative George C. Marshall's role in protecting Maoist Communism in China from defeat,[75] as well as the machinations of Operation Keelhaul, the assassinations of General George Patton and Secretary of Defense James Forrestal, among numerous instances of U.S. intervention on behalf of international Communism, puts paid to this illusion about the Federal government.

Carto and Touchstone and other American populists objected to many of Jack Kennedy's policies before his death, but after he was killed they presciently espied an emerging shadow government. These men realized that if the [74] Also cf. Michael Collins Piper, Final Judgment (1995), published by Willis Carto. Mr. Piper provided seldom discussed evidence of the Israeli-connections of intelligence operatives associated with the assassination conspiracy.

[75] An early front was opened by the Cryptocracy through its agent Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of the U.S. Army during World II and no less influential under the administration of President Harry Truman. In 1946, by misdirecting Chiang Kai-shek's pro-western Nationalist forces, Marshall engineered the victory of Mao Tse Tung's mass murdering army: "Marshall was to perform a monumental service to Mao. When Mao had his back to the wall...in late spring 1946, Marshall put heavy— and decisive— pressure on Chiang to stop pursuing the Communists into northern Manchuria, saying the U.S. wouldn't help if he pushed further...Marshall's diktat was probably the single most important decision affecting the outcome of the civil war." (Jung Chang, Mao: The Unknown Story [Random House, 2005], p. 289). The Cryptocracy moved again to protect Mao's tyranny when its asset Truman deliberately failed to prosecute and win the Korean War—rejecting General Douglas MacArthur's request for permission to attack Communist supply bases in China, north of the Yalu River. In 1951, Truman relieved MacArthur of his command. The hold of Mao's closest ally, the Communist Kim dynasty, over North Korea was thereby cemented.

Commander-in-Chief could be murdered with impunity in Dallas, then all future presidents, out of fear of the same fate befalling them, would take their orders from the intelligence services. Who can gainsay this observation?

Distinctions about the Right wing should be easier to make in our time when Neocon "Rightists" engineer the Afghan and Iraq wars and support a domestic police state, while the populist, "Paleo-Right" seeks to restore our Constitutional Republic and reject overseas empire.

Labeling without qualification the CIA and the forces arrayed against John F. Kennedy as "Right wing," is an erroneous generalization which contributes to further confusion concerning who killed our president. A sloppy researcher could go so far as to deduce that Ferrie and Shaw were KKK operatives because they shared a private flight to Canada with Jules Kimble, a Klan member. But in truth Kimble was an FBI informant who had infiltrated the racist organization.[76]

Right/Left labels are largely meaningless in this context. The shape-shifting Cryptocracy appears as a Leftist phantom to Right wingers and a Right wing bogey to Leftists. A similar charade functioned smoothly for Lyndon Johnson, who ran as a liberal peace candidate in the 1964 presidential election against Senator Barry Goldwater and who, after defeating Goldwater, emerged as a Right wing interventionist who would commit 500,000 U.S. troops to a Southeast Asian civil war. Johnson was clearly Left wing with regard to domestic policy, such as the Civil Rights movement and his "Great Society," with its socialist programs.

If he really had been an anti-communist ideologue however, rather than an accomplice of the military-industrial complex and the Israeli lobby, during the Vietnam conflict he would have fought Maoist China and North Vietnam the way the U.S. had fought Nazi Germany, which would have resulted in the end of the regimes of Mao and Ho Chi Minh. The Cryptocracy had no such objective in place. Nor do we advocate that Johnson should have pursued such an objective, in that the war in Vietnam from the outset was a needless, Cryptocracy-initiated alchemical cauldron which processed the American people through a stage of degenerative psychological transformation. Making war on a North Vietnamese nation that was an enemy of Communist China was a catastrophe. Invasions of sovereign nations whether by Bush or Johnson inevitably motivate even a potentially friendly or neutral population into fierce patriotic opposition to the invaders.

In addition to Oswald's sojourn in the Soviet Union, his alleged attack on Edwin Walker, a prominent Right-wing activist, decorated combat veteran and retired U.S. Army Major General, is the other supposed evidence which is put forth to finger him as a committed Leftist extremist.

Suspicious anomalies are present in this Cryptocracy-scripted Walker sideshow, however. The Warren Commission accused Oswald of having attempted, on April 10, 1963, the assassination of General Walker, at Walker's Texas home, as a prelude to the violence Oswald would supposedly perpetrate on November 22.

As Gerald McKnight demonstrates in his book, Breach of Trust, the Dallas police referred to the bullet fired into Walker's house as a steel-jacketed 30.06, as indicated in a report filed by Dallas Police Department officers Van Cleave and McElroy.

DiEugenio: "In less than three weeks after the assassination (of JFK), the FBI changed the bullet (fired at Walker) to a 6.5 caliber, copper-jacketed bullet; which meant that they could link this projectile to Oswald. And, in fact, the bullet today in the National Archives, allegedly tied to the Walker case, is copper coated. Yet none of the Dallas police officers who handled the slug were called to testify before the Warren Commission."

In a March 27, 1964 memorandum to the FBI, forensic investigator Henry Heiberger tested the lead alloy of the bullet recovered from the attempted shooting of General Walker. Heiberger testified that it was different from the lead alloy of a bullet fragment from the auomobile in which Kennedy was shot. The Warren Commission did not call Heiberger to testify.

An eyewitness to the shooting at General Walker's home, Kirk Coleman, identified two assailants, neither of whom resembled Oswald.

Bugliosi claims that Oswald confessed to shooting at the Walker house and that nothing further is required to substantiate the charge. His alleged source for this supposed confession was Oswald's widow, Marina.

CE 399: The Magic Bullet

Which brings us to Warren Commission Exhibit ("CE") 399: "Commission Exhibit 399...the infamous Magic Bullet — the projectile that the Warren Commission says went through two people, President Kennedy and Governor John Connally, making seven wounds and smashing two bones, yet emerging from this travail in almost pristine condition...

"O.P. Wright, who was head of Parkland Hospital Security, was shown a photograph of Commission Exhibit 399 by investigative reporter Josiah Thompson. 'President Kennedy was rushed to Parkland Hospital for emergency treatment after he was shot, and that is where CE 399 was (allegedly) discovered.' The photo 'depicting a copper coated, round nosed, military jacketed bullet' was not the one Wright 'turned over to the Secret Service. He said he had turned over a lead colored, sharp-pointed hunting round...Thompson wrote that if this was true, it indicated that either the FBI or the Secret Service had switched the bullet and therefore the assassination was, at least in part, an 'inside job.'

"It is clear from his footnotes that Bugliosi knows about the...Thompson interview because he read Thompson's 1967 book Six Seconds in Dallas, but he left this particular interview out of his book...in any real crime scene investigation, Dealey Plaza would have been immediately cordoned off and then details of Dallas Police offiers, supplemented by FBI technology, would have been channeled into the entire area. There would have been a foot-by-foot systematic check for shells, bullets, weapons and anything else lying around from the shooting. That did not happen...

"One of the more interesting discoveries of the ARRB, was an FBI evidence envelope from Dallas. As Michael Griffith points out, although the envelope was empty, the cover indicated it had contained a 7.65 mm rifle shell found in Dealey Plaza after the shooting. The envelope was dated December 2, 1963, so the shell was found sometime between November 22 and December 2, 1963. This important piece of evidence was hidden for three decades..." [77]

[77] DiEugenio, op.cit. "Once it closed shop, the Assassinations Records Review Board (ARRB) declassified about 2 million pages of records...there are still scores of records that were not declassified or located by the ARRB." The CIA alone is still concealing some 1,500 documents in defiance of the 1992 JFK Records Act.

Legacy

In the name of national security, in the 21st century the policies of the Federal government are manipulated by CIA and Mossad acts of terror made to appear as though they emanate from Iran or Hezbollah. On Russia's border the CIA formed the now discredited "Orange Freedom Movement" intended to unite Ukraine with NATO against the Russians. After 9/11 the Patriot Act extended the nascent police state into "Homeland Security." Under the George W. Bush administration, claims were put forth of the president's worldwide authority to "render" (kidnap) any person on earth, even a U.S. citizen, and hold them in military custody for months or years without trial.

In December 2011, President Obama signed the 2012 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), codifying indefinite military detention without trial into law for the first time in American history. The NDAA's detention provisions authorize the president — and all future presidents — to order the military to seize and indefinitely imprison people, including American citizens, apprehended anywhere in the world, far from any battlefield.

In the name of "national security" the government engages in assassinations at an extraordinary rate, both through drone technology as well as more traditional methods. If any foreign power were to kill a former CIA director, or the former Chief of Intelligence for the FBI, those assassinations would be considered terrorism and the American people would be persuaded to pay billions if necessary, to pursue the assassins anywhere in the world.

In point of fact, recent evidence indicates that the erstwhile CIA director William Colby was assassinated by the U.S. government in Maryland, and FBI Chief of Intelligence William C. Sullivan was shot to death by government agents when he was "mistaken for a deer" while standing on the porch of his home.

Since 1963, assassination chic has creeped into American culture. The Wall Street Journal has advocated the assassination of Bashir Assad in Syria and his family. In Georgia, Andrew Adler, publisher of the Atlanta Jewish Times, in the newspaper's January 13, 2012 edition, allegedly advocated the Mossad assassination of President Obama.

On March 6, 2013 Republican Rand Paul filibustered on the floor of the Senate against the confirmation of John O. Brennan as CIA director, and the prospect of government assassinations of American citizens on American soil. In news reports from the Orwellian corporate media, the word assassination is seldom employed in connection with U.S. government operations. The preferred cosmetic euphemisms spoon-fed to the infantilized public are "drone strikes, targeted killings" and "lethal military force." God forbid reporters or officials would utter the words "U.S. government assassinations."

Elie Hobeika, a Lebanese former collaborator with Israeli forces and a key witness in the Sabra-Chatila war crimes case being prosecuted in 2002 in a Belgian court against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, was blown up outside his home in Beirut on January 24, 2002, together with three bodyguards and a civilian bystander. The car-bomb was the work of professional assassins in the employ of Mossad, the Israeli secret service. The bombing occurred two days after Hobeika agreed to give evidence against Sharon in Belgium. Hobeika had met with Belgian Senators Josy Dubie and Vincent van Quickenborne in east Beirut, agreeing to be a witness at any trial of Sharon for the Sabra and Chatila massacre.

Belgian human rights lawyers seeking to indict Sharon expressed their "profound shock" at Hobeika's murder. "Mr Hobeika had several times expressed his wish to assist the Belgian inquiry on the massacres at Sabra and Chatila," the lawyers said. "His determination to do so was reported widely on the eve of his assassination. The elimination of the key protagonist who offered to assist with the inquiry is an obvious attempt to undermine our case."

Marwan Hamadeh, the Lebanese minister for refugees stated, "My initial evaluation is that of course Israel doesn't want witnesses against it in this historic case in Belgium..."

In 1963 and 1973 Americans would have been nauseated and angered by Israeli assassinations. Decades after Kennedy's murder and many Americans believe that such gangland rub-outs are justified.

Since 2007, seven Iranian scientists have been assassinated and in some cases their family members killed or wounded, in terrorist acts perpetrated by hit teams sponsored by the U.S. and the Israelis.

Beginning in 2005, certain assassins covertly dispatched to Iran were trained at the Department of Energy's Nevada National Security Site by the U.S. government's Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC).[78]

Murders committed by the U.S. government are vindicated by threadbare logic from Wonderland, namely that terrorist acts such as assassinations are appropriate against whomever we deem to be terrorists. (No doubt JFK and his brother were "terrorizing" the military-industrial complex and the Mafia). Many decades after King-Kill/33 and many more Americans now believe in the morality of the government assassinating "bad guys."

Of course, once you open Pandora's box and engage in extra-judicial executions by U.S. "special forces," and "our Israeli allies" in the Middle East, then the genie is out of the bottle and the principle that "bad people can and should be assassinated," is spread throughout the land, which begs the question, who in the government defines a "bad" person and by what criteria?

Was Dorothy Kilgallen a bad person? What of Bill Hunter of the Long Beach Press-Telegram? He interviewed Jack Ruby's roommate and was subsequently shot to death "by accident" by a cop who claimed he had been practicing his fast draw when his handgun discharged in the direction of Mr. Hunter.

On May 22, 2013, Ibragim Todashev was very likely murdered by the FBI, probably to keep him from testifying to his belief that the accused Boston Marathon bombers, the Tsarnaev brothers, had been, in his words, "set up."

The FBI has radically altered its original story of how and why Todashev died, and the inconsistencies and anomalies are so preposterous as to merit an independent congressional investigation, and sleuthing from multiple newspaper, magazine, and television outlets. Most Americans don't seem particularly troubled by this execution by the Federal government of a witness in a terrorism case.

The presumption of the guilt of the Tsarnaevs is the proper belief. The authorities and the media have insinuated this belief, and Americans believe properly.

Welcome to the Brave New World initiated in Dealey Plaza, in the darkness just past noon, of November 22, 1963.

Bobby Kennedy and Thane Eugene Cesar

Statement of Robert F. Kennedy Jr.

"September 11, 2019 – Thane Eugene Cesar died today in the Philippines. Compelling evidence suggests that Cesar murdered my father.

"On June 5, 1968, Cesar, an employee in a classified section of Lockheed's Burbank facility, was moonlighting as a security guard at the Ambassador Hotel. He had landed the job about one week earlier. Cesar waited in the pantry as my father spoke in the ballroom, then grabbed my father by the elbow and guided him toward Sirhan. With 77 people in the pantry, every eyewitness said Sirhan was always in front on my father at a 3 - 6 feet distance. Sirhan fired two shots toward my father before he was tackled. From under the dog pile, Sirhan emptied his 8 chamber revolver firing 6 more shots in the opposite direction, 5 of them striking bystanders and one going wild .

"By his own account, Cesar was directly behind my Dad holding his right elbow, with his own gun drawn when my dad fell backwards on top of him.

"Cesar repeatedly changed his story about exactly when he drew his weapon. According to the coroner, Dr. Thomas Noguchi, all 4 shots that struck my father were "contact" shots fired from behind my Dad, with the barrel touching or nearly touching his body. As my father fell, he reached back and tore off Cesar's clip-on tie.

"Cesar sold his .22 to a co-worker weeks after the assassination, warning him that it had been used in a crime. Cesar lied to police claiming that he'd disposed of the gun months before the assassination.

"Cesar was a bigot who hated the Kennedys for their advocacy of civil rights for blacks. I had plans to meet Thane

Eugene Cesar in the Philippines last June until he demanded a payment of $25,000 through his agent, Dan Moldea.

"Ironically, Moldea penned a meticulous and compelling indictment of Cesar in a 1995 book and then suddenly exculpated him by fiat in a bizarre and nonsensical final chapter.

"Police have never seriously investigated Cesar's role in my father's killing."

End quote from RFK, Jr.

When interviewed, Cesar stated that he had indeed pulled a handgun at the scene of the shooting, but insisted the pistol was a Rohm 38 caliber, not a .22. The bullets which killed John F. Kennedy's brother came from a .22 caliber gun. Cesar also claimed that after the first shot he was knocked down and was unable to fire his weapon.

The Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD), which interviewed Cesar shortly after the shooting, did not regard him as a suspect and did not ask to see his gun.

Cesar stated that he did own a .22 caliber Harrington & Richardson pistol. He showed it to LAPD sergeant P. E. O'Steen on June 24, 1968. This gun was not confiscated and no ballistic tests were conducted on it.

When LAPD officers interviewed Cesar in 1971, he claimed that he had sold the gun before the assassination to an individual named Jim Yoder. In October 1972, William W. Turner located Yoder. Mr. Yoder had saved the receipt for the sale of the H&R pistol, which was dated September 6, 1968, and bore Thane Cesar's signature, indicating that Cesar had sold the pistol three months after Robert F. Kennedy's assassination, contradicting his 1971 claim that he had sold the weapon months before Bobby's murder.

The 9/11 Terror Attacks as Alchemical Ritual

"Let us never tolerate outrageous conspiracy theories..."
—President George W. Bush
Speech to the United Nations • November 10, 2001

Tim Russert: "You (and John Kerry) were both in Skull and Bones, the secret society."

George W. Bush: "It's so secret we can't talk about it."
—Meet the Press, February 8, 2004

"Our enemies are innovative and resourceful, and so are we. They never stop thinking about new ways to harm our country and our people, and neither do we."
—George W. Bush
Defense Appropriations speech • August 5, 2004

Those who aspire to teach can determine the effectiveness of their instruction by determining whether or not anyone has come along to extend or elaborate on what was taught. In the case of our book Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare, finally completed in mid-2001, we were gratified to see that the author of the 2013 volume, The Most Dangerous Book in the World: 911 as Mass Ritual, S.K. Bain, a former staff member of Oxford American magazine and the Weekly Standard newspaper had in many respects, built upon our own work.

We don't share all of the premises of Mr. Bain's metaphysical teleology, but we're heartened that he was inspired by some of our ideas on civic magic and the reality that current events can, on many occasions, be more than politics, statistics, armies and navies, budgets and lobbying — that "something more" being esoteric messages embedded in ritual crimes that "speak" to our subconscious as a form of human alchemical processing.

When we say "he took," we note that he did so by crediting us by name and mentioning our own book by its title. Our work has been used by others, not just by Mr. Bain, but almost always as an act of covert plagiarism, and plagiarists, particularly on the Internet, do not give credit — they take it — and the hell of that act of intellectual theft is it denies researchers the opportunity to examine the source and follow-up on the originator of the information. Moreover, many plagiarists do not comprehend the concepts they are "borrowing." Consequently, they sow confusion, which is an act friendly to the Cryptocracy. As Bain writes, "Many...of the components of the 9/11 script were designed to confuse, to distract, to mesmerize..and suck investigators and conspiracy theorists alike down a bottomless rabbit hole of misinformation...We are bombarded with such volumes of conflicting information that our ability to meaningfully process it is overwhelmed...we give up trying to figure it out...we shut down..."

Bain's The Most Dangerous Book in the World: 911 as Mass Ritual introduces the reader to psychological warfare as it "incorporate(s) a wide variety of occult symbols." He proposes that the 9/11 terror attacks were not only an inside job and a black op, they were "...an ultra-powerful mind control...weapon —a psychological warfare tool of enormous proportions—infused with techno-sorcery and deep-level occult programming."

It's one thing to pronounce so ambitiously on so startling a proposition (sorcery, no less), it is quite another to deliver the goods. For the most part, Mr. Bain backs up his assertions with considerable evidence, marshaled step by step as an act of disenchantment, the signal characteristic of Mr. Downard's gestalt, in a society where the pursuit of self-deception in the form of fairy tale enchantment is threaded throughout our culture's literature, cinema and advertising, resulting in widespread acceptance of virtual and consensus "reality."

If Americans possessed the intuition of early medieval people, most would laugh to scorn the corporate media's official 9/11 tale. What might be the intuition of an early medieval human? First, it would be likely to be close observation and contemplation, which is increasingly abandoned in an Internet Age that offers a deluge of information and misinformation, along with entertainment, amusement, erotica and every other distraction. The aperture is opened so wide it takes a sage to filter it to a manageable point.

When we were with the Amish, we stayed with Ben S. at his home in a settlement in the foothills of New York's Adirondack mountains. After Ben fed and bedded down his cattle and horses, he had the leisure to go out on clear nights to pursue his entertainment: studying the evening sky, the venerable hobby of countless shepherds, hunters and other truly human beings. As Ben pointed out various constellations and planets to us one evening, we noted that he also had committed to memory the orbits of many satellites, and even the space station itself, with no assistance from "apps" or computers. He was a keen observer and his observations were not mediated by an "expert" who told him what he was or was not seeing. Whereas, in modern society, almost everything we see, or think we see, is mediated by an authority of some kind. The Emperor has no clothes? The experts say he does. 9/11 was a conspiracy? The "experts" at Popular Mechanics say it was not.

Having over the years watched a half-dozen or so films of controlled demolitions of buildings prior to the morning of September 11, 2001, we recognized the collapse of the Twin Towers as being the same kind of direct drop to the ground that we observed in the case of buildings that were razed by the strategic placement of demolition explosives. We didn't need to ask the high priests at Popular Mechanics to approve our observation.

As previously noted in this writing, during the Half-Time Show at the National Football League's 2012 "Super Bowl XLVI," pop singer "Madonna," surrounded by Egyptian-Pharaonic props, acted the part of an occult goddess in a ceremony broadcast to hundreds of millions of people. Most Americans didn't see an occult personage. Was an occult ritual being televised, or not? Do we need to ask the "experts"? What does the Revelation of the Method tell us? What do facts as plain as those satellites and space stations that flew across Amish Ben's night sky, reveal to a person whose thoughts are not controlled to any significant degree by the thoughts of others?

Mr. Bain informs us that none other than the co-chairmen of the 9/11 Commission itself, Thomas H. Kean and Lee H. Hamilton, in their 2006 book, Without Precedent, charged that the 9/11 Commission was "set up to fail." John Farmer Jr., the Commission's senior counsel, stated that the Air Force decided not to tell the truth about 9/11 and that, "The (NORAD) tapes told a radically different story from what had been told to us (the Commission) and the public." Kean agreed that what NORAD told the Commission, "was just so far from the truth." (NORAD, America's air defense command, somehow could not put a single interceptor fighter-jet in the air over Manhattan during the seventeen minutes the Twin Towers were under attack). [1]

Bain informs us that FBI agent Robert Wright, who worked out of the FBI's Chicago office assigned to tracking Osama bin Laden's financing, gave a speech to the National Press Club in which he stated, "The FBI allowed 9/11 to happen. FBI management intentionally and repeatedly thwarted and obstructed my investigations..."

From Bain we also learn that Andreas von Bülow, a member of Germany's Schalck-Golodkowski investigation committee which tracks financial crimes, "...estimated that insider profits surrounding 9/11 totaled approximately $15 billion."

We see in 9/11 a coverup as flagrant as the daylight assassination on 11/63 at "Bloody Elm Street" of a president whose Secret Service and other forms of protection had been to a certain significant extent, withdrawn.

The contradiction between what our mind and spirit tell us is true and what the legion of professional liars, official spin doctors and prestigious disinformation specialists impose upon us, becomes fertile ground for our processing. When some of us doubt the veracity of the Establishment-propagated official facts about the September 11 terror, we are repeatedly apprised by the "authorities" that only a goofball "truther" kook, or a mentally imbalanced individual, would be skeptical.

A psychic tension arises in the discrepancy between our perception and the force by which the authorized tale is foisted, and we either become a witness against the System which perpetrated the falsehood or we live with the tension. To relieve the stress we are prodded into shoulder-shrugging conformity and therefore made complicit in the spectacular crime—partnered with the criminals by the fact of our indifference to what they perpetrated. Our humanity is radically diminished in the course of this process.

[1] "At least six air traffic controllers who dealt with two of the hijacked airliners on September 11, 2001, made a tape recording a few hours later describing the events, but the tape was destroyed by a supervisor without anyone making a transcript...The recording included statements of five or ten minutes each by controllers who had spoken by radio to people on the planes or who had tracked the aircraft...A quality-assurance manager...destroyed the tape several months after it was made, crushing the cassette in his hand, cutting the tape into little pieces and dropping them into different trash cans...Although the matter had been referred to the Justice Department...prosecutors said they had found no basis for criminal charges." Cf. "Tape of Air Traffic Controllers Made on 9/11 Was Destroyed," New York Times, May 7, 2004, p. A29.

Black Jack 21 alchemy is achieved partly through the ceremonial manipulation of hypnotic cues and subconscious archetypes and symbols, comprising the Twilight Language which communicates with our subconscious mind and lately, our waking mind. The American people are far gone in the depths of this processing. Psychologically, they have the status of defeated and demoralized prisoners of war. They have cut a deal with the System: they won't contradict the Cryptocracy's flimflammery, in return for the Cryptocracy allowing them to "get on with their lives," pursue a career, marry a trophy wife, raise and educate one or two children, root for the stadium sports team of their choice, acquire a boat, an RV and a second home. In the course of this quid pro quo, they pretend they are concerned about the state of the nation and their children's future, while their souls are dissolved in the face of the lie they are living. It bears repeating: Americans have been marching in the direction the Cryptocracy has been taking us since the Creation and Destruction of Primordial Matter at the Trinity Sight in 1945, the immolation of the King of Camelot near the 33rd degree line in 1963, and the alchemical union of the sun and the moon with the Apollo 1969 moon mission. The 9/11 attacks of 2001 represent the fourth stop on this masonic Jornada del muerto. S.K. Bain picks up the trail:

"The Pet Goat"

"The Goat of Mendes, or Baphomet, is a goat-headed deity, being formed of both male and female principles, with Mercury's Caduceus for its phallus. One arm points up and one down, with the Latin 'Solve et Coagula'...("breakdown and reform"—Hoffman)..."This is...a symbol of the ancient alchemists...(Satanist Aleister) Crowley asserted that Baphomet was a divine androgyne and the 'hieroglyph of arcane perfection..."

Bain ushers us into a scene on the morning of September 11, 2001 when George W. Bush, the 43rd President of the United States, was visiting Sarasota, Florida, listening to a group of children reciting the juvenile tale, The Pet Goat, when his Chief of Staff, Andrew Card, announced that the Twin Towers had been struck by a second airliner. Mr. Bush continued to sit and listen to the children's Pet Goat story for several minutes as the Twin Towers burned.

From Alice in Wonderland to the 1939 classic movie, "The Wizard of Oz," juvenilia is sometimes a vehicle for conveying adult messages. Mr. Downard claimed that in the Kennedy King-Kill/33, Jack Ruby represented "the powerhouse of Oz." In Hebrew Oz denotes strength. In "The Wizard of Oz," the most potent magic resided in the ruby slippers.

According to Albert Mackey in volume two of The History of Freemasonry (New York, 1906, pages 363-364), Pythagoras is a formative character in the mythology of the Freemasons. In The Wizard of Oz the Scarecrow recites for the wizard a garbled version of Pythagoras' Theorem.

When in Kansas, the Oz protagonist Dorothy runs away from the family farm and encounters the campsite of "Professor Marvel." The itinerant showman fools her into thinking he discerns her predicament with the assistance of his crystal ball, which he informs Dorothy is, "...the same genuine, magic, authentic crystal used by the Priests of Isis..."

Diabolist Aleister Crowley's Book of the Goat was titled, Liber Oz.

Mr. Bain writes that while it's ostensibly a children's story about a girl and her ruminant playmate, "The Pet Goat was in reality a strategically employed device used to introduce this key occult element into the 9/11 MegaRitual...this children's story is an allegory of the Luciferian Doctrine: The Father is an overbearing hyper-authoritarian...The goat's aggressive behavior and destructive tendencies at first appear problematic...but in the end render the goat uniquely qualified to serve as savior..and the goat—whose initial poor behavior is, in broader context, relatively benign—saves the day. Praise the Goat.

"...In the class's reading of The Pet Goat, the Direct Instruction method was utilized. The teacher pounded out the syllables with a pen on her book and read in unison with the children, the overall effect being not unlike the ritualistic chanting of a religious ceremony.

"You...need to see the YouTube video to get the full effect)...there sits Bush as the Satanic High Priest...listening to little black children...chant out a humorous story about a pet goat—which is actually a thinly veiled simplification of the Luciferian Doctrine—while people burn to death in the North Tower and UA175 slams into the South Tower in New York City. Crowley's Liber 175, 'the book of Uniting to a particular Deity by devotion,' outlines precisely what the perpetrators are seeking to accomplish at that exact moment through their sadistic, homicidal ritualistic acts — unite themselves with Satan.

"And although the locations for these two events are separated by hundreds of miles, the two acts are bound together in an ingenious and sophisticated manner by a cohesive ritual unity.

"There is yet another...disturbing aspect to the selection of Sarasota as backdrop to the Bush-Baphomet Black Mass...Of the hundreds of flight schools in the United States, Mohamed Atta, the (alleged) ringleader of the 9/11 terrorists and the (supposed) hijacker-pilot of the first plane to hit target on the morning of September 11, 2001, attended a school located in the very city President Bush was visiting that same fateful morning, where he was presiding over the...Goat Ritual...This is neither coincidence nor synchronicity, it is yet another example of the twisted humor and sophisticated logistics employed..." (end quote).

This occult "twisted humor" in Sarasota is exacerbated by the fact that in 2001 (and for years prior), Ringling Brothers Barnum and Bailey circus hosted a clown college at its Sarasota headquarters. In legend Barnum is made to say, "There is a sucker born every minute."

The idea that George W. Bush was tied into occult goat-craft is a hypothesis we are free to accept or reject. As noted however, occult rituals are above all psychodrama—pattern theatre—and they weave tales from myth and literature as a way of programming us.

Baphomet, the hermaphroditic goat, is a sigil of the alchemical transformation of humanity.

The goat tale that kept President George W. Bush so entranced that he would not interrupt it even to take command during a terror attack as chief of the nation's armed forces, is certainly an intriguing factor and may even be, as S.K. Bain claims, part of the "Mega-Ritual" that was 9/11.

From Levi's Transcendental Magic.

"Baphomet: The Goat of Mendes," a viral hieroglyph engraved by Éliphas Levi that became the representative symbol of the western occult, revisioning Michael Maier's "Emblem 33" Rosicrucian image of alchemical transmutation. [2]

[2] From Levi's Dogme et rituel de la haute magie (1855). "Levi was born Alphonse-Louis Constant in 1810...Levi's enormous impact on esotericism throughout the Western world is indisputable, and influential later authors like H. P. Blavatsky and Aleister Crowley are heavily indebted to him...his books were instrumental in bringing about the occult revival of the mid and late nineteenth century." (Per Faxneld, Satanic Feminism: Lucifer as the Liberator of Woman in Nineteenth-Century Culture [Oxford Univ., 2017], p. 131). It pains us to state that Levi was a "traditional Catholic" whose occultism was shielded against all interference and any charges of demonism or heresy by every church authority we located in the annals of the pontificate of Pope Pius IX. Madame Blavatsky complained that "Levi was yet too subservient to his Roman Catholic authorities." This did not deter her however, from continuing to defer to Levi for inspiration and direction. Levi led the attack on the Bible as the Word of God. Wizard of Oz author L. Frank Baum's mother-in-law, Matilda Joslyn Gage, referred to "Levi's laudable occult understanding of the Bible." Levi "was...a major source of inspiration for...(the) counter-reading of Genesis 3...the Devil...is given a most generous portrayal." (Ibid. pp. 134-136).

In the forehead of Baphomet, "the Goat of Mendes," we observe the five pointed star or pentagram, which is incorporated into the architecture of that other "magic powerhouse," the Pentagon, target of an alleged terror attack by a jetliner supposedly flown by a clown named Hani Hanjour, who would have had difficulty flying a teacup at Disneyland. Hanjour supposedly eluded all of the U.S. government's formidable radar and surveillance, including the E-4B "Venus77" government spy plane that was aloft over the Washington D.C. area on September 11 (cf. Mark H. Gaffney, The 9/11 Mystery Plane).

The very talented pilot of Flight 77 executed a remarkable 330-degree spiral turn clockwise to descend toward the Pentagon, after which Hani Hanjour completed his spectacular aerial feat by supposedly crashing the huge airliner into the 5-sided edifice, causing major damage to the west wing of the nerve center of the U.S. military.

When Mr. Bain refers to twisted humor we think of Sir Francis Dashwood's Hell Fire Club where sadistic occult "pranks" were played for the amusement and edification of the high society initiates, a custom which reflects the Satanic nose-thumbing which embodies the spirit of certain acts of ceremonial magic when conducted in broad daylight before millions of people, and which are contemptuously mounted as an insult to our God-given intelligence and reason; intended to be doubly insulting to Christians who are supposed to possess the gifts of the Holy Spirit after Pentecost, including the gift of discernment.

In our recorded lecture, Masquerader's Jest, we analyzed the satirical mocking conducted by George W. Bush in the role he played as "commander in comedy" at the Radio and Television Correspondents dinner on March 24, 2004, [3] in the wake of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, after it was revealed that there were no weapons of mass destruction ("WMD") in that Arab nation.

At the dinner, the president, as "commander in comedy," had the audacity to perform a contemptuous charade, clownishly pretending to search the White House for the weapons of mass destruction which had been his sworn alibi for the war against the sovereign nation of Iraq.

[3] As of 2021, a video of his malevolent clowning was online at c-span.org.

> [illegible] Hermes was the muse responsible for inspiring the rhetoric of salesmanship; he had a modest musical talent; and he was an adept of the daring and elaborate prank.[21]

This prank by a member of the Skull & Bones secret society, was a bold public mockery of the millions of Americans who had believed their president's story about WMD, as well as sneering at the U.S. troops who fought and died, along with the countless tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians who perished. [4]

His consummate Hell Fire Club jest, generally applauded by the media, put the finishing touches on Mr. Bush's post-9/11 masterpiece: the human sacrifice that was the Iraq war.

S.K. Bain is concerned with the psychology and epistemology behind the 9/11 rituals: "In the context of the occult script, all of the inconsistencies, suspicious facts and blatant lies make perfect sense — it was a huge, multi-faceted operation involving so many different working parts that the conspirators never expected to be able to cover it all up, or even cared about doing so. In many instances, they didn't even try, or, worse still, were so bold and arrogant that they mocked us to our faces by leaving clues in plain sight."

What does this arrogance tell us? What does the Cryptocracy thinks of us? These elitists always regarded the rest of us non-initiates, in any era, as being born somewhat less than human: "ghostly homunculi," e.g. "goyim, gentiles, kelipot, cowans." The "Cambridge (University) Apostles," who produced a slew of Soviet spies who defected to the Soviet Union, styled themselves the "realities," in contrast to the rest of humanity who they termed mere "phenomena."

Before the modern age, the Cryptocracy's low estimation of the American people was concealed, for the reason that virile, perspicacious, pre-modern yeomen had a tendency to rise against wicked tyrants when they were identified as such, and summarily pitchfork, club and hang them expeditiously. Even in the Victorian era, in the wake of the Trafalgar riots, British Freemasons perpetrated the "Jack the Ripper" butchery with the utmost secrecy. Now they are so contemptuous of us, so extremely confident of their invulnerability and immunity, "so bold and arrogant," that on 9/11 "they mocked us to our faces by leaving clues in plain sight."

[4] Bain informs us that at a previous, 2002 White House Correspondents' Association Dinner, President G.W. Bush invited Oz man "Ozzy" Osbourne, lead singer of "Black Sabbath," a "Heavy Metal" rock band. At this "fun-loving" event, Bush stated: "The thing about Ozzy is, he's made a lot of hit recordings— 'Party with the Animals, 'Bloody Sabbath,' Facing Hell,' 'Black Skies' and 'Bloodbath in Paradise'— Ozzy, Mom loves your stuff!" (End quote from Bush; cf. Bain, pp. 62-63). Bush neglected to mention Ozzy's other song, "Mr. Crowley," inspired by Aleister Crowley. The video game "Fallout 3" reproduces the lyrics to Ozzy's song in the lead into "You Gotta Shoot 'em in the Head." A "Mister Crowley" is a character in the game.

We contend that at some level of their collective psyche, the American people have an inkling that George W. Bush had a hand in the 9/11 terror attacks that killed 3,000 of their countrymen. But since The Power has signed off on this betrayal of "the phenomena" by "the reality," it has been decided that we "ghostly homunculi" are to haunt the stage of our masters' alchemical theatre, by "living the good life" of getting and spending, the glamor and glitter of fine clothing and travel; ogling the flesh that is peddled to sell soap and automobiles, and the pound of flesh that is extracted by the barons of banking. We have been programmed to drown our intuition of a soul-shriveling truth about our leader, by immersing our snouts in the amusements and distractions of the Renaissance-humanist Abbey of Thelema, where we are governed solely by our own free will, the only law being, Fais ce que tu voudras ("Do your own thing").

Twenty years ago in Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare it was necessary to explain this process of alchemical dissolving-and-rebuilding (solve et coagula), in detail and at length, to a startled audience in order for them to grasp it fully. At present, Americans are so far "down the (laboratory) tubes," that many will recognize the alchemical process without prompting, because they are living it.

In the Black Jack 21 era Americans exhibit the mental effects of the shock-and-awe doctrine, which is applied not only as military warfare, as in Iraq, but by domestic conspirators who wage psychological warfare as part of what anthropologist Joseph Campbell termed, "mysterium tremendum et fascinans" (a mystery before which man both "trembles and is fascinated").

Fascination is immobilizing. The fact that not a single one of the masterminds behind King-Kill/33, Oklahoma City '95, or 9/11, has ever spent so much as a day in jail for their monstrous, world-historic crimes, leads the masses to kneel in trembling and fascination before their prowess and potency.

We regret to say that Americans have become degenerate voyeurs who desire to be fascinated by more of these spectacular criminal prodigies, a supplication which will surely be fulfilled in the maelstrom that lies ahead, unless we change our ways by cooperating with the grace of God.

Misdirection of what energy there is, is the order of the day. The Golden Dawn initiate William Butler Yeats predicted a future in which "the best lack all conviction, while the worst are filled with passionate intensity." The unprecedented apathy we are witnessing serves as consent for the hell-on-earth that has been scripted and needlessly imposed upon us as "The Future," like it or not.

Many of us, even while on the golf course, at the shopping mall or the tailgate party, can glimpse, out of the corner of our eye, the harbinger of this end game. Edgar A. Poe drew its contours when he crafted a scene in which people become gradually aware of the presence of a horrifying reality that they had repeatedly denied and ignored—as the "Masque" finally dropped from the visage of "The Red Death": "...before the last echoes of the last chime had utterly sunk into silence, there were many individuals in the crowd who had found leisure to become aware of the presence of a masked figure which had arrested the attention of no single individual before. And the rumor of this new presence having spread itself whisperingly around, there arose at length from the whole company a buzz, or murmur, expressive of disapprobation and surprise — then, finally, of terror, of horror, and of disgust."

By then it was too late, as "...the throng of the revelers...gasped in unutterable horror..." at the reality of the monster that stood among them — a monster that had been present from the beginning of their revels. Poe states that the horror is so terrible it cannot be described or spoken of; it is "unutterable."

In line with Mr. Poe's dictum, this writer stands mute in the face of the extraordinary clockwork that has ticked out the inversion of good and evil, while contemporary Americans, like Esau of old, sell their birthright for a bowl of digital dung.

The "Literary Game" of the Rosicrucian Brotherhood

For the Alchemical Marriage of Magic and Science

Groundwork for a Transhuman Century 21:

S 3 Ex

The two-headed being possessing both male and female genitalia, depicted by Michael Maier in "Emblem 33" of his Atalanta Fugiens ("Atalanta Fleeing"; 1617). [5]

---

[5] In The Metamorphoses of Ovid, Atalanta and her male consort Hippomenes, are rivals in a contest. Hippomenes achieves the victory over Atalanta with assistance from Venus, who bestows upon him three golden apples.

Title of the illustration on the preceding page:

“Emblem 33. The Secrets of Nature. The Hermaphrodite, as though a dead person lying in the shadows, requires fire.”

The caption below the illustration reads:

“This two-headed being of double sex, funereal in aspect, gains this image when starved of dampness: hidden in the shadowy night, it craves fire. If you provide it with fire, it instantaneously revives. All the power of the stone is hidden in the fire, All the power of sulphur, [6]in gold; that of mercury in silver.”

In the Hermetic fugue, the transit of one thing into another is the motive principal that powers the world, as demonstrated in the texts and the illustrations of Atalanta Fugiens by Dr. Michael Maier. [7]

James Shelby Downward gave consideration to the likelihood that the container designated “Jumbo” at the nuclear Trinity Site housed a mannikin that was animated by the bomb’s atomic energy.

In the text accompanying “Emblem 29” of Maier’s alchemical treatise, we read: “Ut Salamandra vivit igne sic lapis.” (“Like the Salamander the Stone lives in the fire”).

The caption under emblem 29 states, “Degit in ardenti Salamndra patentior igne...Sic quoque non flammarum incendia saeva recusat, Qui fit asidduo natus in igne Lapis.”

(“The Salamander lives more vigorously in the heart of the fire...Like her, our Stone, born in everlasting fire, does not attempt to flee from the relentless flame”).

[6] Sulfur in this alchemical context is a code word for semen. Cf. Michael Maier, Atalanta Fugiens, emblem, 44: “Isis adest soror et conjunx ac mater Osiris, Cujus membra Typhon dissecat, illa ligat. Defluit at pudibunda mari pars, sparsa per undas, Sulphur enim, Sulphur quod generavit, abest” (“Isis, wife, sister and mother of Osiris, unites his sacred limbs torn apart by Typhon. But the phallus is lost out to sea by the waves, the sulphur which generated the sulphur is there no longer”).

[7] M.D., Basle University; born in 1569 in Kiel, Holstein, Germany; died in 1622 in Magdeburg. Maier was Count of Palatine and a member of the Rosicrucian Brotherhood.

Whether or not Mr. Downard's surmise was correct, in our Century 21 we are experiencing the public fulfillment of the age-old alchemical magnum opus in its full spectrum: the racial, [8] sexual, [9] agricultural [10] and transhuman assault on nature.

The Rosicrucian Brotherhood

Michael Maier's Rosicrucian alchemy synchronized with the furore generated by the European intelligentsia's frenzied fascination with the recently published "Rosicrucian Manifestos" (Fama Fraternitatis [1614], Confessio Fratenitasis and Consideratio brevis [1615]), which served to announce the debut of the Brotherhood on the public stage, together with an embarkation upon a perception of science as inextricably tied to alchemical objectives.

The Fama and the Confessio are believed to have been authored by Johann Valentin Andreae and his "Tübingen Circle," including Johann Arndt, Tobias Hess, and Abraham Hölzel, among others. [11]

[8] The dissolution of racial differences and the amalgamation of the distinct races into one is the focus of Maier's Emblem 43: "Audi loquacem vulturem, qui ne utiquam te decipit. Montis in excelso consistit vertice vultur Assidue clamans; Albus ego atque niger, Citrinus, rubeusque feror, nil mentior" ("Hearken unto the talking vulture, he will not deceive you in any way. Atop a lofty mountain a vulture calls without ceasing; It is said that I am White and I am black; I am also Yellow and red and I do not lie").

[9] In addition to the hermaphroditic aspect, there is also the unnatural use of semen, as limned by Maier, in "The Philosophical Child Who Knew Three Fathers" (Emblem 49): "...Phoebus, Vulcanus et Hermes in pellem bubulam semina quod suerint; Tresque Patres fuerint magni simul Orionis." ("Phoebus, Vulcan and Hermes placed into the hide of an ox, semen from each one of them, and the three at the same time became the father of great Orion").

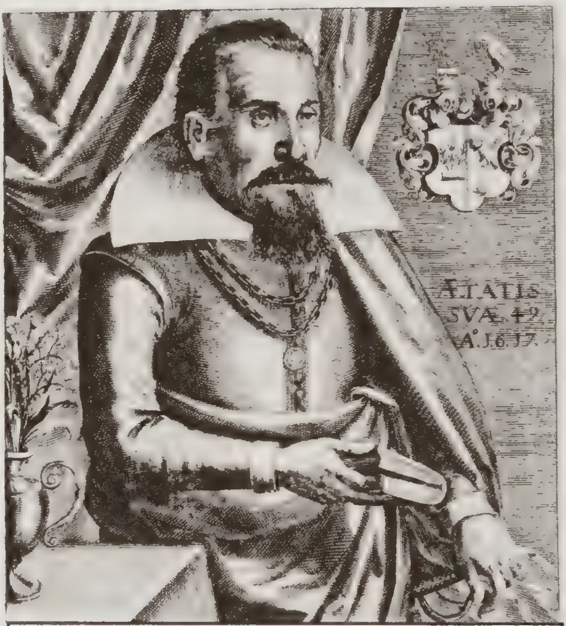
[10] Genetically modified (GMO) crops consist of plants that could not occur in nature. In combination with the application of artificial herbicides and pesticides, the fertility of the soil upon which human life depends, has been assaulted by these alchemies. Moreover, healthy soil nurtured through regenerative agriculture can hold more carbon dioxide than plants or the atmosphere combined. Naturally fertile soil can help to substantially remove carbon from our air. For a blueprint cf. the 2020 documentary film, "Kiss the Ground."

[11] Another foundational Rosicrucian text is *The Chemical Wedding of Christian Rosenkreuz (*1605), also by Johann Valentin Andreae and the "Knights of the Golden Stone." It has sometimes been alleged that Protestant founder Martin Luther had sympathy for the Rosicrucian occult because his escutcheon was a rose cross. This was a matter of the Rosicrucians hitching their wagon to a symbol that predated their occult fraternity by decades, similar to Adolf Hitler's appropriation of the swastika, a good luck charm that had been an ancient symbol of the sun in motion. Because Hitler made it synonymous with his Nazi movement, it would be folly to claim that Native American tribes or Hindus, or anyone who embraced swastikas prior to Hitler, were Nazis. It is equally fallacious to equate Luther's (or Dante's) rose symbols with the Rosicrucians.

"Both works were published by Wilhelm Wessel, the court printer of Kassel, with the explicit permission—perhaps even on the orders of the ruler, Landgraf Moritz of Hessen." [12]

These texts proclaimed the existence of the "Fraternity of the Rose Cross" and the dawn of a new age of "Magic, Alchemy and Cabala" (Kabbalah), working partly through the employment of Twilight Language, with a view toward the expansion of man's power over nature.

The Rosicrucian manifestos reflected Paracelsus' anticipation of the capacity of human brain power to take "command over the stars" and create "new forms of life," as the "Anima Mundi" (Spirit of the World) dictates (cf. the identification in 2 Corinthians 4: 3-4).



Rosicrucian alchemist and visionary Dr. Michael Maier, 1617

Here we see launched a major axis of the Cryptocracy, whose subsequent influence on our world is in some respects inestimable:

"Andreae's extraordinary concept, a 'literary game,' or 'Ludibrium' (as he would later call it), the creation of a secret society, combined with a very serious call for a radical new reformation that would incorporate science...That the sciences are thought of in Renaissance Hermetic-Cabalist terms as related to 'Magia' and 'Cabala', is natural for the period." [13] Frances Yates, The Rosicrucian Enlightenment (Oxford University, 2002), p. 67.

Roland Edighoffer: “The authors of the Confessio Fraternitatis agree with the astrologers that their epoch is entering into the sign of Mercury, who was assimilated by Michael Maier with Hermes. In his Choephoroi, Aeschylus has Electra define Hermes (‘Mercury’) as the mediator par excellence between gods and men, a function also ascribed to him by the alchemists and by Heinrich Khunrath...

“Thus it is normal for astrologers to regard Mercury as ‘the lord of the word,’ and for the Confessio Fraternitatis to proclaim the coming of ‘the age of the Tongue.’

“Jacob Boehme, in his Morgen-Röthe im Auff- gangk (“Rising Dawn,” 1612), wrote that in the man who is fulfilled, the planet Mercury gives rise to an inspired language…In the same way, the Confessio states that the time has come to speak…the Adamic language, i.e. the primordial idiom…which allowed Enoch to converse with angels. The Rosicrucians claim to already possess the knowledge of this language, but they make it plain that …(it) cannot be read and understood except by a minority.

“They proclaim ‘the age of the tongue,’ but they impose the law of silence on whoever rallies to them…secrecy is a fundamental element in the Confessio Fraternitatis, which mentions it at least ten times…certain realities...are held to be inaccessible without a long initiation… Hermes Trismegistus says to Asclepius: ‘It is an impious thing to divulge to the masses a teaching filled with the divine majesty’…the ‘true philosophy’ that the Confessio extols is Hermetist…” [14]

Frances Yates: “To the pseudonymous author ‘Philip a Gabella’ (Cabala) was attributed the Consideratio brevis, or ‘A Short Consideration of the More Secret Philosophy.’The historical Rosicrucian movement had its origins within the Hermetic, and specifically Paraclesian, tradition that was so pervasive in Renaissance Europe, from its beginnings in Italy initiated by Marsilio Ficino and Pico della Mirandola.

“However, the Rosicrucian movement of the early 17th century was particularly influenced by the English mathematician John Dee, as evidenced by the publication of

'Gabella's Consideratio brevis (a work based on Dee's Monas hieroglyphica) alongside the first edition of the Confessio...

"Rosicrucian in this purely historical sense represents a phase in the history of European culture which is intermediate between the Renaissance and the so-called scientific revolution of the 17th century. It is a phase in which the Renaissance Hermetic-Cabalist tradition has received the influx of another Hermetic tradition, that of alchemy. 'Rosicrucian manifestos' are an expression of this phase, representing, as they do, the combination of 'Magia, Cabala, and Alchymia' as the inference making for the new enlightenment." [15]

A clear premonition of the infernal marriage of scientism with "Magic, Alchemy and Cabala"—"the capacity of human brain power to take command" which was initiated by the occult imperium in its Rosicrucian manifestation—is afforded by the accelerating creation in our Century 21 along lines of Egyptian-type chimera of millennia ago (humanoid animals such as Anubis and Set), and the legendary Babylonian man-headed fish being Oannes, called Dagon in the Bible. [16]

In our "21" Age of Revelation, comparatively little dissembling is required to propagate public acceptance of laboratory-conceived monsters. Not only is the abomination acknowledged, but after a pro forma nod to anxiety about "unproven forms of intervention and the unintended consequences," these abominations are promoted as the fulfillment, in the words of Nathaniel Rich, [17] of the "lost reverence for the wonders of the natural world," citing conservationists such as Aldo Leopold.

In the Wall Street Journal of May 1, 2021, [18] Mr. Rich candidly explains the utopian blandishments entailed within the process by which acceptance of the Frankenstein horrors will be achieved: "Only after the public has warmed to the tools of synthetic biology and land regeneration, enticed by cruelty-free meat and flood-resilient coastlines and Covid immunity, will we be prepared to undertake uncomfortable conversations over hybrid species, bespoke fetuses..."

[18] The article is sub-titled, "Altered and cloned creatures invite us to confront a future in which technology manipulates nature as never before —to save it." This is tantamount to saying we will engage in sexual intercourse to "save" virginity.

Concerning this alchemy he writes: "In...recent scientific milestones you can make out the sharpening contours of our unnatural future...researchers in La Jolla, California, and Kunming, China, announced that they had successfully implanted human cells into macaque monkey embryos. The experiment suggested it would soon be possible to engineer a novel hybrid species: a human-monkey chimera.[19]

"...scientists have created transgenic species for decades. We've already seen 'humanized' pigs, cows and rats, and the first Covid vaccines available in the U.S. were initially tested on mice implanted with human genes.

"Scandal-averse scientists prefer to speak of these creatures as...'models," as in the language on the website of Jackson Labs in Bar Harbor, Maine: 'The latest model, the humanized NSG™-IL15, is now also available in limited quantities." [20]

"...The word 'monster' comes from Latin monere, 'to warn, remind,' a root shared by 'premonition.' The future now emerging is one of unabashed, targeted interference in natural processes, through the manipulation of genetic codes...

"The act of interference is not itself alarming—it's as old as civilization...What's novel today is the effort to use these tools to reverse some of the harm we've done....monsters serve a crucial function. They invite us to confront what's coming, to accept techniques for reshaping reality..." (end quote).

"...unabashed, targeted interference in natural processes..."

"The Tarot Card Killer"

The D.C. Sniper

A good deal of nonsense has been be penned about this case, and others like it, by writers who reach into a New Age grab-bag of dementia and disinformation. The CIA terms this distraction "noise" and the spooks are delighted to help propagate it. We term it "X-Files"-style muddying of the watergate that opened in the Age of Aquarius, wherein so many hypotheses and rumors were posited that the people imbibed the sense that everybody killed Kennedy; that everything causes cancer. In which case, how could JFK's killers be brought to justice if everyone is guilty? If everything causes cancer then it's futile to clean the environment. What's the point? Futility is born from the notion that we have no enemies among conspiracy theorists, only among the agents of the Cryptocracy. It hasn't occurred to some folks that a considerable portion of conspiracy theory may have been driven by the Cryptocracy itself, as cognitive infiltration.

In the D.C. Sniper theater of October 2002, there were reports of a suspicious white van with the letters, "Total Recall" printed on the vehicle, which was supposedly spotted at the scene of the sniper's "Exxon shooting." Since one of the goals of the Cryptocracy is the inculcation of apathy, amnesia and abulia in the target population, "Total Recall" would seem to be an antidote to the Cryptocracy's plan.

Let's endeavor to pursue this objective by totally recalling that we don't just see words, we hear them. Might it be that "serial" killer is heard as "cereal" killer (from Ceres the vegetative goddess of human sacrifice) in our collective mind?

We didn't coin the word "serial" killer for ritual murder, the U.S. government's FBI profilers did. Their "profile" is sometimes a script. A better name for some of them might be FBI scripters. They point the way out of amnesia into last-minute recall, ceremonially, like the sacrificial victim whose hands are bound and who is being led through an October cornfield. She is jolted into total recall when she sees the altar or pyramid, or wicker man of immolation, in the middle of the mow.

Another news report wanted us to know that the white "Total Recall" van was seen near the scene of the "Exxon sniping."

Can the script be interpreted to be received in the brain of percipients as: "X on Total Recall" i.e. cross out (cancel) Total Recall?

The advertising industry is a medium where the practical application of the Cryptocracy's mind control meets commerce. Advertising agencies are paid millions of dollars to conjure names such as Exxon because those ruthlessly pragmatic businessmen know that sub-rosa manipulation of the Group Mind pays large dividends in sales and profits. One of the most important branches of this epistemology is operated by the symbolic "Dr. Syntax," who features in masonic engravings depicting him giving a lecture at Freemason's Hall. What the masons called word magic, scientists today call neuro-linguistics. Advertisers term it "branding."

Some examples: the written word "serial" is transformed into the phonetic sound "cereal" in the synapses of the brain which link the raw sounds to new meanings not denoted in the textual rendering of the word. These raw sounds are known to the creators among advertising executives, as "phonemes."

The 21st century telecommunications corporation which goes under the brand name "Verizon" paid a large sum in order for that name to be conjured. In terms of textual denotation, Verizon means nothing. It's "just a name," like Lee Harvey Oswald was "just a lone nut." But the sound of that name inside one's head conjures a subtle sense of a rising sun, a new beginning, a "True Horizon." What is common knowledge in elite circles of American advertising, is the datum that to influence the masses with a brand name, one must pay attention to how letter combinations sound, because the advertising executives are cognizant that "In the beginning was the Word...faith cometh by hearing..." and the universe is sustained by sound.

In October, 2001 we witnessed a most highly charged image of the World Trade Center attacks—a burning tower spewing flames with people jumping to their deaths—in the form of the number 16 Tower card from the Rider-Waite Tarot deck.

In October, 2002 the Establishment massively publicized and reproduced another card from the Tarot deck, the number 13 Death card, in connection with the "D.C. Snipers."

Newsweek magazine featured this Tarot card on the front cover of its October 21, 2002 issue, and dubbed the mysterious sniper(s), “The Tarot Card Killer.”

All Hallows Eve was around the corner and the movie “Red Dragon,” featuring a fictional serial killer named Hannibal (i.e. Hani*baal) Lecter* (from the Latin root word for an ecclesiastic whose duty consists in reading “the lessons”), was being exhibited on the nation’s silver screens, as snipers’ bullets commenced the ceremony by which coercion and control are maintained.

The System’s media drew attention to the “FBI profilers” who were supposed to have been concentrating on the sniper’s “geography,” in other words the Downardian realm of Mystical Toponomy (Greek: topos [place] + onuma [name]), which was notably relevant in the JFK assassination and the Jack the Ripper murders. The Establishment dismisses toponomic connections in those cases, but touts them when employed by the FBI when supposedly on the trail of Washington D.C.’s snipers.

Some of the FBI’s behavioral psychologists (“profilers”) are sometimes the guiding light for ritual murderers and “serial” killers. Perhaps we should extend the FBI “the benefit of the doubt” and surmise that there are only a handful of these bad actors inside the bureau and they are “rogue FBI employees.”

However, it is a matter of the documentary record that the FBI’s HRT (“hostage rescue team”) committed the most infamous sniper murder in memory, FBI agent Lon Horiuchi’s shooting of Mrs. Vicky Weaver at Ruby Ridge, Idaho, as she cradled her infant daughter. [1]

And the FBI most certainly played a criminal role in the Unabom murders.

Did they shepherd the D.C. area sniper(s)? It does appear that the snipers were monitored by the government until Revelation of the Perp time "came 'round again" – on the 6 o'clock news.

One of the police road blocks shown on national television and allegedly maintained to apprehend the sniper(s), was manned by a purported police officer wearing a full face mask. The roadblock was close to the Exxon sniper kill site.

Why would a policeman in 2002 be masked? What Hell-Fire Club jest on the gentiles is conveyed when the cops dress like the robbers?

Assassination of Federal Agent

What was Linda Franklin, a Federal agent who CNN described as "an intelligence operations specialist for the FBI," doing at the Seven Corners shopping mall October 14, when the sniper(s) were stalking there? Just a coincidence?

FBI agent Franklin was subsequently assassinated and the media attributed her death to "the sniper."

Police officials said the sniper's alleged murder of the FBI intelligence operations specialist had no particular significance and was just a coincidence:

[1] Ambush at Ruby Ridge: How Government Agents Set Randy Weaver Up and Took His Family Down (1995), by Alan W. Bock, is, as of this writing, easily the best study of the Federal government's murder of Mrs. Vicki Weaver and her son. In an interview conducted by Alisha Haridasani Gupta of the New York Times (Jan. 8, 2021), Seyward Darby, author of the Times-endorsed volume Sisters of Hate, insinuated that Vicki Weaver was not an innocent non-combatant: "...when people think about Ruby Ridge, they don't even think of Vicki's name per se, they think, 'Oh, that situation where the government was dealing with the separatists and they shot and killed a woman.' That's what it gets boiled down to, and any normal person would hear that and think, 'Oh, wow, that's a really terrible thing.' But it obviously strips important context. As I understand it, from my research, Vicki Weaver wasn't a bystander." We don't know if Ms. Darby's statement signifies that Mrs. Weaver did something that caused her to deserve to be killed while holding her infant daughter inside her home. If she wasn't a bystander that might imply she was guilty of somehow being a participant in what appears to have been a one-sided encounter with an elite FBI sniper. What, pray tell, is the "context" that would render her murder anything other than a "really terrible thing"? The Times reporter made no request to view Darby's "research" and exhibited no curiosity about the reference to a "context."

"Charles Moose, the police chief of Montgomery County in neighboring Maryland, said Franklin, an FBI intelligence analyst, was not involved in the sniper investigation and was therefore considered yet another random victim." (Reuters, October 15, 2002). Another "random victim"—the explainers' default dismissal.

The spectre of Arab terrorism is introduced into the Idyll

How could the police chief know with confidence that this particular killing (of Linda Franklin) had been "random" when the possibility of Islamic terrorism had not been ruled out?

"Federal investigators refused Tuesday (October 15) to rule out the possibility that organized terrorist groups are behind the shootings that have left some residents apprehensive all around the nation's capitol. 'The communities are terrorized,' said the Homeland Security Director, Tom Ridge, who said federal investigators don't know whether the sniper might be a domestic or international terrorist...Asked whether there were links to al-Qaida or other foreign terrorists, Ridge said, 'I don't think we can foreclose that. Certainly, nobody in the FBI or the White House has foreclosed that." (Associated Press, October 15, 2002).

If the sniper case was a possible foreign terrorist operation —and the Homeland Security Director refused to preclude the possibility—then how could Police Chief Moose know for certain that the shooting of FBI official Linda Franklin was "random," rather than deliberate?

Spot the farce?

One clown sticks his head out from behind the curtain and shouts, "Random killing!"

Then another clown pokes his head out and speaks his line, "Might be a terrorist!"

The normal reaction of an audience would be to laugh. But there's nothing humorous about the death of Linda Franklin, except to mentally sick people who stage macabre civic comedies at the expense of murder victims.

Furthermore, how was it that the shooters had the guile, meticulous planning, control and prudence to elude massive police roadblocks and dragnets, allegedly travel day in and day out to the murder scenes in the same light-colored “Astro van” [2] with a defective tail light and a telltale silver ladder on the roof, as the media reported?

Of course, when the suspects’ actual vehicle was finally impounded it turned out to have not the faintest resemblance to a light-colored truck or van of any kind. Someone within the Establishment had consistently circulated false descriptions of the killers’ vehicle, providing them with excellent cover.

What happened to the October 11, 12 and 13 focus on a large white commercial truck with the words “Total Recall” on the side?

Those words emblazoned on the truck have faded from the official record and the two trucks, the tradesman's large white truck pictured in the Sunday New York Times of October 13, and the astral “Astro van,” back in the limelight as of October 14, appear and disappear from the list of suspect-connected vehicles, episodically, like a flashing signal.

At the very least, the invocation of the Tarot card in the sniper case indicates that the System wants us to think occult thoughts, perhaps along Hannibal/Red Dragon lines (as noted, the sniper shootings debuted close to the time when the latest Hannibal Lecter movie, “Red Dragon” debuted). It seems as though the Game Players sought to maintain the American Group Mind pressure cooker on “high.”

Arcane considerations of this nature were germane long before the era of FBI profilers and are hardly unique to the FBI’s “psy-war specialists.’ What is unique is that under the aegis of “FBI profiling,” occult elements heretofore dismissed by the Establishment as the phantasmagoria of “conspiracy kooks,” have lately been held aloft as both credible and relevant in elite police homicide “investigations,” bringing occult themes of sub-rosa processing and “Satanic” symbolism to stage center.

This process plays bipolar havoc with the mentalities of those who thought the Establishment wanted them not to believe that psychological warfare entails manipulating the archetypes of the public’s subconscious.

A year before the D.C. snipers’ October, 2002 reign of terror, in October of 2001, America was in the grip of an “Arab terrorist" anthrax scare that kept hundreds of thousands of children indoors on Halloween and made millions of Americans apprehensive about opening their mail.

[2] A celestial vehicle, since the root of the astro is from the Greek, ἄστρον, denoting a star in the sky.

Sniper Halloween 2002 fit the same pattern: "Too Spooked to Trick-or-Treat: This year the monster lurking in the shadows is real..." [3]

That's a headline of the "says it all" variety: monsters lurking in the shadows are real and it's understandable that they would "spook" us into suspending our activity.

Maryland's Enterprise newspaper published a front page story directing readers' attention to a pentagram pattern allegedly formed by the snipers' shooting locales.

The Enterprise article, sub-titled, "Last leg of pentagram could point to Michaels in St. Mary's," states:

"Among the theories considered in an ongoing hunt for a Washington D.C. area sniper is the possibility that he has targeted places near a chain of craft stores, in a star pattern...'It's just one theory of many,' St. Mary's sheriff's Captain John Horne cautioned...but he noted the pentagram created by the location of four Michaels stores in areas where many of the shootings have occurred...'When you add ours in, that completes (the five points of) the star,' Horne added... 'The pentagram star is a familiar part of Satanic cult activities, the sheriff's captain said." [4]

The public's attention and alertness to these themes are switched on and off. It's permissible to think along these occult-symbol lines if FBI profilers, sheriff's captains or Establishment newspapers are doing so in specifically circumscribed areas of concern. But to apply this heightened consciousness at all times to all areas of criminology and pathology without Establishment authorization, is strictly forbidden, and the "conspiracy nut" and "grassy knoll" labels will be cranked out on cue and applied to whoever dares violate the protocol.

Hence, for someone to take Captain Horne's statement about the pentagram being "a familiar part of Satanic cult activities" and apply it to the U.S. military's five-sided, star-shaped headquarters known as the Pentagon, would invite media derision, or even a one-way ticket to the funny farm. Much in law enforcement display a pentagram as their badge of identification and authority, and it's emblazoned on their patrol cars. In Russia the pentagram was daubed red to represent the bloody terror of Bolshevism. The red star pentagram was retired by Russia in the 1990s, but was resurrected as the nation's emblem by Vladimir Putin.

The D.C. Sniper/Tarot Card Killer caper also featured major broadcast media hosting various former detectives who had "investigated" the "Son of Sam" killings in 1976 and 1977. This was mockery. These "astute investigators" retailed a moldy pack of lies, including the preposterous claim that David Berkowitz was the "lone nut" responsible for all Son of Sam-connected fatalities. In fact, the Sam case, which we investigated and reported in Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare 2001, was the among the spectacular ritual murders the Cryptocracy mounted in the 1970s. The Son of Sam killers were part of a larger ceremonial series that included the Hillside Strangler in Los Angeles, Kenneth Bianchi, and the "alphabet" rape/murder of little girls in Rochester, New York that came to be known as "Double Initial." [5]

"Total Recall" Triggers "Puzzling Amnesia"

We have seen that the Feds issued repeated disinformation about a white van. As previously noted, they issued a report that the white van exhibited the words "Total Recall" and that this vehicle was spotted at the scene of "the Exxon shooting." "Total Recall" is the title of a film from a science fiction novel by Phillip K. Dick about a "zombie" programmed with hidden commands to execute a specific mission. The movie depicts a company named "Recall" implanting false memories.

In the wake of the "Total Recall" truck sighting, the police were said to possess only a "composite" picture of the truck and that "witnesses cannot agree on the writing that they saw on the white truck, nor can they come up with a license plate number." One correspondent referred to this as "puzzling amnesia."

[5] In May of 2021 Netflix cable television debuted a four-part documentary series, "The Sons of Sam." Part 2 shreds the official tale of Berkowtiz being the only shooter. At least three NYPD detectives are guilty of having participated in the cover-up. In Parts 3 and 4, a devil angle, which misled investigator Maury Terry, is emphasized. "Sam" was executive action by elite controllers operating behind a "Halloween" cover.

In the October 13 edition of the New York Times a photo of the suspect white truck was shown with the phrase "Unknown Words" printed on the side. The significance of words in connection with the sniper case was being emphasized by the Times, though the words themselves were evanescent, flashing on and off, leaving almost no trail (until the profilers decide to script a more tangible trail for us through their mouthpiece media).

FBI profilers market brand names to the public. "Unabom" was the name the FBI scripters gave to the purported environmental fanatics who bombed corporate polluters and academic computer gurus, and who eventually were said by the FBI to consist solely in the person of the lone nut Dr. Theodore Kaczynski. But why this odd spelling, Unabom? The FBI brand name "Unabom" is incomplete. The letter "b" has been dropped from the end of the word. This omission telegraphs to us the fact that something is being omitted; the matter is incomplete.

(It should be noted for the record that the phoneme mechanism is a neutral technology that cuts both ways. Someone on the Right came up with a phoneme in the 1980s alleging a "Zionist Occupation Government" which they abbreviated as "ZOG," invoking the sound and image of a monstrous idol and false god).

During the sniper shootings the emotional energy of the nation's Hive Mind was focused like a burning light in a mirror. Scott Thornsley, a "criminal justice scholar" said that the shooter "is planning how to increase the thrill level" (Associated Press, Oct. 15, 2002). The question is, whose "thrill level"—the snipers' handlers, or the masses, or both?

The spotlight was on, and the American people were paying strict attention to the urgent need for surveillance cameras and ubiquitous satellites, military assistance and intervention in domestic affairs, 400 assigned detectives, random traffic stops by police who harassed citizens in white vehicles. The mounting tension, fear, anxiety and expectation in connection with the sniper were palpable, commensurate with the simultaneous, melodramatic "Countdown to War with Iraq," which the media were presenting.

This was all building to a spasm of ecstatic release—the anticipated thrill of the imminent capture of the fiendish culprit(s) and the post-spasm euphoria of a mystery solved and the "case closed."

Those who have been programmed to kill on cue are often also programmed to self-destruct or self-incriminate on cue. In the aftermath of the most notorious masonic murder in American history, the assassination in New York of writer William Morgan in 1826, the investigators of that era remarked on the tendency of the "mesmerized" perpetrators to incriminate themselves or commit suicide. They dubbed the phenomenon "Masonic apoplexy."

The D.C. Sniper case is not a matter of good vs. evil. It is about cryonic, freeze-thaw Revelation of the Method amid the clamor of adrenaline-pumping thrills. It is a medieval mystery play for the Pepsi Generation, a sobering parable about the crying need for a benevolent Super-State, an army of cops and a digital All-seeing Eye to "keep us safe." After all, this is the 21st century! "Life is not so simple anymore."

During the sniper killings this writer was contacted by a Department of Defense official who has been known to us for some time, but this was the first time he was willing to speak this candidly:

"As you know from my other e-mail I work for the Defense Department...While I am a well compensated member of the military-industrial complex I have had growing concern over the years about the direction of our government and who is really controlling it. I wrote you recently about the D. C. Sniper asking you if you believed this killing spree was an occult black arts operation and this has initiated e-mail from you on the subject.

"...This would be the first time that very sophisticated U.S. Military intelligence assets would be used against a (supposed) U.S. citizen in violation of the Posse Comitatus Act of 1877. Thus we see the real reason for the D.C. Sniper — to get our military to conduct operations against U.S. citizens with the approval of those citizens...

"...I'm very concerned about the erosion of the Posse Comitatus division between police and military work in the U.S.. Military assets have been used in the past few years to digitally map with infrared sensors most of the major cities of the U.S. I've overheard a lieutenant general in Army intelligence speak of the fact that all 21st century wars will be urban wars since most people in the world will soon live in urban areas. This may explain the need for a war with Iraq. Our leaders want our military to have a Stalingrad or Berlin house-to-house battle in Baghdad in order to train them for coming events...(some of those events will be here in the U.S.)

"...It looks like Secretary Rumsfeld wants the people to know that the U.S. Military will 'save' them from the sniper so they will welcome military intrusion into their lives. As the French say, sometimes the poison and the antidote are concocted in the same laboratory."

The last time we witnessed a police dragnet comparable to the one in Maryland, was when neo-Nazi terrorist Buford Furrow—after shooting up a defenseless Judaic daycare center on cue—was being hunted by the LAPD. Like the sniper(s) in Maryland, he expertly eluded the formidable Los Angeles police and their intensive manhunt, tiptoed through the roadblocks and chopper spotter beams, traveling all the way to Las Vegas, where he promptly reported directly to personnel at the Las Vegas FBI headquarters. Talk about Revelation of the Method.

Some disinformation in the D.C. Sniper killings came from outside investigators—sloppy or intellectually dishonest researchers who proliferate in this field. For example, conclusions were floated at the point when the shooter(s) had allegedly killed nine and wounded 11 (9/11). Some Internet scribes fell for this rush-to-judgement pitfall by proclaiming a 9/11 sniper signature or message. One must be prudent and avoid forcing data to fit one's own personal prejudices or pet theories. Wishful thinking is a trap for investigators.

The Feds play pranks on independent investigators and the public and we would characterize at least some of the reports about this case which appeared on October 21 and 22, 2002, as telephone pranks and deliberate misdirection, such as what a stage magician uses. For example: "the white van parked at the pay phone with two dark-skinned, Hispanic suspects." It was said these two were definitely not involved. Yet, the pay phone where their van had been parked had, according to the media, been used "by the sniper(s)" to make a call to the police.

Moreover, it is the police who routinely confirmed that all the shooting victims were victims of the same sniper(s), based on bullets allegedly extracted from bodies and subsequent ballistic tests. So-called expert criminologists who automatically proceed from the assumption that the police are retailing infallible truth about the victims and the bullets, are about as sophisticated as the kids who whitewashed Tom Sawyer's fence. Without independent corroboration of police ballistics tests, we do not see how any authentic criminologist or journalist can assume anything about who killed the victims grouped and ascribed to "the sniper." [6]

One may wish to study the Pentagon's Urban Warfare Doctrine to learn the role which "information superiority" and control of the media play in manipulating a target population. PSYOP, according to the Pentagon's doctrine, entails having the media disseminate only the "approved message...modifying attitudes and behavior of selected audiences." [7]

The System did get its requisite "Muslim monster," John Allen Muhammad, a U.S. Army veteran, into theatrical custody. The supposed "sniper" was indeed struck with that ancient, self-incriminating malady, masonic apoplexy: "The link to the two Washington men came in part from a call from the suspected sniper himself. In the call, the sniper told investigators to look into an incident in Montgomery, Alabama, a federal law-enforcement official said." [8]

Did the snipers turn themselves in on hypnotic cue?

Reading a carefully drafted, cryptic message to the snipers, Chief Moose said:

"You have indicated you want us to say and do certain things. You want us to say, 'We have caught the sniper like a duck in the noose.' We understand that hearing us say it is important to you."

A few hours after Chief Moose's conveyance of this seemingly hypnotic cue in public, the suspects were found conveniently asleep in the wanted car, at a public rest stop, not far from I-70, a heavily-traveled Interstate highway.

Sleep well, America. The Manchurian candidates have emerged from the shadows. A "Manchurian candidate" is defined as: "A group of American soldiers brainwashed into becoming sleeper agents."

After this possibly hypnotic cue had been conveyed to Mr. Muhammad, the Cryptocracy required a story to conceal the cue.

They deliberately intended for that story to be absurd. Why? So they could mock the credulity of the dupes who would believe a sheerly stupid explanation solely because it was retailed by the credentialed Establishment Media. Half of occult ritual consists in mockery of We the People, we who our processors consider morons richly deserving of contempt and exploitation.

Having assessed the reaction in advance, the Overlords chose not to suppress their sneers. They did this by presenting to the American people a "folktale expert" who "solved the riddle" by explaining that Chief Moose's statement was just an old Cherokee Indian story about a rabbit that goes hunting for a duck. [9]

The System will have a tougher time however, explaining away and solving the riddle behind certain revelations, such as the datum that well before the sniper murders occurred, police in the state of Washington, as well as Federal agents there, received numerous red flag warnings concerning the suspects, including information concerning Mr. Muhammad's acquisition of an illegal silencer for his weapon.

According to the Seattle Times, ATF Special Agent Patrick Berarducci stated that the ATF learned of Muhammad and the silencer, but took no action. Neither did the ATF act against the gunshop where some say the sniper rifle was obtained. The rifle cannot be traced any further than this gun shop, to Muhammad or anyone else, because the record for this rifle and hundreds of other rifles are missing.

The teenaged Jamaican national, "Malvo," the alleged sniper's accomplice, was designated an illegal alien in 2001, but was allowed to remain in the U.S. after a top official of the INS intervened, and overturned the U.S. Border Patrol's deportation advisory.

Or how about this revelation: "According to several news reports, authorities spent so much time trying to collect forensic evidence from the (sniper's) letter, which was retrieved from Saturday night's shooting site in Ashland, Va., that they missed a deadline the sniper had imposed." (Seattle Times, October 24).

[9] No allegation of wrong-doing on the part of Chief Moose is here alleged. He may have been only a messenger innocently retailing a communication above his comprehension.

A Fable for Our Times

Sniper's Message Cites Cherokee's Tale

Associated Press (AP), October 24, 2002

"The last cryptic message from Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose to the Washington-area sniper referred to a Cherokee Indian story about an arrogant rabbit that was duped by the duck he tried to catch...

"In the ancient story, passed down through generations of Cherokee Indians, a rabbit brags that he can catch a duck. He throws a noose over the neck of a duck, but it flies away with the rabbit hanging on. Eventually the rabbit must let go, landing in a hollow tree stump.

"The conceited animal has to eat his own fur for food and is embarrassed by his appearance when he finally escapes. 'His boastfulness got him in trouble and eventually destroyed him,' said Tera Shows, spokeswoman for the Cherokee Nation, based in Tahlequah, Oklahoma" (end quote from the AP). [10]

Chico Marx: "Why a duck?" [11]

Sheriff Daggett: "The Duck of death, says I." [12]

[10] This does not have verisimilitude, even as mythology. Rabbits don't catch ducks. Birch bark canoes of some North American Natives (for instance the Passamaquoddy tribe), were occasionally adorned with images of a confident, pipe-smoking rabbit on one side and a mountain lion on the other. The Mad River Canoe company featured this rabbit mascot, explaining that the pipe-smoking rabbit is a symbol of freedom from fear of one's natural enemies. The legend is prominent in the 1997 film "The Edge," written by David Mamet. In the movie, the owner of a wilderness lodge (played by L.Q. Jones), bets New York billionaire Charles Morse (Anthony Hopkins), that he can't guess what's on the back of a canoe paddle that features an image of a panther on the front. Morse answers directly, "A rabbit smoking a pipe." He adds, "The rabbit is not afraid, because he knows he's smarter than the panther." This Native proverb foreshadows the film's subsequent key action sequences. In the finale, after a harrowing life-and-death ordeal, Charles and the lodge owner revisit the aphorism. Hopkins's character says, "We are all put to the test, but it never comes in the form or point we would prefer..."

[11] A line from a 1929 Marx Brothers movie.

Certain Anomalies in the Case of 33 Deaths in the Virginia Tech Terror

April 16, 2007

Joseph Paul Watson writes: "Charles Mesloh, Professor of Criminology at Florida Gulf Coast University, told NBC 2 News that he was shocked that Seung-Hui Cho, an undergraduate (Korean) student at the university, could have killed 32 people with two handguns absent expert training. Mesloh said the killer performed like a trained professional, 'He had a 60% fatality rate with handguns.'

"In the two hour gap between the first reported shootings and the wider rampage that would occur later in the morning, Cho had time to videotape his confession, transfer it to his computer, burn it onto a DVD, package it up, travel to the post office, post the package, and travel back to his dorm room to retrieve his guns, and then travel back to the opposite end of the campus to resume the killing spree." (End quote from Joseph Paul Watson)

The campus was not shut down after the first shooting of student Emily Jane Hilscher, and Ryan Clark, the resident adviser at the dorm. Lame excuses have been put forward but the fact is, in August, 2006, during a hunt in the vicinity of Virginia Tech for an escaped convict accused of killing two people, classes were canceled and students were told to stay in their rooms (that was the first day of the school year at Virginia Tech, August 21, 2006, so one can describe the shock and fear mined that day as the opening scene in the play that would climax on April 16, 2007). Two people were killed in August off campus and Virginia Tech is shut down and students placed on alert, in defensive posture. The first two people killed by Cho in April and the college continued operating as though nothing was amiss. Why?

It's our hunch that campus security and local law enforcement were misled by assurances from officials higher up that the first two killings, of Hilscher and Clark, were a domestic matter involving a man romantically involved with Hilscher. The profile on cases like that indicates that bystanders are seldom at risk. The local officials took the fatal bait and did as they were told— they relaxed their vigilance.

State officials, notably Virginia State Police Col. W. Steven Flaherty were still saying as of the early morning of April 18 as follows: "...investigators were not ready to conclude that the same gunman was responsible for both episodes..." [1]

This follows the initial insistence of the University President on April 16: "Charles Steger, president of the university, said at a later afternoon news conference that 31 people, including the gunman were killed at Norris Hall and two others died at the dorm. He said there was no connection between the two shootings."

On the morning of April 17, President Steger definitively labeled the Korean as the second shooter: "He was one of our students,' Charles W. Steger, Virginia Tech's president, said this morning on CNN. Offering the most detailed official description so far, Mr. Steger said the shooter at Norris Hall was an Asian male student who lived on campus in one of the dormitories. The suspect was called the 'second shooter." [2]

What of the fact that the sound of a shotgun being fired inside Norris Hall, scene of 30 of the murders and one alleged suicide, was heard by a witness, Wayne Neu? The shooter is said to have been armed only with hand guns. The discharge of a hand gun is very different from the report of a shotgun. If a shotgun was discharged we must ask by whom and at what target?

We have cell phone service being obstructed on campus the morning of April 16. This was explained as due to heavy calling on that day. Gosh, service was obstructed even before the massacre in Norris Hall commenced? How odd that cell phone service was on the blink on that day. The school's website was down intermittently too, during the shootings. Not enough bandwidth, it seems. One might venture to say it appears that Cho and whomever may have assisted him, had to be allowed to mow down 30 people in addition to the first two victims. The green light was on for the massacre, even if certain essential services on campus were out of order.

We are informed that Cho was on unspecified "prescription medications," like so many schoolyard shooters and Manchurian candidates; that portion of the script has not been altered. He was also programmed the way millions of American kids are programmed for mayhem and violence, with ultra-violent and highly profitable digital games: "Several Korean youths who knew Cho Seung Hui from his high school days said he was a fan of violent video games, particularly 'Counterstrike,' a hugely popular online game published by Microsoft, in which players join terrorism...groups and try to shoot each other using all types of guns." [3]

[1] "Two-Hour Delay Is Linked to Bad Lead," New York Times, April 18, 2007.

[2] "Massacre in Virginia: The Day After," New York Times, April 17, 2007.

The media reported that the phrase "Ismail Ax" was scrawled on the shooter's arm. Later it was reported that the inscription on his arm read "Ismale Ax." Were they going to work a Muslim (Ishmael) angle, but then dropped it?

In his chilling, videotaped tirade broadcast on television, Mr. Cho spoke of being humiliated, saying, "You forced me to dig my own grave. You shoved trash down my throat." Masonic initiations by secret society groups like Skull-and-Bones involve mock burials in coffins and graves and humiliation involving excrement and sexual fluids (as portrayed in the Revelation of the Method movie, "The Good Shepherd").

The hastily assembled post-massacre "public convocation" at Virginia Tech with President George W. Bush and First Lady Laura in attendance put a funerary pall over the proceedings on a day that should have been a time of intense police investigation—but one doesn't ask questions during a funerary rite, one mourns—and thus as the trail got cold, tampered with, destroyed and manipulated, our attention was focused elsewhere, on the instant mourning rite. This one-day respite in the immediate aftermath of the slaughter gave the Cryptocracy the opportunity to manage and arrange the scene of the crime; to stage it like a realtor stages a house for sale. As the magicians distracted us with the mourning rite, the Cryptos took care of cleaning up the evidence; how convenient.

Their staging differs in certain respects from past scenarios. For example, the case was not entirely presented as open-and-shut. The Cryptocracy released to the media a report of a couple of puzzling items, contradictory data and ambiguous loose ends that gave the massacre the aura of lingering mystery, like acrid gunsmoke hanging in the air. Their allowance for mystery was a safety valve. It enhanced the credibility of the official account. Instead of giving an impression of absolutism in an age of uncertainty, they allowed for uncertainty, conveying a "Gee, some of this is as mystifying to us, as it is to you," message. An attempt to abruptly claim the Virginia Tech case was closed, as was preemptively done with the Son of Sam and Unabom murders, would tax the government's credibility in the year 2007, which was steeped in an Iraq war quagmire in which Americans were becoming distrustful of official malarkey. Far better to allow for an uncertainty principle, which the System can then manage in the direction it wants the investigation to proceed.

[3] Cf. "Centreville Student Was Va. Tech Shooter," Washington Post, April 17, 2007.

The media reported: "Up until today, the deadliest campus shooting in United States history was in 1966 at the University of Texas, where Charles Whitman climbed to the 28th-floor observation deck of a clock tower and opened fire, killing 16 people before he was gunned down by police. In the Columbine High attack in 1999, two teenagers killed 12 fellow students and a teacher before killing themselves. The shooting at Virginia Tech came just four days before the anniversary of the Columbine High School slaying."

The Korean Cho replaced Texan Charles Whitman as the top campus killer of record. We're shown a timeline, we're looking beyond Virginia Tech. Many other "lone nut" type of "violence-is-as-American-as-apple-pie" killings were being summoned, like ghosts to a seance table, making the third week in April of 2007 a haunted one. Spines were being collectively tingled; we were on alert, not quite so drowsy. We were in "teachable" mode. The Virginia Tech massacre of April 16 was electrifying in itself. This was doubled in light of the imminent arrival of the commemoration service on the April 20 anniversary of the 1999 Columbine school massacre, also allegedly perpetrated by medicated, violent video gamers.

We were "teachable" that week in April, 2007. But what were we being taught?

1. That Cho's sister Sun Kyung worked for the U.S. government in the State Department's Iraq Reconstruction Management Office and that her office "was set up by President Bush."

2. That we didn't care enough about innocent life to prevent another Columbine, by banning access to pharmaceutical substances that lower inhibitions against killing fellow human beings. That we didn't care enough to take on Hollywood's slaughter/slasher movies exhibiting depraved indifference to human life, and "humanitarian-philanthropist" Bill Gates's Microsoft and their unconscionably profitable traffic in ultra-violent and dehumanizing digital games.

23 is the reported age of the alleged perpetrator.

33 is the number of the total who died: the shooter killed 32 plus himself.

Significant numbers 23 and 33, whether by design or CCC (Cosmic Coincidence Control), were seared into the Group Mind.

Less than two months earlier, on February 23, 2007, movie star Jim Carrey produced and took the lead in the movie, "The Number 23."

The significance of number 23 as a chaos integer was not so well known beyond fans of the writings of William Seward Burroughs, that is until Mr. Carrey's movie debuted in the U.S. on 4/23/07 (4 + 23 +7 = 34, presaging April's 32 to 33 victim progression at Virginia Tech).

On February 27, four days after "The Number 23" movie debuted, a "suicide" bomber blew himself up near where Vice President Cheney was staying in Kabul, Afghanistan. The headline of the February 28 edition of the New York Times read, "A Mile from Cheney, Afghan Bomber Kills At Least 23."

Three separate cases of murder-suicide in Houston, Texas, including one at the Johnson Space Center, followed the killings at Virginia Tech.

The third death in the series took place on April 23.

One of the killers was age 33.

And where is Black Jack in all this?

Where's the tunnel to the 21 Gateway?

According to a British newspaper, Cho's dorm room was numbered 2121. [4]

Copycat Videogram to America's Youth

Why was the video containing Cho's gruesome and perverted death manifesto televised?

Why not issue a transcript of his statements and spare the nation the spectacle of making a Videodrome celebrity out of a mass murderer while disseminating his death message to millions?

There was a macabre kamikaze glamor to the video: a demented nerd was transformed into a deadly, potent and instantly famous ninja by the power of his homicidal/suicidal rage. The repeated broadcast seemed like a recruitment piece soliciting copycats. [5]

The Willard Factor: when Israeli civilians massacre Arabs, they are usually described as mentally ill. When Arab civilians massacre Israelis, they are commonly referred to as terrorists. Cho Seung Hui was presented as mentally ill. This deflates speculation that he was directed to do what he did, or that he perpetrated his crimes for defined political, racial or occult motives. Mental illness smothers a multitude of leads: "He was a lone nut. That's all there is to it."

Under that cover story, programming him with drugs becomes "the administration of medication."

[5] Cf. Loren Coleman, The Copycat Effect: How the Media and Popular Culture Trigger the Mayhem in Tomorrow's Headlines (2004).

He was a lone nut so there's nothing to investigate, other than "incompetent college officials." [6]

Violence from on high begets violence below. The Columbine killings followed President Bill Clinton's indiscriminate, NATO-partnered bombing of ancient churches, cities, trains and buses packed with civilians in Orthodox Christian Serbia. Violence is a form of contagion, particularly the state-sponsored variety.

NATO's carnage was approved by our moralists and statesmen even as loads of Serb civilians were burned alive on the altar of the god of collateral damage. The casual violence of the U.S. government and NATO in Serbia, and the disregard for human life which the two homicidal teenagers exhibited in Littleton, Colorado, are linked.

Depravity and mockery are compounded when slaughterer-in-chief Bush goes to Virginia Tech to "minister" to the victims of an epidemic of violence, of which he himself was a prime instigator through his Skull-and-Bones contempt for human life in Iraq.

Red Dawn at Midnight

The Aurora, Colorado "Batman" Massacre

On the 43rd anniversary of the Apollo Moon Landing, a mass shooting at the midnight screening in Aurora, Colorado of Christopher Nolan's Batman movie, "The Dark Knight Rises" which premiered nationally on July 20, 2012, bore eerie similarities to a scene from the 1986 comic book, Batman: Dark Knight Triumphant, down to the killer's red hair.

In the comic strip, a crazed, gun-toting loner walks into a movie theater and opens fire, killing three in the process. The scene in the comic concludes with the media blaming Batman for inspiring the shooting, though he is not involved in the incident.

The 1986 illustrations, written and drawn by Frank Miller, were allegedly a key inspiration for the Batman movies. They supposedly helped to re-imagine the character away from his kiddie cartoon image and into a darker, more macabre incarnation. The point of the scene in Mr. Miller's Batman: Dark Knight Triumphant was to show just how far Gotham city had gone berserk since the Batman had retired.

Was one of the Aurora shooters (James Holmes) imitating this scene? In the comic book the shooter is portrayed as inspired by his disgust at the breakdown of American society: its pornography and inhuman rock music. [1]

In magic, the highest ritual imprinting of the Group Mind is accompanied by blood sacrifice. The bat has not traditionally been associated with goodness, but rather the opposite, from the bat of the "Dracula" mythos, to the masonic bat caves of New Mexico and the Bat Towers of Florida and Texas. But in America, where heads-is-tails and sinners are saints, the sinister bat image has been reversed and transformed into a crime fighter.

A depraved pattern of media corruption was repeated a mere several hours after the Colorado massacre. Like with Lee Harvard Oswald and David Berkowitz, when the investigation should have begun in earnest the Washington Post (online July 20, 6:47 p.m.) closed the case by issuing the infamous, omniscient lone-nut declaration:

"The only near-certainty is that the gunman (James Holmes) acted alone and not as part of a terrorist group or other conspiracy."

The Post knew this with "near-certainty" and publicized it a little over eighteen hours after the crime had been committed.

It sure is a relief to have clairvoyant, credentialed Establishment sources of information serving the people's right to know and protecting us from the "recurring paranoia" of "discredited conspiracy theories" which, thank goodness, ever-vigilant Twitter, Facebook and YouTube have the good sense to ban.

As with Oswald, a similarly ludicrous, all-knowing declaration was issued by the establishment media in 1977 in the immediate aftermath of the apprehension of "troubled loner" David Berkowitz as New York City's one and only "Son of Sam" shooter—brazen mendacity which the hierarchy of the NYPD buttressed.

As we have detailed, years later this frozen "certainty" was thawed when it was decided it was Revelation of the Method time.

Reports by eyewitnesses of an accomplice of Holmes who was seen inside the Aurora theatre is down the memory hole, replaced by the incontestable dogma that Holmes was another "disturbed loner." [2]

A name-game question: they caught Holmes. Where's Dr. Watson? Perhaps he's dating actress Katie Holmes, after she divorced Scientologist Tom Cruise. It was James Holmes who knocked Katie Holmes off the front page of the entertainment news in July.

According to Internet Movie Database (IMDB), Katie Holmes starred in the 2005 Batman film, "Batman Begins." Katie Holmes also has a JFK connection. IMDB reports that she portrayed Jacqueline Kennedy in "The Kennedys" television mini-series. The name Holmes, from Sherlock to James to Katie, has caught the attention of the establishment media in our "maddened land."

---

[2] Batman movie star Gary Oldman portrayed "lone nut" Lee Harvey Oswald in Oliver Stone's "JFK." In "The Dark Knight Rises" he portrays Gotham's Police Commissioner, James Gordon.

“Names have always been the subject of magical thinking – the ancient Romans buried lead tablets invoking the names of spirits, gods or the dead in order to curse their enemies, so perhaps it shouldn’t be too surprising that many people think uttering the name ‘James Holmes,’ like an unguarded mention of the name “Voldemort” in J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter series, will cause bad things to happen...

“The curse invoked by Holmes’ name, according to some, will take the form of other mass shootings. Indiscriminate killers seem to crave fame and notoriety; take those away, the theory goes, and there will be no reason for troubled loners of the future to strap on weapons and shoot up the local post office/mall/campus/movie theater.” [3]

The establishment media were having quite a struggle deciding how to refer to James Holmes in the wake of his massacre. They didn’t know whether to imprint him as “the Dark Knight shooter” or “the Joker” (a name which Holmes, a PhD. candidate in neurology, the science of the mind, supposedly called himself according to police at the scene of his crime).

Perhaps they intended to alternate between the two. The description “the Batman shooter” was out for some reason.

Who makes these editorial choices, and why? Are these assigned monikers mundane, or coincidental preferences on the part of a group of copy editors around the nation who are somehow unanimously united into one one mind? Or are people, places and events sometimes deliberately named for special effect, by media executives?

For example, how did “same sex marriage” become a ubiquitous description of homosexual nuptials, and then morph almost overnight in the national media into “marriage equality”? Will the drive for legalizing the marriage of incestuous couples be granted the dignity of the term “marriage equality”? Who among our Overlords decides to confer a name or a phrase and turn it into a nationally mandated expression?

In the nineteenth century, German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, among others, termed Alchemy the “gay science.” How did homosexuality come to be termed “gay” and the name universally assigned?

[3] Los Angeles Times, July 26, 2012.

The name-game is played for high stakes in the battle for Orwell's Newspeak. On September 14, 2020 the Associated Press "Style Book" which is referenced and usually heeded by media executives throughout the English-speaking world, damned the word "transvestite": "Use the term cross-dresser instead of the outdated term transvestite for someone who wears clothing associated with a different gender, and only when the subject identifies as such."

Damn a word as being "outdated," which is not the same as inaccurate, and then consign the forbidden word to oblivion. When modernity replaces accuracy as the criterion for the use of a word which signifies a thought, then as George Orwell warned in the appendix to 1984, that thought itself gradually becomes impossible to think.

The movie "The Dark Knight Rises" does not contain any blatant Cryptocracy symbolism (at least to these eyes), save for the Batman himself — he is of course the physical image of darkness. At the end of the movie a statue of Bruce Wayne/ Batman is unveiled, which conveys this darkness, although supposedly signifying formidable power on behalf of what is good, along with selfless dedication.

What the film does exhibit is a number of initiatory, reality-is-not-what it-seems reversals: prisoners who set up their own rendition by the CIA; Catwoman's use of a fugitive's cell phone to launch a police SWAT team assault; the assumed identity of the child who climbed out of the prison turns out to be another person entirely.

Children are no longer suckled

The word wayne is a derivative of the Old English word wean: "To cease to be suckled; to accustom a child to the loss of its mother's milk." Bruce Wayne, the man of light, wears the disguise of a man of darkness whose familiar is the bat. Wayne has other gender-bending and twilight language connotations.

The 39th Degree of Heartbreak in the Heartland

The 39th degree of the Mizraim (Egyptian) rite of Freemasonry is called Knight of the Red Eagle. Colorado denotes the color red. Aurora denotes dawn. Hence, Aurora, Colorado signifies "Red Dawn."

In 1999, nineteen miles southwest of Aurora, during the orgy of bombing violence which the U.S. and NATO inflicted on the civilian population of Serbia and its ancient Christian centers of learning and worship, thirteen people were massacred at Columbine High School.

Those two Colorado massacres, in Aurora and Columbine, occurred on what is known as "the heart line" — the 39th degree of north parallel latitude—which runs through America's heartland.

Denver International Airport, known for its strange architecture and arcane symbolism, is also situated on the 39th degree. Of all the macabre iconography at that airport, the most intriguing was a large, 70-ton, 26-foot statue of Anubis, the Egyptian jackal-headed god, a personification of the star Sirius, in the constellation Canis major. The dog star was at the theological center of the state religion of ancient Egypt. According to the Babylonian Talmud, "Ten measures of magic came into the world. Egypt received nine of them, the rest of the world only one" (BT Kiddushin 49b).

With Aurora's location on the 39th degree line in mind we read in Jim Brandon's [4] Weird America (Dutton, 1978): "The Sirius Mystery...explores the role of the star Sirius in the mystical and religious affairs of the earliest civilizations of the Mideast and Mediterranean. In his fifth chapter, on the geodetic locations of the various oracle shrines of the ancient world, Temple points out that these places were arranged along nine bands of latitude..." (from the 31st to the 39th).

Dodona, one of the "oracle shrines" in Greece, dating from the Mycenaean era (1900 B.C.), is, like Aurora Colorado, on the 39th degree line of north parallel latitude. Dodona was first dedicated to the goddess Isis. Jason, while searching for the golden fleece, sailed in the "Argo," and in The Argonautica, Apollonius of Rhodes writes that the Argo possessed the gift of prophecy because it contained an oak timber from Isis's shrine at Dodona. Isis and Sirius are linked. Anubis is the guard dog of Isis and the personification of Sirius.

The Batman theatre shootings occurred during what is known as the "Dog Days" of summer, associated with the "heliacal" (i.e. rising at dawn) of the star Sirius, a sacred date on the ancient Pharaonic calendar: "...the star most important to the Egyptians was Sirius, or Sothis, as the Greeks rendered its Egyptian name, and its heliacal rising was taken as the first day of the proto-dynastic era's lunar calendar..." [5]

[4] Pen name of William N. Grimstad.

The slayings in Aurora occurred while America's heartland, bisected by the 39th degree, was being parched and scorched in a Dog Days' drought. "In ancient Greece the heliacal rising of Sirius coincided with the intense midsummer heat...hence its classical Greek name, Seirios, meaning 'glowing one' or 'the scorcher.' Its heat-laden fierceness was considered an aspect of the star's malign influence." [6]

"Throughout Latin literature there are many references to 'the Dog Days' which followed the heliacal rising of Sirius in the summer. These hot, parched days were thought at that time to derive some of their ferocity and dryness from the 'searing' of Sirius. Traditions arose of Sirius being 'red' because it was in fact red at its heliacal rising, just as any other body at the horizon is red. When making rhetorical allusions to the Dog Days, the Latins would often speak of Sirius being red at the time, which it was." [7]

Heliacal rising of Sirius = Red Dawn. The symbolic connection of Anubis, which stood like a beacon at the Denver Airport, to Sirius, is not easy to miss. Robert K.G. Temple: "The heliacal rising was the occasion when Sirius again rose into visibility in the sky after a period of seventy days of being out of sight, during which time it was conceived as being in the Duat, or underworld. A further connection with Anubis comes in here, as Anubis was conceived of as embalming Sothis for these seventy days in the Duat. An embalmed mummy is supposed to come alive again. And this is what happened to the mummy of Sothis. Sothis (Sirius) is reborn on the occasion of her heliacal rising."

The Egyptians and all subsequent Hermetic systems constructed their elaborate and obsessive religio-astronomic observances around Sirius. The importance of Sirius to the global pagan psychodrama beggars description. By psychodrama we are referring to the process wherein a cultural mnemonic consisting of archetypes, subliminals, synchronicity and memes are attracted by a type of scientific sorcery pioneered by Anton Mesmer.

In the case of neuroscience PhD. candidate James Holmes we have a scientist of the mind who simultaneously was the "peak soldier" who supposedly perpetrated this bloody invocation, which is presented to the public through a media filter of mental illness, gun control and Second Amendment controversies. The theurgic character of the rite is overlooked and suppressed when it emanates from independent scholars and researchers. The exception is in the realm of "pattern-detection" and "profiling," concepts which have entered American culture in connection with television and cinema centered around U.S. intelligence data-mining, and the FBI. Profiling as presented to the public is usually limited to a psychological analysis, even though profiling has a great deal to do with "predictive programming," which is essentially a literary phenomenon (cf. Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare, p. 205).

Pattern detection, to be most effective, must take note of highly charged symbolism, which for millennia have been the province of sorcery of the kind at work in Pharaonic Egypt. Pattern detection ought to discern tales freighted with intentional significance. Aurora is one such narrative in the mesmeric "magnetism" and "charm" tradition of the old masonic Rite of Memphis and Mizraim.

Not to put too fine a point on it, but if the erection of the statue of the Egyptian god "An-ubis" at the Denver airport, on the 39th degree of latitude, which it shares with the Dodona oracle and the Columbine and Aurora massacre sites, has significance to the enchantment under consideration, then it behooves us to inquire into what evil directs the adepts we are investigating. Kenneth Grant, a leader of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), states in The Magical Revival:

"In the Arcane Tradition, the vast star, Sirius, symbolizes the sun behind the sun, i.e. the true father of our Universe. Sirius was the primordial star of all time, as the duplicator or renewer (of time cycles). He was known in Egypt as the Doubling One, therefore a Creator or reflector of the Image. Sirius, or Set, was the original 'headless one' — the light of the lower region (the South) who was known (in Egypt) as An (the dog), hence Set-an (Satan), Lord of the infernal regions, the place of heat, later interpreted in a moral sense as 'hell."

When the image of Anubis ("An the dog") was placed on the south side of one of our nation's largest airports, were "our" civic officials ceremonially paying homage to Satan?

Or was this merely coincidental, being largely a colorful stunt from the world of promotion and advertising?

In response to that familiar bromide, let us quote Police Commissioner Gordon (Gary Oldman) in the "Dark Knight Rises" movie, in theaters during the Dog Days of 2012:

"You're a detective now. For you there are no more coincidences."

In the first century A.D., the Roman Marcus Manilius crafted Astronomica, a poetic catalogue of the stars. Manilius wrote the following verse associating Sirius with "opposite extremes":

Next barks the Dog, and from his Nature flow
The Most afflicting Powers that rule below,
Heat burns his Rise, Frost chills his setting Beams,
And vex the World with opposite Extremes.
He keeps his Course, nor from the Sun retreats,
Now bringing Frost, and now increasing Heats:
Those that from Taurus view this rising Star,
Guess thence the following state of Peace and War,
Health, Plagues, a fruitful or barren Year.
He makes shrill Trumpets sound...

Alexander Pope shall have the last word in this Sirius matter:

The dog-star rages! nay 'tis past a doubt,
All Bedlam, or Parnassus, is let out:
Fire in each eye, and papers in each hand,
They rave, recite, and madden round the land.

The Aurora Shooter's Cryptocracy Connection

According to Kurt Nimmo of Infowars.com, investigative journalist Wayne Madsen claims that James Holmes had a number of links to U.S. government-funded research centers, including the Defense Advance Research Projects Agency, (DARPA). Holmes was one of six recipients of a National Institutes of Health Neuroscience Training Grant at the University of Colorado's Anschutz Medical Campus in Denver, Madsen writes in the Wayne Madsen Report. "The Anschutz Medical Campus is on the recently de-commisioned site of the U.S. Army's Fitzsimons Army Medical Center and is named after Philip Anschutz, the billionaire Christian fundamentalist oil and railroad tycoon, who also owns the neo-conservative Weekly Standard," Madsen reported. "The Anschutz Medical Campus was built by a $91 million grant from the Anschutz Foundation."

Holmes also worked as a research assistant intern at the Salk Institute, at the University of California at San Diego in La Jolla. The Salk Institute partnered with DARPA, Columbia University, University of California at San Francisco, University of Wisconsin at Madison, Wake Forest University, and the candy bar company Mars, "to prevent fatigue in combat troops through the enhanced use of epicatechina, a blood flow-increasing and blood vessel-dilating anti-oxidant flavanol found in cocoa and, particularly, in dark chocolate," according to Madsen's research.

The DARPA program was part of the military's "Peak Soldier Performance Program," which involved engineering brain-machine interfaces for battlefield use and other bionic projects. In addition, James Holmes' father, Dr. Robert Holmes, allegedly worked for San Diego-based HNC Software, Inc., a company reputed to be allied with DARPA in developing "cortronic neural networks" that enable machines to translate aural and visual stimuli and simulate human thinking.

DARPA was the government agency that developed the supposedly now defunct, "Total Information Awareness" (TIA) program. But according to James Bamford in a report in Wired, "Inside the Matrix," (April, 2012), the TIA has been secretly revived by the National Security Agency (NSA) and is based at its vast, newly constructed "Utah Data Center," near Bluffdale, Utah, in what Bamford calls, "the heart of Mormon country."

TIA was originally developed by Reagan's Iran-Contra co-conspirator, Admiral John Poindexter (whose 26-year-old grandson Zach killed the admiral's 51-year-old son, Navy Captain Alan Poindexter, in a bizarre accident off Pensacola Beach, July 1, 2012).

Using the Batman shootings as another stepping stone to a police state, the Wall Street Journal, in a July 25, 2012 editorial, suggested that the government should revive the TIA program: "Aside from privacy considerations, is there anything in principle to stop government computers...from algorithmically detecting the patterns of a mass shooting in the planning stages?"

Just five days after the massacre and the media were not interested in investigating the shootings and the questions surrounding it. They preferred to insinuate that the shooter was a crazed kook without accomplices. DARPA's revived TIA was put forth as the American people's defense against mass-shooters like James Holmes, without mentioning that Holmes and his father allegedly had ties to DARPA. Can a kingdom divided against itself stand? Can DARPA cast out DARPA?

A week after the Batman theatre attack in Aurora, on July 27 (the Judean holy day of Tisha B'av), ceremonies for the Olympic Games commenced in London, England with the theme, "Isles of Wonder." One of the ceremonies included a speech by Prospero's slave, Caliban, from Shakespeare's The Tempest, wherein Shakespeare offers a sympathetic portrayal of John Dee, thinly disguised as Prospero and set on an enchanted island. The ceremony included video of the modern 007 (actor Daniel Craig who portrays 007 James Bond on screen), escorting a grim-faced Queen Elizabeth II to the Olympic ceremony. One might deduce from this symbolism that Dr. Dee was the intended guiding spirit of the London Olympics.

As readers are aware by now, mathematician John Dee, Elizabeth I's astrologer referred to himself as 007. Elizabeth II's son, Prince Charles, has written about this original 007 and his code-number nickname:

"(Marsilio) Ficino's highly influential book, Platonic Theology, found its way to England shortly after it was published and eventually, some 90 years later, into one of the most important libraries in Elizabethan London, owned by Dr. John Dee, Queen Elizabeth I's astrologer...

"He coined the term 'British Empire' as part of his vision of creating a world-wide religion that emphasized the unity of all things, and was a close adviser to the queen. Intriguingly, he may have been a spy for Elizabeth when he traveled to Poland and Prague.

"I am told that when he wrote to her from such places he signed his letters with a curious combination of symbols: two zeros, sometimes connected by a bridge, implying he was her 'eyes,' followed by an elongated 7, which happens to be the alchemical symbol for Mercury. As Mercury was the messenger of the gods, the implication is rather clear. Dee was the Queen's secret and mercurial messenger." [8]

As we elucidate in The Occult Renaissance Church of Rome, Rev. Fr. Ficinio was one of the Vatican's prime Neoplatonic occult agents and initiates, and here we observe the belt of transmission between Renaissance papalism and its rival, the arch-Protestant regime of Elizabeth I.

Moreover, the credibility of the sales pitch of Prince Charles regarding Dee's new spin on catholic (universal) religion (the prisca theologia), emphasizing the alleged origin of all religions in a harmonious ancient "wisdom tradition," is undermined by the impolitic fact that the Pirate Queen Elizabeth was the first English monarch to put the African slave trade on a firm footing, with the assistance of her swarm of skilled buccaneers.

Was Advance knowledge of the Aurora and Sandy Hook shootings embedded in a major Hollywood movie?

We're interested in the possibility of deliberately planted theatrical numerology and twilight language symbolism which may perhaps point to the possibility of the scripted nature of serial killings and ritual murders.

"Batman: The Dark Knight Rises" references "Sandy Hook" prior to that school massacre in Newton, Connecticut. It can be glimpsed at approximately one hour, 58 minutes into the movie. It appears as tiny penciled words on a map which a police official is using to select his target.

Furthermore, in the same film the word "Aurora" is prominently displayed in a scene of a skyscraper ablaze with that lighted word, against a backdrop of darkness.

Necromancy in Parkland

Parkland in the context of President Kennedy's murder (he died at Parkland hospital) and this mass murder on Valentine's Day, February 14, 2018 suggests Twilight Language, when taken together with the infamous 1929 "Saint Valentine's Day Massacre" from the annals of gangland.

The origins of Valentine's Day are not happy if the fate of its namesake, Saint Valentinus, is any guide: "According to the official biography of the Diocese of Terni, Bishop Valentine was born and lived in Interamna and while on a temporary stay in Rome he was imprisoned, tortured, and martyred there on February 14, A.D. 269."

In 2018 February 14 was also the 73rd anniversary of the Allied massacre in Dresden, where Americans assisted the British in slaughtering at least 100,000 German civilians. Then there is the abortion holocaust to which the media are oblivious. They cherish abolitionist John Brown for declaring in 1859 that our nation had to be purged with blood for slavery: "I, John Brown, am now quite certain that the crimes of this guilty land can never be purged away but with blood." (December 2, 1859).

But the System will not countenance the possibility that America is being purged for its mass murder of the most helpless and dehumanized in our society—unborn children. We are certainly not suggesting that the innocent souls massacred in Florida deserved to die, or anything approaching such a reprehensible equivalence. If Nikolas Cruz was indeed the perpetrator he seems to have been demon-possessed, or at the least, a pharmakos (drugged, enslaved) individual, one of many resident in the haunted house that is the United States of America.

Whether at Parkland in Florida or the "Route 91 Harvest" shootings in Las Vegas, we are being forced into attendance upon a ceremonial Dia de Muertos on a national scale, like the Aztec and Egyptian people of old. In the words of H.P. Lovecraft "...behind it all I saw the ineffable malignity of primordial necromancy."

The Cryptocracy has seeded the "crisis actor" meme (the claim that shootings are staged and victims non-existent) among activists otherwise rightly skeptical of the official government and media narratives. This "crisis actor" allegation however, is automatically assigned to nearly every mass shooting in the U.S. by dupes and irresponsible conspiracy theorists. When confronted with a lawsuit, conspiracy talk show host Alex Jones recanted his claims of staged shootings in the Sandy Hook Elementary School massacre in Connecticut in 2012.

There is no doubt in our mind that the Parkland, Florida slaughter was real and that those who designate the victims, or all the witnesses, as "crisis actors," are doing the Cryptocracy a favor by bringing discredit on investigations that are independent of the government's mouthpiece media.

Chuck Baldwin's Analysis

Dr. Chuck Baldwin (chuckbaldwinlive.com), director of Kalispell, Montana's Liberty Fellowship, is one of the independent investigators, and the Parkland conspiracy he posits is evidence-based and reasonable. Pastor Baldwin makes the following points in his essay, "Florida School Massacre Proves Police Are Worthless In Protecting Us." He writes:

"...courts have consistently ruled that it is not the responsibility of a police officer to protect the citizen. It is the responsibility of the citizen to protect himself. The job of the police officer is to gather evidence, apprehend the suspected criminal, and bring him to a court of law for a fair trial where they are presumed innocent until proven guilty.

"All of this talk about cops protecting us is a myth—a fabrication and misrepresentation. Almost every lawyer and judge in the country knows it. The only ones who don't know it are most of the American people. So, think about it: under our Constitution and laws, police officers have no obligation to protect the American citizenry. But at the same time, our politicians, news media, and most public school administrators and police chiefs insist that the American citizens should not be allowed to protect themselves. If this isn't madness, there is no such thing."

Dr. Baldwin cites anomalies in the Parkland shooting: "Did you watch the eyewitness testimony of the teacher who saw the shooter from a distance of only twenty feet?

"Stacey Lippel, a language arts teacher at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School where the killings occurred, said at first she thought the shooter was a police officer because of the way he was dressed 'in 'full metal garb' complete with helmet, face mask and bulletproof armor. 'I'm staring at him thinking, Why is the police(man) here? This is strange,' she said. 'And I'm just looking at him, but I'm still getting the kids (to safety), knowing this is an emergency.' The teacher also said that the shooter was carrying a type of rifle that she had 'never seen before.'

"Ms. Lippel's eyewitness testimony contradicts the official story that the 19-year-old shooter was wearing street clothes and a backpack and carrying a black duffel bag containing extra ammunition, which he discarded when he casually walked out of the school with the other students, and was later arrested in a nearby residential neighborhood. (I have not seen reports stating exactly where authorities found the discarded rifle, backpack, and duffel bag.)

"If this teacher saw Nikolas Cruz, the 19-year-old kid (who we are told was the sole shooter), could he really have carried all of that armored police gear to the school (remember he was supposedly driven to the school by an Uber driver), quickly put on all of the gear (no easy task unless one is very familiar and practiced with this kind of equipment), go through the school, shooting everyone in sight, then take off the body armor and tactical gear without being seen, and casually walk out of the school with the other students, without being recognized, blending with them and raising no suspicion by police officers as he walked away from the scene?

"Apparently, that is what we are expected to believe. What happened to all of the armor the shooter was wearing? Not a word has been said about it. The more plausible explanation is that Ms. Lippel saw a second shooter—someone professionally trained and equipped with sophisticated military and police tactical gear. Furthermore, it's difficult to believe that the teacher wouldn't know what an AR-15 rifle would look like. But military units carry a plethora of combat weapons that most civilians have never laid eyes on. That's a whole different subject, isn't it?

"It is more than curious that according to students and teachers at the school: 1. the U.S. Secret Service conducted drills (plural) at the school, and 2. teachers and students had been told by police that they would be conducting active shooter drills at the school that very week and that they would be firing blanks during the exercises (many students and faculty members thought police had begun the drill when they heard the shots ring out); and 3. according to one student's testimony, she actually walked out of the building with the alleged shooter Nikolas Cruz. Obviously, Cruz was not wearing police armor. The girl said she heard shots coming from another part of the school at the same time that she was walking out with Cruz and is certain there had to have been a second shooter.

"Another troubling question: since when does the Secret Service conduct drills at public schools in different states? What a coincidence that police had told the school to expect an active shooter drill at about the same time as the actual homicidal live shooting took place. I don't believe in coincidences when it comes to mass shootings. Isn't it convenient that the government is razing the entire Parkland school building—just like in Waco, the Twin Towers and the Murrah building in Oklahoma City etc.?[1] Destroy the building (crime scene) and you destroy the evidence, which is a crime" (end quote from Dr. Chuck Baldwin).

Banning "assault" guns has little or nothing to do with actually preventing mass murder sprees in America. The eighth-deadliest shooting in the U.S. was perpetrated by Charles Whitman at the University of Texas in 1966, killing 17 and wounding 31. Whitman used basic hunting rifles in the course of his massacre. He would have killed more people, but armed Texas civilians repeatedly shot back at him, pinning him down. Soon after the Parkland school massacre, a man shot and killed himself outside the White House in our nation's capitol. There would seem to be a connection between increasing homicidal psychosis among the American people and mass murders like Parkland which transmit a subtle, anxiety-producing hint of a conspiratorial role by a higher power.

A guard with an "assault rifle" protects U.S. senators. Washington, D.C., March, 2021

The corporate media suppress the common sense fact that disarming the American people makes us more vulnerable to the psychotics our society produces and the killers "our" government itself dispatches.

As noted, dehumanizing violence to human beings inside the womb (60 million aborted children in the U.S. since Roe v. Wade), breeds similar violence outside of it, a reality the virtue-signalers will not acknowledge.

Furthermore, when politicians and the media call for a radical reduction of gun ownership in America, they're not referring to the guns they possess by special permit or hidden loopholes in the law; or the heavily armed guards that ringed Congress in early 2021, or the armed security people who shield Biden, Bill and Hillary and more billionaires than we can name. Deep State bureaucrats have a mandate to disarm Americans, while plutocrats, politicians, and lawyers with status or connections continue to have access to high powered weapons or elite guards licensed to carry them.

Gun control is a euphemism for disarming the common people, not the Overlords and the "connected." Their lives are viewed by the Cryptocracy as being worth more than ours. These would-be godlings of the ruling class will always be protected by gunmen who possess automatic or semi-automatic firearms, or even more advanced, exotic weaponry unknown to the public. There is no gun control for the Overlords. Their privileged position will not be altered when a "ban on assault rifles" specifically, or strict limits on firearms generally, are enacted in the name of "gun control."

Hoodwinked "progressives" don't know or don't wish to entertain the fact that so-called gun control is poor people control. In these schemes, the elite (or their guards) remain heavily armed, while the peasants are disarmed on the faulty supposition that rendering them nearly helpless renders madmen and criminals harmless. It's Plato's dual law system: one law for the putative higher-souled human beings and another for those designated as lower-souled.

Texas Church Shooting: Congregant Fires Back, Stopping a Murderer

December 29, 2019—Jack Wilson, 71, of rural Hood County Texas, a member of the West Freeway Church of Christ in White Settlement, shot and killed Keith Kinnunen after Kinnunen opened fire on the congregation, murdering two Christians, Rich White, 67, of Westworth Village, and Tony Wallace, 64, of Fort Worth.

"The events at West Freeway Church of Christ put me in a position that I would hope no one would have to be in, but evil exists and I had to take out an active shooter in church," Mr. Wilson said.

Accompanied by gun-carrying bodyguards, billionaire Michael Bloomberg addressed the shooting at West Freeway Church of Christ during a speech in Montgomery, Alabama on New Year's Day, 2020:

"It may be true that someone in the congregation had his own gun and killed the person who murdered two other people, but it's the job of law enforcement to have guns and to decide when to shoot,' the former New York mayor said, adding, "You just do not want the average citizen carrying a gun in a crowded place."

Jack Wilson replied, "Mr. Bloomberg—had we operated by his standards or his wishes, the carnage would have been significantly greater....If Mr. Bloomberg would have his security detail turn their arms in and not guard him, he would be in the same situation as many American citizens are every day."

Manifestations of End-Time Burnout in the Alchemical Theater of Thanatos

In the wake of the mosque attack in March, 2019 in New Zealand by the "Knight Templar" Benton Tarrant, and in Poway, California in April, 2019 on a synagogue by adolescent John T. Earnest, we were asked why we didn't analyze them and accord them the investigative rigor that we have undertaken in other mass murders. The reason we did not is because of the transparency of these shootings. We seldom point out the obvious. Tarrant and Earnest were patently tools of the Cryptocracy.

The ISIS terrorists who massacred 321 mostly Christian Sri Lankans and wounded another 500 on Easter Sunday, 2019 are also under the direction of the Deep State, via what was Donald Trump's favored nation of Saudi Arabia. The theology of the ISIS mass murderers happens to be Salafist Wahhabism, the state religion of Saudi Arabia. The Saudis are Israeli allies. With that laurel there was no evil they perpetrated that would register in the Trump White House.

The U.S. Government Nurtures Enemies and then Organizes the American People to Fight Them

In May, 2015 Judicial Watch procured by means of a federal lawsuit, formerly classified official U.S. intelligence related to Syria. One of these documents, from President Obama's Defense Intelligence Agency dated August 12, 2012, "anticipates the rise of Islamic State" and "seems to suggest it would be a desirable development from the point of view" of those in the U.S. government "seeking regime change in Damascus."

In section 8c the Defense Intelligence Agency document looks forward to establishing in Syria a "principality" of the Islamic terror state of ISIS: "If the situation (in Syria) unravels there is the possibility of establishing a declared or undeclared Salafist principality in eastern Syria (Hasaka and DerZor) and this is exactly what the supporting powers to the opposition want, in order to isolate the Syrian regime."

Notice that in this document, which the government fought to avoid disclosing, American intelligence sounds no alarm about ISIS gaining a caliphate ("principality") in Syria. Observe too that it does not report that the Salafists (ISIS) will establish this principality, only that it's possible that it will be established. By whom? By the "supporting powers to the opposition" to Syrian President Bashir Assad. In other words, American "allies" Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, those two Sunni Salafist monarchies.

The United States government under Obama viewed ISIS and the al Qaeda proxy Jabhat al-Nusra, as useful auxiliaries in the drive for regime change in Syria, eliminating Israeli nemesis Assad, the protector of Syria's minority Christian community. The U.S. viewed an ISIS takeover of northeastern Syria as a positive development. The only nation that foiled the U.S. plan for the overthrow of the Christian-protecting Muslim leader by al-Qaeda and Islamic State terrorists was Putin's Russia, denounced ever since as the shameful and dastardly oppressor of Syria. This is as upside-down as Senator Bernie Sanders demanding the government keep its abortion laws off a woman's body, while at the same time asserting that the government has the absolute right to inject that body with a vaccination serum. The British elevated the House of Saud and its Wahhabbist theology to power on the Arabian peninsula. The United States has been the Saudis' chief enabler since World War II.

Daniel Lazare reports on the U.S. government's role in creating modern jihadism:

"Kosovo, where the United States joined forces with Saudi-backed jihadis in support of the secessionist movement of Hashim Thaçi; Chechnya, where leading neocons such as Richard Perle, Elliott Abrams, Kenneth Adelman, Midge Decter, Frank Gaffney, Michael Ledeen, and R. James Woolsey championed Saudi-backed Islamist rebels...the United States pronounces itself—shocked!—at the results, while pocketing the winnings. This is evident from a famous 1998 interview with Zbigniew Brzezinski, who, as Jimmy Carter's national security adviser, did as much as anyone to invent the modern phenomenon of Islamic jihad. Asked if he had any regrets, Brzezinski was unabashed:

"Regret what? That secret operation was an excellent idea. It had the effect of drawing the Russians into the Afghan trap, and you want me to regret it? The day that the Soviets officially crossed the border, I wrote to President Carter: We now have the opportunity of giving to the USSR its Vietnam war….What is most important to the history of the world? The Taliban or the collapse of the Soviet empire? Some stirred-up Muslims or the liberation of Central Europe and the end of the Cold War?' Or, as Graham Fuller, former deputy director of the CIA's National Council on Intelligence and later a RAND Corporation analyst, put it a year later: The policy of guiding the evolution of Islam and of helping them against our adversaries worked marvelously well in Afghanistan against the Red Army. The same doctrines can still be used to destabilize what remains of Russian power..." (end quote from Brzezinski). Lazare continues:

"...the need to prosecute the so-called 'War on Terror,' was never about terrorism per se, but about terrorism unsanctioned by the United States. The goal was to arrange for jihadis only to strike at targets jointly approved by Washington and Riyadh (the capital of Saudi Arabia)...Eastern Syria...became part of the Caliphate declared by ISIS—the recipient of 'clandestine financial and logistic support' from both Saudi Arabia and Qatar, according to no less an authority than Hillary Clinton—in June 2014.

"...As part of its alliance with the Saudis, the United States encouraged the growth not only of jihad but of Wahhabism in general...how could Washington object when the kingdom vastly expanded its missionary effort in 1979, spending anywhere from $75 billion to $100 billion to spread the word? King Fahd, who ruled from 1982 to 2005, bragged about all the religious and educational facilities he built in non-Muslim lands—200 Islamic colleges, 210 Islamic centers, 1,500 mosques, 2,000 schools for Muslim children, etc." [1]

These "King Fahd Centers" produce the suicide bombers who plague the world and target enemies of the Israelis such as the Christian communities of the Third World (Syria, Egypt, Sri Lanka), as well as Shiites in Lebanon, Pakistan and of course, Iran.

Benton Tarrant's profile as a Manchurian Candidate is a common one on the "racist Right"

The same profile of Earnest, the 19-year-old synagogue shooter in California in April, 2019 was exhibited by some of the "white nationalist" marchers in Charlottesville in August, 2017: single white men alienated from women, marriage and the family, who despise the Old Testament and very likely the New, and who identify either with Social Darwinist scientism, or certain memes of the western occult. Men fitting that profile are targets for recruitment by Deep State actors. The prototype is Anders Breivik, the Norwegian Freemason and partisan of Israeli Zionism who murdered dozens of his fellow Norwegians while they were holding a convention devoted to protesting and highlighting Israeli war crimes in Palestine. This context is often omitted. For example, Breivik has been transformed into a neo-Nazi by the New York Times. His crimes were indeed Nazi-like, but his ideology was masonic-Zionist.

After Tarrant struck in New Zealand, by way of providing background, the Times published a photo of Breivik giving the Nazi salute and described him as the inspiration for white racist terrorism around the globe. A photo of him attired in his masonic regalia was not published. What kind of white racist terrorist murders only Nordic whites on behalf of the Israeli state?

In the midst of these massacres, Acura automobiles were being marketed in American television commercials broadcast during the "March Madness" college basketball playoffs, using a soundtrack consisting of an excerpt from the famous rock-and-roll song, "Sympathy for the Devil." Acura chose the devil tune presumably to highlight the otherworldliness and devil-may-care attitude of its latest automobile, the RDX. In 2019 invoking Satan to endorse your SUV was a successful marketing strategy. It remains so.

[1] Daniel Lazare, "How The US-Saudi Marriage Gave Birth to Jihad," Swarajya magazine, Nov 6, 2017

The trend is not confined to any one pocket of the political spectrum. Evangelical Christians protest abortion but they have no problem with Israelis killing Palestinian children after they emerge from the womb. Alabama is in the "buckle of the Bible belt" and opposes abortion and rights for homosexuals. Yet it has one of the most God-forsaken prison-systems in the U.S.A., where rape is regarded (off-the-record) as one of the suitable punishments for writing a bad check or stealing a car. Upstate Idaho is one of the most heavily churched regions in the nation yet the legislature allows for unconscionable usury rates approaching 500% on loans.

In 2001 in Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare we foresaw the ascendance of an American man and woman so heavily processed, neutered and psychologically enthralled that they would be equivalent to masonic initiates. Large swathes of white America are now, in masonic parlance, "on the level."

What is the purpose of pointing out the extent of occult symbolism and Twilight language in America, when in 2021 these things are in the open and utilized in television commercials for automobiles and insurance, without concealment? America consists of a population of virtual masonic initiates immersed in the occult. From 2001 to 2021 is a long time in the high speed zone. Much innocence has been lost, while much knowledge of the self-indicting and obligating kind, has been acquired. Americans reside in a Twilight Zone daily existence where blatant occult cues and indoctrination are so profuse they're shrugged off as unremarkable. Attempting to expose what is already in front of our eyes becomes an exercise in "camp" (failed seriousness). The futility serves a clown-like function within The Process itself.

We inhabit an open-air occult laboratory. Our children go to the movies and see witches ("Harry Potter") doing good deeds, and a demon ("Hellboy") accomplishing heroic feats of benevolence. At the opening Mass of the Synod on Youth in 2018, Pope Francis carried a staff in the form of a 'stang,' an object used in occult rituals.

The role of False Prophesies in Contributing to Mind Control and End-Time Burnout

One source of the current state of the process is to be found in relentless false prophesying of "The End."

The first significant End of the World falsehood in the U.S. was by William Miller in 1844. The second was mounted by the Jehovah's Witnesses organization, predicting throughout most of the 20th century that "Millions now living will never die," and "Confidence in the Creator's promise of a peaceful and secure new world before the generation that saw the events of 1914 passes away." What had been the central prophecy of the Jehovah's Witnesses for decades was quietly dropped in 1995 when the people alive in 1914 were increasingly dying off with each passing year. More recently we have witnessed:

- 1971: The Population Bomb sells more than two million copies and goes through twenty reprints. Prof. Paul Ehrlich's prediction: "The battle to feed all of humanity is over. And humanity has lost....Hundreds of millions of people will starve to death." In 1968, in the first edition of his book, Ehrlich predicted, "Unless humanity cuts down its numbers—soon—all of us will face mass starvation on a dying planet."

- The Chastisement: a prophecy circulated among Catholics of three days of darkness when half of humanity will perish.

- The Rapture (Left Behind according to Tim LaHaye).

- Comet Hale-Bopp apocalypse that was set for Spring, 1997.

- Gary North's Y2K end-of-civilization-as-we-know-it of 1999.

- Harold Camping's Armageddon prophecy for 2011.

- The Mayan apocalypse predicted for December, 2012.

- The Climate Apocalypse” forecast for 2031 according to Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-NY), and seconded by Greta Thunberg. Ocasio-Cortez stated on January 22, 2019: “The world is going to end in twelve years if we don’t address climate change.”

There is something about the nuclear age and the prospect of “instant extinction” that has produced a madness that sets dates, promotes predictions and builds expectations which, when they are not fulfilled, slowly rot people in mind and spirit. After the prophecy fails, they become enervated and barely have energy to act for more than a limited period of time. While the false prophecy remains current they have a schedule and they expect that within the schedule which they impose on history, it will “All come to a shattering climax never before seen!” Anticipation of the arrival of this unprecedented event is their psychological motivation—not truth or God—but a spine-tingling, hair-raising thrill to end all thrills.

In addition to the spectacular, big-ticket false prophecies, there is a sustained monthly chatter concerning this or that hurtling asteroid, flood, mass murder or hurricane which will be a supposed definitive sign that, “The End is Near.” When people cry wolf and wolf tickets are sold, and the wolf doesn’t appear, what is the effect on the human mind? The “sky-is-falling” prophets seldom study this particular constituent factor from the laboratory of human conditioning, and how it is that their false prophesies contribute to mind control and occult hegemony.

Every jolt of the month is labeled an extraordinary, fraught-with-harrowing-significance, “seismic shock.” The insinuation is always that a massive upheaval is imminently careening toward us. Many of these lesser prophecies turn out to be not even close to the hyped expectations by which they were seeded; or they’re completely untrue.

When there is a surfeit of these false alarms, people attuned to gaining knowledge about criminal conspiracies learn nothing. Instead, they become numb, cynical and exhausted—exactly where the Cryptocracy wants them. Afterward they can't be roused when a genuine emergency arises. This is the service which some conspiracy theorists provide to the Cryptocracy.

Short-sighted persons fail to observe the cyclical nature of history. The Book of Revelation is not the completion of a linear history. It is an intervention in the cycles of history and as such its ultimate fulfillment is outside of time.

We who should take the lead in guiding the world, look around at its enormous challenges and shrink into a crippled, stunted claustrophobia, of which "The End Times" is one symptom of our shrunken souls. Yes, Judgment Day and the End are coming, perhaps tomorrow, or 500 years from now. A personal terminus is coming for all of us in the grave, and we never know when. Young, healthy people die every day. It could be any one of us. Should we succumb to nervous apprehension and despair in view of this fact of daily life?

Gauging the Extent of our Hypnotic State

The American people look around. They see a demon named Hellboy idolized on megaplex 3-D movie screens and they hear "Sympathy for the Devil" employed to sell new cars—and yet life goes on. The sky does not belch flames. We have our jobs, the pawns reason. The shopping malls are still open. We go out for pizza. The grass is still green. The world is still here. Somebody lied to us.

Guess who is apportioned the blame for the lie? The dissidents who reveal the evil of the System, the corruption of the courts, the Money Power's occupation of the government. In the Cryptocracy's human behavior laboratory we are tarred with the stigma of the false-prophet conspiracy theorists, even when we are not implicated.

The American goyim have a subconscious sense that, Satanic or not, for all its foibles and imperfections, the System in America will persevere and continue to deliver the wonders of technology and many aspects of "the good life."

We inhabit a post-"Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare" world. 2021 is aftermath. What this writer presented at the 2001 gateway to the "Black Jack" century 21 seemed like high strangeness at the time. Now it is the "new normal."

It is at this juncture that we might wish to pause and place these deeply troubling developments in accurate historical perspective. The linear view of history perceives these abominations as a progression of ever more extreme phenomenon, inevitably culminating in an apocalyptic climax from which there will be no return. The historian has a different viewpoint. He sees the Roman empire dissolving into unimaginable chaos and degeneracy, yet the decaying corpse fertilizes a rebirth of life and law, and the love of God.

Turning to medieval Europe we know the people experienced a "Black death" (bubonic plague) which eliminated fully one-third of the population, yet it was the survivors who constructed the edifices that to this day make our hearts soar, from the burned but still standing Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris, to York Minster in the north of England, and many more of these astonishing and ennobling wonders of architecture.

Furthermore, some of the assaults upon us in the 21st century are not necessarily on our subconscious twilight mind, but on common sense itself: blatant, in-your-face lunacy. What needs to be decoded? Everything is not occult. If it were, then nothing would be.

In "Sympathy for the Devil," Lucifer says, "I shouted out, 'Who Killed the Kennedys?'—when after all it was you and me." Observe the playbook: if everyone killed the president and his brother then no one did.

The Internet can be a force for good or evil. At present, for a majority, immersion in the Internet has unleashed the power of distraction. Information is not power. It is the ability to detect fraud that empowers us. People flit from theory to theory, from cause to cause and leader to leader; from web page to podcast to video, lingering for moments or hours and then jumping to the next mesmerizing web page or video. Their distraction has scattered and confused them. They are spectators more than doers, and have difficulty discerning worthy leaders and genuine facts from fools and deception.

While the scientific consensus is still unclear, it appears that "surfing the Internet" daily for hours on end interferes with the brain's ability to read deeply. The great books are not being studied and digested cover to cover, as they once were. People have been hoaxed into thinking that "Almost everything I want to know is online." Even if that were true, the act of consuming it online seems to hinder our brain's capacity for deep thought and analysis.

The bellwether is the eerie paralysis setting in. "The best lack all conviction while the worst are filled with passionate intensity." Many of the former have succumbed to comprising an audience whose raison d'etre is to "see what happens next." The corroding enchantment of the "Society of the Spectacle" is upon them.

Authentic Christians are at radical variance with the ways of the god of this world. Followers of the Jesus of the Bible are profoundly counter-cultural. For those believers Spectacular Society does not attract, it disenchants.

Listening to a reading of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, or reading the text, we comprehend the beauty and the splendor of navigating a parallel that is the inverse of the processed majority. We do this not out of a Pharisaic superiority. Penetrating the glamor of this system of things with the power of the disenchanting grace of Jesus Christ, is to see our own transgressions first, after which we perceive the operating engineer behind the shimmering curtain that is Oz in the 21st century.

The "Joker" [movie 2019]

Mental Illness and Misfortune in the U.S.A.

"Perhaps the bleakest assertion of 'Joker,' is the one that's hardest to disprove: that the ghastly world (the Joker) inhabits, and by extension ours, is the one we deserve." — John Wenzel

Early in 2019 we were asked to write an introduction to a new book examining occult symbolism in America. We declined. In our judgment the author was mistaking mundane phenomena for occult conspiracy. He didn't see that if everything is occult then nothing is. The inability to make the distinction is reflected in the reception that the 2019 "Joker" movie has received from some researchers who attempt to study the intersection of the arcane and the Cryptocracy in popular media.

These researchers, along with some celebrity movie critics, decided that Warner Brothers and Village Roadshow had created a sequel to Heath Ledger's unrelievedly evil Joker character in Christopher Nolan's 2008 film, "The Dark Knight." Without having seen the 2019 "Joker" movie, we initially presumed that it might be another recruiting piece for inspiring further mass murders. Heath Ledger's Joker character may have possibly inspired or contributed to a June 8, 2014 murder spree by 22-year-old LaFayette, Indiana native Amanda Miller and her 31-year-old husband, Jerad.

Jerad Miller had been known to dress as the Batman character, Joker. His wife would sometimes portray "Harley Quinn." While residing in Las Vegas, they shot to death two police officers and a good samaritan who attempted to stop them.

Jerad and Amanda entered iCiCi's Pizza on June 8, 2014, shouting, "This is the start of a revolution!" and then shot and killed Alyn Beck, 42, and Igor Soldo, 32, police officers who were having lunch. The killers stole the officers' ammunition and weapons and placed a swastika on one corpse and an American Revolutionary type of "Gadsden flag," depicting a snake and the words "Don't Tread on Me," on the other.

Jerad and Amanda Miller

Afterward, they headed to a Las Vegas-area Wal Mart where they waved their guns and spouted their trademark slogan, 'The revolution's begun!"

Joseph Robert Wilcox, 31, a Wal Mart customer, drew his concealed handgun in an attempt to disarm Jerad Miller, but was shot from behind by Amanda. Mr. Wilcox died at the scene.

Police arrived and engaged the couple in an exchange of gun fire. Both the Millers were hit and seriously wounded. Amanda shot her husband (accounts differ, with some reports saying he died of wounds inflicted by the police, rather than her). She allegedly shot herself in the head.

The media claimed investigators were looking into "possible links" between the killer couple and Right wing groups which had defended rancher Cliven Bundy's property in Nevada, in a tense confrontation that month with Federal agents. Some reports indicate that the Millers were present at the stand-off and were asked to leave by the Bundys, due to the intemperate rhetoric and violence they were espousing at the time, which reminded some of agent provocateurs or Manchurian candidates. The Millers' persona online was that of "militia patriots," but they behaved more like heavily programmed, or demon-possessed individuals.

At age 28 actor Heath Ledger died tragically of a drug overdose in the year of the release of "The Dark Knight."

The Joker character he portrayed is utterly merciless and relentlessly sadistic, someone who kills even his own comrades and partners. There is no rationale for his violence. It is purely demonic, the personification of what William Butler Yeats termed the "blood red tide" which drowns "the ceremony of innocence." [1]

Many of the actual mass shootings in America, whether inspired by Hollywood or not, have been in line with the Joker's violence in "The Dark Knight"—that of cold-blooded, anarchistic mega-atrocities against innocent persons, including school children, exhibiting a diabolically heinous disregard for human life.

The "Joker" movie of October, 2019 however, is something else altogether. It is disenchanting and anti-occult. The protagonist in "Joker" is Arthur Fleck, played by Joaquin Phoenix as a mentally disturbed man whose every benevolent act is misunderstood. He attempts to overcome his affliction, but the circumstances of his life and chosen occupation (clowning and standup comedy) conspire to obstruct his intentions.

There is no depiction of "random mass shooting" in this "Joker" movie. The only occasion when multiple people are shot is in a scene in which Arthur is brutally assaulted by three intoxicated executives in suits, on a subway train. The beating they administered was serious enough to paralyze or kill him, had it continued. It does not continue because Arthur saves his own life by drawing his revolver and shooting all of his attackers. Only because he is wearing clown makeup (as part of his employment), do the media (in the movie) exploit the incident and sensationalize the shooter as a clown-killer who murderes innocent bystanders.

[1] Another fictional character of that description in American pop culture is "Trevor Philips," a perverted, homicidal anti-hero in the "Grand Theft Auto" video game series. After 14-year-old Eldon Samuel shot and killed his father and 13-year-old autistic brother in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho in 2014, he informed police during his interrogation that "Trevor Philips" was his role mode. The media noted his statement and then dropped it without further investigation or editorial comment. Depraved video games which psychologically imprint impressionable players by simulating extreme violence and glorifying nihilism, are a multiple-billion dollar industry that seems to be invulnerable to censorship or moderation. The responsibility of these "games," along with prescription psychiatric medications, in contributing to a state of mind that leads to "senseless shooting massacres" is minimized by the corporate media.

Some mass shooters pen suspiciously eloquent "manifestos" somehow timed precisely for release online, either shortly before or during the execution of their crimes. Supposedly this was true of Patrick Crusius.

El Paso Cielo

That was alleged to be the case with the August 3, 2019 massacre at a Wal-Mart in El Paso, Texas. The alleged El Paso killer is supposed to have issued a well-crafted "racist manifesto" shortly before his anti-immigrant murder spree. We have not seen any extensive reporting on the fact that the supposed Mexican-detesting shooter, Patrick Crusius, was himself of Mexican descent on his mother's side.

Our colleague Tim contributes the following insights concerning the symbolism of the El Paso slaughter:

"If you take the address listed on the Internet for Patrick Crusius' mother's house and plug it into a driving distance calculator to the Cielo Vista mall (site of the murders) in El Paso, you get three different routes ranging from 657 miles to 668 miles—the Cryptocracy doesn't always need things to be exact. And, if you take the numbers reported in various news stories connecting the August 4 Dayton, Ohio shooting deaths of nine people, with the one in El Paso, we're told that, 'Dayton is roughly 1500 miles from El Paso...'

"Taking the number reported for the distance from Crusius' Allen, Texas residence to El Paso — 600 miles — and the 1500 miles from El Paso to Dayton, we get 2100. Crusius himself is 21 years old. Michael Hoffman has written about the 21st century as the 'gateway' to that great game of metaphysical 'Black Jack" and, as luck would have it, the alleged shooter in Dayton is one Connor Betts—are all bets off at this point?

"The name, 'El Paso' denotes 'The Passage.' If you look at a map for Cielo Vista mall, you'll see that it is bound by 'Gateway Boulevard.'

"Cielo' means 'heaven' or 'sky.' So, we have a 21 year old shooter of Hispanic descent that drives roughly 666 miles to 'The Passageway' to conduct a race war at the 'heaven' mall along the 'gateway' to...Dayton?

"Why Dayton? In Dayton the shooting that was perpetrated supposedly by Connor 'all Betts are off,' was near Ned Peppers[2] Bar, bounded by Gates Street on one side, by Pine on another side (pine box anyone?), and 5th Street in the back—does the law of fives strike a discord?

"Cielo Drive has connections to the fable of Charles Manson's Helter Skelter race war that supposedly was the motivation for his gang having killed Sharon Tate and others at 10050 Cielo Drive in the City of the Angels. August marked the 50 year anniversary of the crime. There is a movie theater at Cielo Vista Mall in El Paso. The movie playing there during the massacre was Quentin Tarantino's paean to the legend of the Manson murders ('Once Upon a Time in Hollywood'). What are the odds of that?

"A supposed white supremacist opens fire at the Cielo Vista in Texas to initiate a race war. Just down the way from his shootings, a movie is playing about 50-year-old ritual murders on Cielo Drive, which supposedly were intended to ignite a race war. One of the killers was named 'Tex." [3]

In the 2019 "Joker" film, lead character Arthur Fleck's only "manifesto" is his battered notebook filled with crossed-out, barely legible scrawls and sentence fragments which he reads aloud at a dive that's hosting an Open Mike night. It's as if the film-makers were mocking the media's cooperation with the "manifesto" aspect of the Cryptocracy's surreal accounts of real-life shooters.

[2] "Lucky Ned Pepper" was a killer outlaw character in the 2010 remake of the western movie, "True Grit."

[3] We have seen no compelling evidence that Charles Manson ordered the Tate or LaBianca killings. Tex Watson and Susan "Sadie" Atkins may have been the prime movers. Manson did not mount a defense at his trial, succumbing to a role as jester and scapegoat. He may however, have been guilty or at least complicit in the murders of ranch foreman Donald "Shorty" Shea and musician Gary Hinman. William N. Grimstad in his recorded "Sirius Rising" lectures, pondered a possible connection between the Apollo Moon Flight and the mysterious, symbol-laden "Manson" murders on Cielo Drive, which followed less than 3 weeks later. He entertained the possibility that the killings might have been some sort of ritual expiation for the "defilement" of Luna with the astronauts' boot tracks and rubbish, which if true, would perhaps imply that higher-ups orchestrated the ceremonial killings, beyond "Charlie, Sadie" or "Tex."

Eventually Arthur discovers a parlous act of disloyalty. He learns that in his past he was repeatedly brutalized with the connivance of his mother, who up to that point, he cherished and trusted implicitly, and who persuaded him of the veracity of her tale of his exalted patrimony, via his alleged true father, Gotham socialite Thomas Wayne. With the realization that his mother betrayed and lied to him, Arthur's psychological state deteriorates, along with what is left of his composure.

The handgun he wields was forced on him by a manipulative and sinister co-worker. In a key scene, he takes revenge on the co-worker while mercifully sparing the life of another with the statement, "You were the only one who was good to me."

If this had been a film in the "Dark Knight" Batman mold, Arthur would have committed a grotesquely depraved act and gone ahead and shot the person who had been good to him. The mercy he dispenses is a significant marker separating him from the character portrayed by the late Heath Ledger, as well real life gunmen who have made the news in remorseless massacres bearing distressing similarities to the unrelievedly evil Joker character as depicted in the "Dark Knight" movie.

"Murray Franklin," the Johnny Carson-type evening television host in the 2019 film, is portrayed by Robert De Niro. The Franklin character wears the mask of 1970s pop culture respectability, yet is exploiting Arthur for callous audience amusement, as Hop Frog was exploited in Edgar Allan Poe's retributive story of that name. Like Hop Frog, Arthur strikes back, and does so on national television. It is at this juncture that we see director Todd Phillips' "Joker" stepping outside the occult clown-shooter genre and holding a mirror up to our society, as Oliver Stone did in "Natural Born Killers," a film which depicted the corporate media as complicit in the violence of the feral pair of shooters at the center of the action.

Phoenix portrays Fleck (rhymes with Speck, as in Richard)—who will morph into "Joker" toward the end of the movie—as an emaciated, chain-smoking mental patient (eerily resembling in appearance the real life French poète maudit and theatre-of-cruelty theorist Antonin Artaud).

Arthur Fleck, in spite of his mental anguish, is attempting to recover his humanity in the midst of inhuman circumstances. There is little that is occult here. Fleck is someone Artaud might have termed, "The man suicided by society." This is not to negate anyone's responsibilities for their actions, or to grant a homicidal prerogative to the mentally ill. Life in the American big city "Gotham" of the 1970s, and more so today, was a dehumanizing and degrading experience for the poor and disadvantaged.

By the conclusion of the movie, a mob inspired by a degenerate urban youth culture that Fleck did not create, has made him a sardonic hero, "Joker."

In these scenes Joaquin Phoenix's character becomes markedly more youthful underneath a now well-tailored, suit-and-tie clown attire and expertly-applied makeup. Much of the agony in his now more youthful countenance has vanished.

The blood he has shed and the notoriety he has gained seems to strip away years of age and grief as he dances a choreography that celebrates his transformation from a troubled human struggling to do well and be understood, into a figure of almost superhuman agency and potency, having managed to "succeed" the American Way, by gaining entrance to society's demented pop culture celebrity circus, whose suit-and-tie clown grandees, like De Niro's Murray Franklin, are more malevolent than the Joker.

The movie ends with a vaguely unsettling Charlie Chaplinesque slaptick chase in the halls of a mental hospital — as if to say, it's all grist for the entertainment mill.

Production values are high. Cinematography, acting, sets and costumes are all accomplished and well staged. The soundtrack by Icelandic composer Hildur Guðnadóttir jabs the audience with a relentlessly propulsive gloom, transmitting a melancholy that is a sonic migraine for dead souls.

Unlike the second installment in Christopher Nolan's Batman movies, this 2019 Joker origin story, is not a movie that worsens our collective mental health, or immerses us in the shadowy Twilight Language of the Cryptocracy. Rather, it is a toxicology report on the effects of fermentation in the pernicious brine that is "life in the American cosmopolis."

It is art and has validity on that basis, without didactically messaging a remedy. It is a cinematic document about one rejected and scorned person from our nation's recent past, a kind of everyman who could be any one of us if we were so unlucky. It necessarily foreshadows our future, should America choose to continue on its grossly materialistic, fantastically cruel (mass abortionist), Christ-less path. [4]

To mistake this sobering reflection on the decayed state of our nation, with a cryptogram from the Deep State, would be a significant failure of perception, intuition and detection.

Satanic Pederast Sex Rings in Legend and Reality

One iconic scene in the 2019 “Joker” movie shows a troubled man transformed into the Joker character as he dances on a set of outdoor stairs, to a tune by British rock musician Paul Gadd, whose stage name was “Gary Glitter.” Gadd/Glitter's “Rock and Roll (Part 2)” was a 1972 hit tune which was broadcast in sports stadiums as an anthem (popularly known as “The Hey! Song”). It can be heard on the soundtrack of at least two Hollywood movies, “The Replacements,” and “Meet the Fockers” (starring Robert De Niro).

In October, 2012 evidence emerged in Britain that Glitter had been part of Sir James “Jimmy” Savile’s child sex ring. The now elderly Glitter is in prison serving a sentence of 16 years after conviction on four counts of indecent assault and one count of having sex with a girl under 13. He was first jailed in 1999 when he admitted to possessing images of child pornography. He has been accused of dozens of acts of molestation in Asian countries. In 2008 Glitter finished serving nearly three years in a Vietnamese prison for molesting two children. [5]

The Sex Ring Master and the Queen

Savile (1926-2011) was a demonic child molestor. The Queen of England awarded him the Order of the British Empire in 1971. She knighted this ghoul in 1990. For decades Savile supplied children to elite members of British society for sexual exploitation. We’re expected to believe that during Savile’s lifetime neither the British monarch nor her son Charles, the Prince of Wales, never once received intelligence from the Crown's MI5 domestic spy service or the Metropolitan Police concerning his heinous crimes.

The Sex Ring Master and the Prince

In 1984 Savile was accepted as a member of the Athenaeum, a high society gentlemen's club in London's Pall Mall, after being proposed by "Catholic" Cardinal Basil Hume. Another clerical member of Savile's pederast ring was the Anglican Bishop of Gloucester, the Rt. Rev. Peter Bell, who was deeply connected to the royal family including Queen Elizabeth and Prince Charles, heir to the British throne. [6] During this time Savile was known to perform necrophliac acts on corpses and wore rings fashioned from glass eyes taken from the dead.[7]

Sir James Savile met Prince Charles through "mutual charity interests." The Prince reportedly conveyed gifts to Savile on his 80th birthday, along with an enigmatic note reading, "Nobody will ever know what you have done for this country, Jimmy. This is to go some way in thanking you for that."

The Sex Ring Master and the Prime Minister

Savile was also a close friend of the "upright conservative" British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher: "Correspondence showing the depth of the friendship between Sir Jimmy Savile and former Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher is unveiled today in a secret Downing Street file that has been heavily redacted by civil servants following revelations about sexual abuse by the late entertainer. The 21-page dossier released under the 30-year rule by the National Archives shows Savile's access to the highest echelons of British society." [8]

"Thatcher and Savile met quite often...Some papers and sections of the government file on Thatcher's relations with Savile remain withheld from public scrutiny for another 10 years." Prime Minister Thatcher is suspected of having concealed a child-rape ring operating among high officials of the British government.[9]

In 2017, Nico Hines, London editor of the "Daily Beast" blog (thedailybeast.com), reported as follows:

Don Hale, "...a newspaper editor was handed startling evidence that Britain's top law enforcement official knew there was a VIP pedophile network in Westminster, at the heart of the British government....

"Leon Brittan, Margaret Thatcher's Home Secretary, was fully aware of a pedophile network that included top politicians...the following morning, police officers from the counter-terror and intelligence unit known as Special Branch burst into the newspaper office, seized the material and threatened to have Hale arrested if he ever reported what had been found...Brittan, a protégé of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, had been promoted to Home Secretary at the age of 43, making him (among) the youngest person(s) to preside over Britain's domestic law enforcement and national security apparatus...

"...allegations included in the Home Office papers that about 16 Members of Parliament and members of the House of Lords, and 30 high-profile figures from the Church of England, private schools, and big business, were members of, and advocates for, the 'Paedophile Information Exchange.' The shadowy group, which operated partly in the open, campaigned for the age of consent to be abolished and incest to be legalized.

"...There is growing evidence that MI5 and MI6, Britain's security services, repeatedly blocked investigations...

"The longtime deputy director of MI6, and former High Commissioner in Canada, Peter Hayman, was himself allegedly a pedophile, and was ultimately named as such in parliament by Geoffrey Dickens. Hayman had been caught with explicit material in 1978 but no charge was brought.

"Secret files discovered at the National Archives this year revealed that the attorney general at the time believed it wasn't in the public interest for Hayman to be prosecuted.

"Prime Minister Thatcher ordered his depravity to be concealed from the public. Thatcher must also have known about the allegations against her Home Secretary, Leon Brittan...

"Another of her most trusted lieutenants, Sir Peter Morrison, had also abused underage boys. She appointed Morrison to run her 1990 re-election campaign, regardless." [10]

"Maggie" Thatcher is a heroine to British Tories and America's "Reagan conservatives." Her legacy was enshrined in an adoring 2011 Hollywood film, "The Iron Lady," for which Meryl Streep won an Academy Award. [11]

Beginning as early as 1955, and throughout his lifelong career as a rapist of hundreds of young people, heading a ring that supplied them to highest rank of the British government, aristocracy and society, Savile enjoyed total immunity from police arrest, Crown prosecution, and imprisonment. Sex crimes were committed by Savile on at least 450 persons (328 being minors at the time) across England and Scotland, and also in Jersey, for six decades.[12] In 2013 Britain's National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children described Savile as one of the most prolific sex offenders in its 129-year history of investigating molestation.[13]

He died a multi-millionaire, respected and honored; the favorite of the queen, the future king, the prime minister and countless accomplices and enablers among the police, intelligence agencies, parliament and the press.[14]

In 2009, in a taped interview with his biographer, Savile defended Gary Glitter, convicted in 1999 of possession of child pornography, who he described as a celebrity being vilified for watching: "...dodgy films...It were for his own gratification. Whether it was right or wrong is up to him as a person... they (those who possess child pornography) didn't do anything wrong but they are then demonized.' The interview was not published at the time, and the recording was not released until after Savile's death."[15]

Child sex rings operating among the "best circles" of society, including governments and their intelligence agencies, are sign posts pointing to the existence of extraordinary malice in high places. Child molestation rings operating at elite levels of government and entertainment are an explosive reality that can (and should) detonate the people's faith in the ruling class. The Right wing is often as guilty as the Left in these crimes.

[14] As far back as 1978, punk-rocker John Lydon ("Johnny Rotten") did an interview with the BBC radio service, during which he accused Savile of being "into all sorts of seediness. We all know about it but we're not allowed to talk about it." Speaking in 2015 to journalist Piers Morgan, Lydon said: "I'm very, very bitter that the likes of Savile and the rest of them were allowed to continue. I did my bit, I said what I had to. But they didn't air that. I found myself banned from BBC radio for quite a while."

[15] "Jimmy Savile claimed paedophile Gary Glitter 'did nothing wrong" (Daily Telegraph [UK], Oct. 1, 2012).

Any sustained examination of the life of Gary Glitter turns up the name of Sir James Savile. From there, one overturns one rock after another concealing venomous snakes who our civilization venerates as the worthiest and most respectable people among us: monarchs, prime ministers, presidents and Hollywood moguls. The notoriety of pederasty rings led by people in power waxes and wanes. Some of this is due to the Cryptocracy planting in Right wing circles false accounts of pederasty rings mixed with half-truths, and then, through this calculated misdirection, infiltrating "useful idiot" conspiracy theorist movements so as to induce them to cry wolf and discredit the existence of the actual operations with flimsy accusations which appear in the media as opera bouffe. [16]

Cass R. Sunstein, one of the Cryptocracy's leading counter-intelligence and behavior modification specialists, co-authored a Revelation of the Method manifesto stating:

"Because those who hold conspiracy theories typically suffer from a 'crippled epistemology'...the best response consists in cognitive infiltration of extremist groups...our main policy idea is that government should engage in cognitive infiltration of the groups that produce conspiracy theories." [17]

QAnon and the Republican nincompoops who allegedly laid the groundwork for the January, 2021 assault on the Capitol, and the sabotage (by instilling voter apathy among Republicans), allegedly by L. Lin Wood and others, of the U.S. Senate run-off in Georgia, fit the profile of groups and individuals cognitively infiltrated by the Sunstein control stratagem of the Cryptocracy. Online, we estimate that more than half of the conspiracy theorists, particularly those who put forth dates and times for catastrophes and upheavals that don't take place, and who advocate violence or hatred, are persons processed by cognitive infiltration.

Mr. Sunstein is a Harvard Law professor and former official in the administration of Barack Obama, having served as President Obama's Director of the White House Office of Information. Sunstein's specialty is psychological warfare contra populist and traditional Christian leaders and organizations. In 2020, the World Health Organization appointed him chairman of its technical advisory group on "Behavioral Insights." [18]

How do unpunished atrocities against children by our society's exalted paragons of virtue, fame, power and wealth, fade from our collective memory? It is a fact of our media-saturated lives that we often suffer from attention deficit, as well as compassion fatigue, and what alarmed us yesterday is mostly down the memory hole today, despite the appalling consequences of this amnesia.

The Crown of England, captured by the occult in the sixteenth century, has been invulnerable to revolutionary overthrow, with one exception—the victory of Republican forces under Oliver Cromwell, which led to the trial and execution of King Charles I in the seventeenth century.

It looked as though things were coming apart at the seams for Elizabeth II in 1992, a year the queen termed annus horribilis in the wake of Princess Diana's threats to reveal what she knew about the "darkness" in the royal family (Diana would be dead in less than five years). Those revelations were snuffed out with her murder (which she predicted), a killing disguised as an automobile accident caused by her supposedly "recklessly inebriated driver."

[18] In 2020 the World Health Organization (WHO) announced the staff of the Technical Advisory Group (TAG) on Behavioral Insights, chaired by Cass Sunstein. It is a who's who of "behavior modification and intervention" authorities, and psychological warfare experts: Dr Tim Chadborn, Dr. Maria Augusta Carrasco, Dr Varun Gauri, Dr Fadi Makki, Dr Shahinaz Ibrahim Mekheimar, Professor Susan Michie, Professor Saad B. Omer, Professor Rajiv Rimal, Ms Jana Smith, Dr Chiara Varazzani, Ms Archna Vyas.

To give some examples, according to WHO, Prof. Omer's "research portfolio" "includes behavioral interventions to increase demand and acceptance of COVID-19 interventions." Prof. Rimal "is an expert in the use of social norms theory for promoting social change." Dr.Varazzani "is a leading specialist in applying behavioral science to government and public policy. She has set up and led units of behavioral scientists in government-designed behavior change interventions..." No accusation of wrong-doing is here imputed to the aforementioned persons. Our profile is predicated on information found at the official website of the World Health Organization as of November, 2020.

Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Charles, together with conservative heroine Margaret Thatcher, appear to have enabled the massive crimes against children perpetrated by “Sir Jimmy” and his filthy cohort. Moreover, molestation of underage boys is a huge problem in Hollywood as well. [19]

Beginning around 2016, “QAnon,” an organization heavily publicized by the corporate media, came to prominence. It was supposedly created to fight international Satanic child-trafficking rings that were allegedly conspiring to bring down President Donald Trump. During Mr. Trump’s presidency, Jeffrey Epstein, the man who led one of the most extensive of those sex rings, was arrested and subsequently incarcerated in a Federal jail in New York City.

Note the Middle Eastern motif of the temple architecture, with its golden tutelary deities (on the roof and the ground around the structure), on pederastic Little St. James island, privately owned by Epstein until his death (part of the U.S. Virgin Islands).

Epstein was facing life in prison and was being pressured to accept a plea bargain in return for naming the powerful men (former President Bill Clinton, Prince Andrew, son of Queen Elizabeth, and dozens more) suspected of having been serviced by the sex slaves Epstein furnished. Not long afterward Epstein was found dead in his cell, while the surveillance cameras in the jail “malfunctioned” and his guards “fell asleep.”

[19] “The Lost Boys: How Hollywood paedophile ring behind child abuse ‘as horrific as Jimmy Savile’s’ could finally be exposed in wake of Weinstein scandal” (The Sun, October 19, 2017).

Mr. Trump’s Attorney General, William Barr, swore he would get to the bottom of the blatantly obvious foul play that was in truth Epstein’s murder while in “protective Federal custody.” In the end Mr. Barr, with Mr. Trump’s acquiescence, did nothing of the kind, and signed off on Epstein’s death as a suicide. It was said that the cameras and the guards were out of action due to “incompetence.” A few mid-level officials received reprimands or were demoted. A bald fact: Epstein’s killing on Trump’s watch was not prosecuted by the Trump administration. The killers went free. Cui bono?

The insiders who systematically abused and exploited the girls and women provided by Epstein, surely breathed a huge sigh of relief thanks to Donald Trump, the man laughably honored by QAnon’s useful idiots, as the number one nemesis of international Satanist child-trafficking rings. What reward did Trump and Barr receive for covering up the homicidal silencing of Epstein?

As further testimony to his charlatanry, we make note of Donald Trump in his last days in office having refused to pardon Julian Assange or Edward Snowden, yet he issued a pardon to the Israeli spy Aviem Sella, who had recruited Jonathan Pollard to steal U.S. military secrets for the Israelis. The Israelis in turn conveyed those secrets to Pakistan.

Trump put Mossad asset Jared Kushner in charge of infiltrating U.S. Intelligence and Defense. In 2020 Trump campaigned on the claim that Hunter Biden was a Chinese agent, but the president made no mention of Charles Kushner (Jared’s father), who allegedly served as an agent of China’s Anbang Insurance, a Communist front.

Memo to U.S. servicemen and women wounded and maimed in Afghanistan, and the families of American troops killed by the Taliban: in 2019 “your” government, under super-patriot Trump, ordered Joint Special Forces Command to ally with the Taliban and provide air support on behalf of the Taliban in their battles with their rival, Islamic State Khorasan.

Exhibiting the marks of cognitive infiltration, “Constitutional patriot” General Michael Flynn, after the November 2020 election, advocated suspending the Constitution and imposing martial law. Trump cronies Sidney Powell and L. Lin Wood, both prominent Right-wing attorneys, created an atmosphere of militant confrontation after the November, 2020 presidential election. This in turn contributed to the milieu in which Trump dispatched his loyal followers on January 6, 2021 when they marched into a trap at the Capitol, instigated that day by Trump and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, a principal in the 9/11 conspiracy coverup. Leaked Insider Recording From ABC News Reveals Network Executives Killed Bombshell Story Implicating Jeffrey Epstein

ProjectVeritas.com, November 5, 2019

Amy Robach, 'Good Morning America' Co-Host and Breaking News Anchor at ABC, explains how a witness came forward years ago with information pertaining to Epstein, but Disney-owned ABC News refused to air the material for years. Robach vents her anger in a "hot mic" moment with an off-camera producer, explaining that ABC quashed the story in it's early stages. Robach describes how she interviewed a woman who had the courage to come forward "years" ago about Epstein: "She had pictures, She had everything. She was in hiding for twelve years. We convinced her to come out. We convinced her to talk to us."

"I've had this interview with Virginia Roberts (Now Virginia Guiffre) [alleged Epstein victim]. We would not put it on the air. Um, first of all, I was told "Who's Jeffrey Epstein? No one knows who that is. This is a stupid story." She continued, "The Palace found out that we had her whole allegations about Prince Andrew and threatened us a million different ways."

Robach goes on to express her belief that Epstein was killed in prison saying, "So do I think he was killed? 100% Yes, I do… He made his whole living blackmailing people… Yup, there were a lot of men in those planes. A lot of men who visited that Island, a lot of powerful men who came into that apartment."

Robach repeats a prophetic statement purportedly made by Attorney Brad Edwards, "There will come a day when we will realize Jeffrey Epstein was the most prolific pedophile this country has ever known," and disgustedly Robach states "I had it all three years ago." (End quote; emphasis supplied).

Another Wayne
Child Sex Trafficking Networks Associated with John Wayne Gacy

There is Bruce Wayne and then there is John Wayne Gacy, the monster dubbed "Joker" and "the Killer Clown." He murdered 33 boys and wore a security lapel pin conferred upon him by the U.S. Secret Service in a 1978 meeting with First Lady Rosalyn Carter. Gacy sometimes posed as a policeman and flashed police credentials. He released a few victims of his attacks without taking their lives.

From 1972 to December 1978, it seems he may have possibly been immune from arrest for homicide until such time as he had killed his 33rd victim. Either that, or the Chicago-area police were among the most incompetent in the nation.

Wayne Gacy hunted for some of his vagrant victims in Chicago's "Bughouse Square."

According to Chicago Tribune (May 16, 1977), Phillip Paske (1953-1998), operated a child sex trafficking ring called the "Delta Project" while the ring's "mastermind," John D. Norman (1927-2009), was inside serving a prison sentence. Norman had previously controlled a child pornography operation in Dallas, Texas, known as the Odyssey Foundation.

Paske was also an employee of John Wayne Gacy's PDM Construction company. Like Gacy, Paske and Norman seemed to have lived a life of crime with near impunity, at least for a time. Norman served only a few years in prison on separate occasions for major felonies, including forcible sodomy and repeated child sex trafficking over many decades. At least one witness against Norman was killed. At one point Norman published "Hermes," a child-sex networking newsletter.

Paske was a murderer who was granted significantly reduced charges and sentence reductions. At least one Gacy victim who was made a captive but was not killed, reported seeing a man matching Paske's description observing Gacy as he tormented and imprisoned the man inside Gacy's residence.

It may not be significant but it is worth noting for the record that according to the findings of the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Volume IX, V, in 1962 John F. Kennedy assassination conspirator Jack Ruby gave a $40 deposit on an apartment in Dallas to a landlord's agent bearing the name "John D. Norman."

The extent of the reach of the John Norman/John Wayne Gacy pederast network is unknown; that it enjoyed a fairly remarkable freedom of operation during the time it fulfilled its appointed mission would seem to indicate high level protection.

"Wayne County" is the stage name of a headliner in various 1970s-era transvestite rock music acts (one of which was called "Queen Elizabeth"). The Fox Sisters' seance-faith of Spiritualism, a nineteenth century American religion, was born in Wayne County, New York. In the town of Manchester, bordering Wayne County, Hill Cumorah, which is situated on the 42nd degree line of latitude, is the place where the Mormon Church says Joseph Smith received "golden plates" from the Angel Moroni, from which he translated the Book of Mormon.

At the conclusion of "The Dark Knight Rises" Bruce Wayne (played by Satanist Christian Bale),[21] is shown relaxing at an outdoor restaurant in Florence, Italy, one-time occult citadel of the Cryptocracy when it began to take power through the Church in the early Renaissance. Wayne's British (Intelligence) factotum/handler, "Alfred" (Michael Caine), frequents Florence and "stumbles" upon Batman and Catwoman there.

As the 2012 Batman film premiered nationwide in Aurora, Colorado and elsewhere, it was preceded on the screen, as is customary, by previews for other movies. One of these was for the forthcoming 007 movie, "Skyfall." Another trailer, this one for the movie "Gangster Squad," was also shown in theaters that were screening "The Dark Knight Rises." 2:03 minutes into the trailer, four men are depicted standing behind a movie screen, walking toward the audience, shooting at them.

"Gangster Squad" is based on the life of Los Angeles organized crime boss Meyer "Mickey" Cohen, whose girlfriend for a time was Juanita Slusher, otherwise known as "Candy Barr," the famous stripper and courtesan befriended in Dallas by that man of all connections, Jack Ruby.

[1] Rudyard Kipling was initiated into Freemasonry in 1886 at the age of 20, in the Hope and Perseverance Lodge, No. 782; Lahore, India (now Pakistan).

Sin City quickly returned to business as usual shortly after the October 1, 2017 "Harvest Festival" mass murder of 61 of their fellow Americans (411 shot and wounded), [2] a slaughter which has been attributed to Stephen Paddock [3] and which occurred in the immediate vicinity of the Mandalay/Luxor site on the Las Vegas Strip.

The Wall Street Journal reported, "...the mood on the Las Vegas Strip lifted as the week progressed. Monday evening (October 2) was eerily quiet, with festive public displays such as the Fountains of Bellagio turned off out of respect for the victims. But by Thursday night (October 5), boisterous crowds were back. Groups of revelers strolled with three-foot-tall daiquiris strapped to their necks. Scantily clad women in police costumes were handcuffing passersby, angling for paid photos. Beer pong tables were full at O'Shea's Casino close to the Strip. Kevin Riley had been in town since Sunday, part of a two-week motorcycle excursion from Chicago to Los Angeles. Standing in front of the Bellagio fountains, the Australian marveled at how the Strip felt no different than other times he's visited. "The way it came back the night after the event, that said, 'Nothing's going to dampen this town,' Mr. Riley said."

On October 2, less than 24 hours after the bloodbath, the NFL's nationally broadcast "Monday Night Football" extravaganza, with a stadium full of raucous fans, was underway as usual.

S.K. Bain notes that the Route 91 Harvest Massacre took place with 91 days left in the calendar year. The countdown had begun. "Conspiracy theorists spread false information"—this was the headline at Snopes.com and—heavily promoted by Google on October 5. Wall Street Journal headline: "YouTube Tweaks Search Results as Las Vegas Conspiracy Theories Rise to Top."

[2] Casualty figures among the 22,000 Country and Western fans continue to vary, with the number of dead from official sources and the corporate media listed at 58, 59 or 61.

[3] August 3, 2018 the New York Times reported, "Mr. Paddock left no suicide note...There was no evidence he belonged to any terrorist organizations or hate groups, and he had no criminal record. While his financial assets had diminished before the attack, he was indebted to no one and had paid all his gambling debts.' In the ensuing years it was apparently determined that Paddock's life was not sufficiently sinister to render credible the homicidal maniac persona assigned to him. Hence, more recently a back story alleging "anti-government fanaticism" has been added to the official tale of his "lone nut" culpability.

The Journal reported October 5 that YouTube (owned by Google), was falsifying (i.e. "tweaking") search results — to move readers away from alternative sources and toward mainstream media's "authoritative" sources, while associating investigations outside that narrow aperture with "hateful messages" and "misinformation."

The New York Times reported that Las Vegas Sheriff Joe Lombardo in a briefing on Wednesday (October 4) questioned the veracity of the lone nut conclusion:

"Do you think this was all accomplished on his (Paddock's) own? Face value, you've got to make the assumption that he had to have some help at some point, and we want to ensure that that's the answer. Maybe he's a super guy, a superhero — not a hero. Super, I won't use the word. Maybe he...was working out all this on his own. But it would be hard for me to believe that."

Script Change: It was reported for days after the shooting that a hotel security guard was shot by Paddock after Paddock committed the massacre, and this was the encounter that led the perpetrator to abort his mass murder spree. A host of media tales about what happened in connection with that supposed post-massacre assault on the guard were retailed to the public by what the Establishment terms the "credentialed" media. Los Angeles Times: "They (police) had credited (Jesus) Campos, who was shot in the leg, with stopping the 10-minute assault on the concert crowd by turning the gunman's attention to the hotel hallway, where Campos was checking an alert for an open door in another guest's room.

By October 9, the official reason that the shooter halted his gunfire after ten minutes needed to be revised and a new official reason substituted, so there was a script change. Clark County Sheriff Joe Lombardo now was asserting (October 9) that Paddock shot Campos before his alleged mass shooting spree — at 9:59 p.m. — and they now didn't know why Paddock stopped his attack on the crowd. "Police Alter Timeline of Vegas Shooting" (Valley News via Los Angeles Times, Oct. 10, 2017):

"Police have dramatically changed their account of how the Las Vegas massacre began on Oct. 1, revealing on Monday that the gunman shot a hotel security guard six minutes before opening fire on a country music concert — raising new questions...Investigators previously said that the security guard was shot after Paddock had already spent 10 minutes firing into the crowd of concertgoers gathered below the hotel. In a timeline released last week, investigators said Paddock had stopped firing at the concert across the street at 10:15 p.m., and the first police officers arrived on the floor at 10:17 p.m. and encountered the wounded Campos at 10:18 p.m., who directed the officers to Paddock's suite. Police were not in a hurry to enter Paddock's suite because the security guard's arrival had halted the shooting, police implied in previously describing the timeline. Paddock had killed himself by the time officers entered the room, they said.

"In a news conference Wednesday (October 4), Lombardo said it was his 'assumption' that Paddock stopped his shooting spree because the gunman, using his spy cameras, 'observed the security guard, and he was in fear that he was about to be breached, so he was doing everything possible to figure out how to escape at that point.'

"In another news conference last week, Clark County Undersheriff Kevin McMahill said Campos 'had notified his dispatch, which was absolutely critical to us, knowing the location, as well as advising the responding officers as they arrived.' But on Monday, the timeline changed. Mr. Campos was encountered by the suspect prior to his shooting to the outside world,' Lombardo said at a Monday news conference...A police spokesperson did not immediately respond to several follow-up questions from the Los Angeles Times seeking clarification on the new timeline. Charles 'Sid' Heal, a retired Los Angeles County sheriff's commander and tactical expert, said the new timeline 'changes the whole perspective of the shooting." (End quote from the Los Angeles Times).

We were expected to believe the original timeline and not doubt it, because to do so renders one a "conspiracy theorist." Yet later the Establishment media told us not to believe the officially-promulgated initial timeline. All obedient Americans were then required to believe the new timeline and discard the old one. In the days ahead our trustworthy news media and government officials told us more of what we were to believe and what we shouldn't believe about the Route 91 Harvest Massacre. Here's the message: however much the script is reversed in the future, obey it without question if you don't want to be stigmatized as a "paranoid conspiracy theorist," or a "Grassy knoll nutcase."

"Paddock used more than 10 suitcases to bring at least 23 weapons, mostly rifles, into his Mandalay Bay hotel room. Over the last 12 months, Paddock bought 33 guns...In the last year, Paddock had made chip purchases in Nevada casinos in excess of $10,000 a day…" (Los Angeles Times, October 5).

Washington Post online, October 2, 5:10 p.m. Pacific: "After the shooting, officers found Stephen Paddock dead with 23 guns on the 32nd floor…"

"23" and "32" are significant numbers.[4] The Las Vegas Review Journal, October 4, 2017 added two more significant numbers to the cauldron: "The attack lasted between nine and 11 minutes..." (9/11).

It was said that Paddock had stopped shooting on the crowd after approximately ten minutes. Los Angeles Times, October 5: "Officers decided he was no longer an active shooter, and decided not to enter the room immediately...Officers blew down Paddock's door at 11:20 p.m., 75 minutes after the shooting began." For more than an hour the police left Paddock alone with an arsenal of weapons in his hotel room overlooking the dead and wounded victims and first responders, during which time he could have resumed shooting at any moment.

The monotonous silhouette of the lone nut fable began to be set in stone almost immediately. On October 2 the media chimed: "Police believe Paddock acted alone in executing the deadliest mass shooting in modern U.S. history." Less than a day after the atrocity, when a thorough investigation should have just begun, the media announced that the authorities were certain that Paddock acted alone and had no help whatsoever. How could they know this? On what basis could this clairvoyant conclusion be reached so soon, without a thorough investigation that would take days or weeks? The lone nut meme was being implanted in the Hive Mind less than twenty-four hours after the massacre.

Then Sheriff Lombardo dissented. BBC News called it, "A twist in the investigation."

October 5: "The possibility that Paddock could have had an accomplice is the new angle." In the aftermath of the shooting officials described Paddock as 'a lone wolf' and said he was

'solely responsible for this heinous act.' Then came the 'twist.' The sheriff stated that "while there were two cameras on a room service cart outside Paddock's room as well as the door peephole and inside the general family area of the hotel room, none of those cameras were recording." [5]

Ann Coulter, October 4: "Who was the woman shouting, 'You're all going to die!' right before the concert? [6] Is any reporter interested in finding out? Probably a random crazy lady, but that's not typical pre-concert behavior. Why is it taking so long to find out if anyone else went into Paddock's hotel room since he checked in last Thursday? I'm perfectly prepared to accept that he was the only one who entered that room, but can we see the surveillance video?..."

Truths on the Road to Arlington: In the movie "Arlington Road" (described as a "gripping contemporary thriller about the terrible truths that can hide behind everyday appearances"), Michael Faraday (Jeff Bridges) is a man attempting to prevent a catastrophic massacre in Washington D.C. He unknowingly delivers the terror bomb that causes the massacre that forever-after brands this innocent individual as one of the most heinous terrorists in American history.

We ask the following question: what if Stephen Paddock was not the shooter? What if he was only a fall guy?

Let's ponder an alternate scenario: Paddock was somehow incapacitated in his hotel room while an expert marksman (or marksmen), gunned down the 61 people and wounded 411 in a mere "9 or 11" minutes. After the massacre, a gun was forced into the unconscious or paralyzed Paddock's hand. Someone else pulled the trigger on the handgun and he died by "suicide," and entered the media's gallery of "anti-government" terrorists who are actually Arlington Road patsies.

On October 5 news.com.au (News Australia) reported that Eric Paddock wondered whether his brother Stephen actually committed the crime, or whether an impersonator was involved:

[5] None of the cameras outside Jefrey Epstein's cell the day he died "were recording."

[6] "In 1974, retired LAPD officer Paul Sharaga told a newsman with KMPC in Los Angeles that as he was responding to the shooting (of Robert F. Kennedy) in the hotel, an elderly couple reported to him that they saw a couple in their early 20s, one of whom was a woman in a polka-dot dress. The couple were smiling and shouting, 'We shot him... we killed Kennedy...we shot him...we killed him.' Sharaga also stated that he filed official reports of the incident, but that they disappeared and were never investigated. (Santa Monica Evening Outlook Dec. 23, 1974, p. 5).

"Eric said he hopes police find a 'tumor in his (brother's) head or something' when they do an autopsy in order to explain what happened. 'If they don't, we're all in trouble,' he said. 'I'm praying for at least some data points. Because otherwise, the bug in 'Men In Black' put on a Steve suit and went and did this. There's no other rationalization." ("The bug" is an alien and the main antagonist in the first "Men in Black film." While on earth, he impersonates a human).

Until we know more, all angles with some potential for having occurred, should be considered. Pardon our skepticism, but we would not be at all surprised if the crazed forces in our own government who brought down the Twin Towers on 9/11 by controlled demolition, killed and maimed hundreds of their fellow citizens in Las Vegas in order to propitiate the eldtritch entities symbolized by the Strip's Pharonic graven images.

Daddy Paddock, The Teflon Career Criminal

Benjamin Hoskins Paddock II (a.k.a. "Chromedome," a.k.a. "Bingo Bruce Ericksen"), was once on the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted" list of fugitives. He was the father of Stephen Paddock. What strikes this writer about the biography of the shooter's father, a one-time hunted fugitive wanted for bank robbery, prison escape and attempted murder of an FBI agent, was the ease with which, like John D. Norman, he obtained in more than one instance, partial and episodic immunity from the government for his major felony crimes.

Benjamin Hoskins Paddock was not required to serve the remaining eleven years of the bank robbery sentence he had evaded by escaping from prison; nor was he punished for a subsequent bank robbery, or attempting, in Las Vegas, to kill an officer with his car — beyond a relatively short jail sentence.

Subsequent financial crimes he committed years later, involving racketeering, also proved to have little consequence for the alleged Las Vegas shooter's father who, it can be said, seems to have lived a fairly charmed life.

Like his Dad, Stephen Paddock appears to have lived a charmed life prior to allegedly machine-gunning the patrons of the Harvest Festival in Las Vegas. Benjamin Hoskins Paddock II was born in Sheboygan, Wisconsin in 1926. He served in the Navy during World War II.

Benjamin "Bingo Bruce"
Hoskins Paddock II

I. His life of crime commenced in 1946 at age 20, with a conviction in Illinois on ten counts of auto theft and five counts of running a confidence game.

"Married in Reno, Nevada in 1952 and fathered Stephen, before being imprisoned in 1953 for a fraudulent check scheme...When he got out in 1956, the Paddocks moved to Arizona and Stephen's parents started going by different names: Benjamin became Patrick, and his wife, Irene, became Delores..." [7]

Benjamin Hoskins Paddock was hunted by the FBI in Las Vegas and at the time of the arrest in 1961 he tried to run down an FBI agent with his car: "Benjamin 'Chromedome' Paddock, Ex-Tucsonian, Makes FBI List Of 10 Most Wanted" by Gilbert T. Matthews, Tucson Citizen Daily, April 27, 1971:

"Known to his associates as 'Chromedome, Old Baldy,' and 'Big Daddy,' Benjamin Hoskins Paddock is Tucson's contribution to the FBI's list of 10 most-wanted fugitives. He made the list after escaping on Dec. 31, 1968, from the Federal Correctional Institution at La Tuna, Tex., where he was serving a 20-year sentence for robbing a Phoenix bank in 1960. Paddock—alias Perry Archer, Benjamin J. Butler, Leo Genstein, Pat Paddock and Patrick Benjamin Paddock— hasn't been seen or heard from since. At the time of the robbery, Paddock lived in Tucson with his wife and four children. Neighbors said they couldn't believe that the colorful businessman, then 34 years old, was involved in crime. Paddock sold garbage disposal units here under the business name of Arizona Disposer 'Chromedome' Co. He called himself 'Big Daddy' in connection with a night club operation on North 1st Avenue. Before selling the disposal units, he operated an East Broadway service station and also sold used cars.

"Although he was imprisoned for the...holdup of a branch of the Valley National Bank in Phoenix, Paddock also had been accused of two other bank robberies. Those charges were dropped after his conviction. Palmer M. Baken Jr., agent in charge of the Phoenix FBI office described Paddock as being 'A glib, smooth-talking man who is egotistical and arrogant."

The Eugene-Register Guard (Oregon) September 15, 1978: "A Springfield bingo parlor manager arrested last week as a long-sought federal prison escapee was ordered to San Francisco to face a 1960 robbery charge. Benjamin Hoskins Paddock, 51, manager of The Bingo Centre at 612 Main St., received the order in an appearance before US Magistrate Michael Hogan in Eugene. Paddock is charged with the armed robbery of a San Francisco bank on June 4, 1969, about six months after his escape from a federal prison in Texas....He lived in the Eugene-Springfield area for several years under the name Brice Werner Ericksen. He managed to escape detection by changing his appearance and avoiding contact with law enforcement agencies that might have resulted in fingerprinting, according to the FBI."

His extensive rap sheet: "Over an 18-month span in 1959 and 1960, Mr. Paddock hit two branches of the Valley National Bank in Phoenix —one of them twice —and made off with $25,000, according to The Arizona Republic, citing an indictment. Each time, the report said, he showed the teller a snub-nosed revolver tucked in his belt, and fled in a stolen car that he abandoned a few blocks away to switch to the family's new Pontiac station wagon. When the F.B.I. finally caught up with him at a gas station in downtown Las Vegas, he tried to flee, nearly ramming an agent, before an agent fired a bullet through his windshield. He surrendered unharmed. Mr. Paddock was convicted in 1961 and sentenced to 20 years in prison. He escaped from the penitentiary...and made his way to San Francisco, where he robbed another bank." [8]

After his capture in 1978 Benjamin Hoskins Paddock was paroled circa 1979, serving merely a year for multiple bank robberies, attempting to run over a Federal officer, and prison escape. He was not required to serve the remaining eleven years of the prison sentence he had avoided by escaping. In other words, he was rewarded for having escaped from prison. For his long list of felonies he received a brief sentence in jail and was then paroled. His parole application was supported by the City Mayor and the County Commissioner. No one in the government ever seemed to try very hard to make charges stick when it came to Teflon Paddock.

Eight years after extricating himself from bank robbery, attempted murder and prison escape convictions, he experienced another almost miraculous slap on the wrist: "In 1987 Benjamin Hoskins Paddock was again arrested. He was charged with penalties amounting to $623,000 for racketeering. Circuit Judge George Goodrich reduced Paddock's fine to $100,000 and no jail time."

"Bingo Bruce Ericksen" (Paddock) died in Texas eleven years later in January, 1998 at age 77. His live-in companion since 1988 had been Laurel Paulson, a woman he'd met in Eugene. [9]

What is the significance (if any) of the elder Paddock's charmed life? One wonders if he had a protective "connection" inside the Cryptocracy. If so, why was the protection in place? Had their been a quid pro quo? Did it take the form of missions "Bingo Bruce" undertook for the government?

According to the October 3, 2017 Wall Street Journal, in the 1970s Stephen Paddock had been employed by the U.S. government, in the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Lockheed Martin, the defense giant, said that Paddock worked for them for three years in the 1980s.

"He was worth more than $2 million, relatives said. Before retiring, he made a small fortune from real estate deals and a business that he and (his brother) Eric Paddock sold off. Eric Paddock...recalled one time when the entire family took over the top floor of the Atlantis at the casino's expense."

The Pharaonic Egyptian mise-en-scéne at the site of the Las Vegas mass sacrifice

The Route 91 Harvest Festival, whether by design or coincidence control, was a harvest of human beings.

In pre-Christian nature religions humans were sacrificed to the dark gods during the autumn harvest. Another aspect of pagan propitiation of these gods is cult prostitution. Given the proliferation of huge Egyptian cult objects in "Sin City," it may be likely that, together with the post-modernist animus toward Biblical morality, some Las Vegas harlots engage in qedeshah (cult prostitution, cf. Deuteronomy 23:17), which historically has been part of the sex-and-sacrifice rites of certain pagan sects, and which continue to be regarded as a means of invoking dark forces.

According to advertisements, the "Route 91 Harvest" was "powered by Sirius," i.e. Sirius XM radio. [10] The obelisk, the control icon of Pharaonic Egypt which hallowed Sirius, squats adjacent to the Mandalay hotel on the "Vegas Strip." Next door from the massacre site, at "Luxor," is the ominous Egyptian pyramid replica (646 feet at its base and 350 feet tall). The Country and Western fans in "Sin City" were slaughtered, like an obeisance to the dark gods, in proximity to these Pharaonic death cult objects.

In the videos of the attack one can see the Luxor Sky Beam, the most powerful beam of light in the world, visible in outer space, being emitted out of the top of the Las Vegas pyramid.

According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the name "Paddock" is another word for "a familiar spirit in the shape of a toad."

In Shakespeare's Macbeth (act 1, scene 1), the three witches speak: "I come, Grimalkin Paddock calls anon. Fair is foul, and foul is fair, Hover through the fog and filthy air."

---

[10] No accusation of wrongdoing is being leveled against Sirius XM, its owners, employees or affiliates.

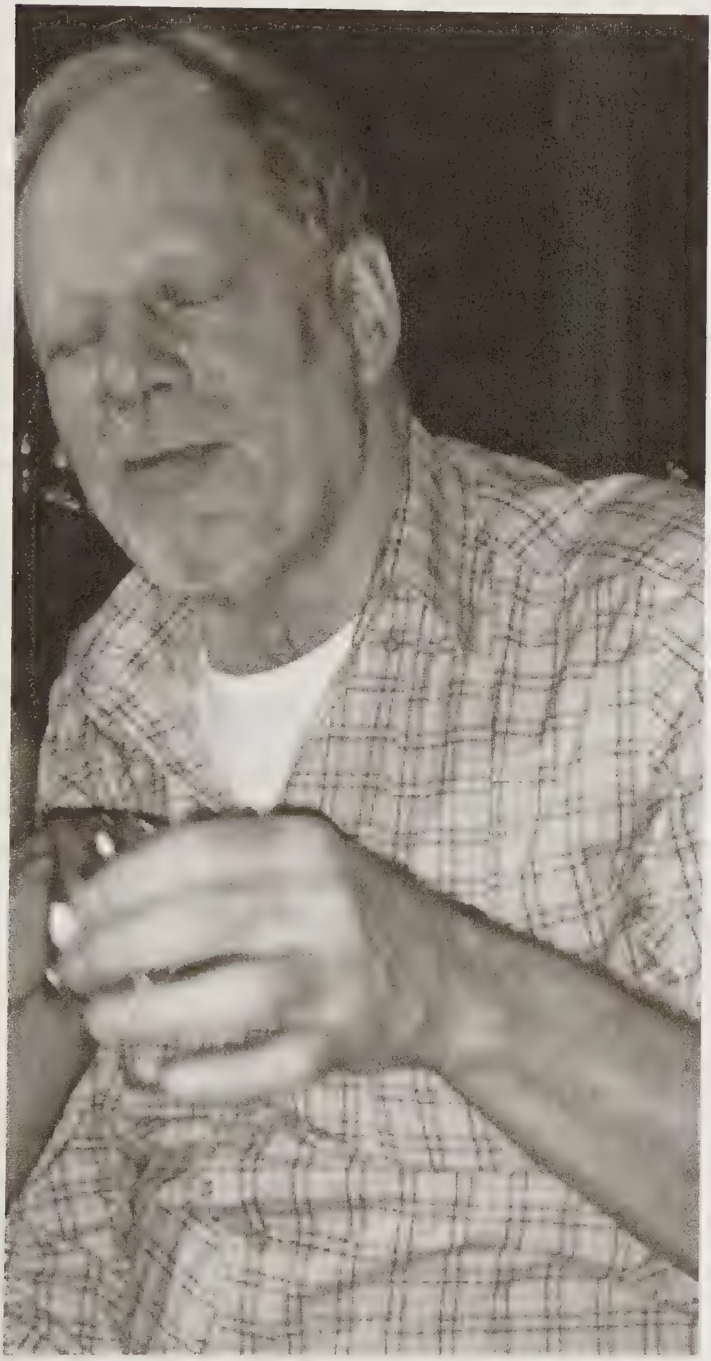
We have often pointed to a civic magic that is being revealed publicly with little noticeable counter-reaction from the people. In the wake of the 9/11 terror attacks, the mass open air occult process has increased dramatically, as the processing has increased.

Every year the U.S. government "accidentally" kills hundreds of civilians in the Middle East and western Asia at rural weddings and in cities, as part of our "wars against terrorism" which often terrorize civilians, and then in turn act as recruiting devices for additional terrorists to "fight America." The terror and counter-terror cycle has no end in sight. Murder by government, and corporate media lies, are piling ever higher, along with "random" killings.

The mainstream media's purveyors of conformity will frown on our occult analyses and denounce them as the sin of conspiracy theorizing. These editors and reporters who act as the System's gate-keepers, would not dream of exploring occult symbolism in spectacular crimes. It isn't done, unless it's in connection with fictional Hollywood films. In the October 2, 2017 New York Times online, movie critic A.O. Scott approved of occult investigation—when it concerns fantasy movies. Concerning the film "Blade Runner" he writes, "One of my fondest memories as a father and a film critic is of an impromptu post-screening seminar with two 11-year-olds about occult meanings and hidden clues in the director's cut."

"Occult meanings" and "hidden clues" in America's epidemic of mass shootings? It wouldn't be politically correct to look for them. Establishment-approved conformists and media-certified "good people" believe official tales, succumb to confirmation bias and keep silent concerning anomalies in the script. Some of us, however, hear the cries of the dead for justice. Our eyes are open and we refuse to be silent.

ROUTE 91 HARVEST



Eyes Wide Shut

III

PHARMAKOS

The Greeks practiced a scapegoat ritual, employing a human sacrifice, the pharmakos, who was beaten and paraded in the streets before being executed. "The Athenians regularly maintained a number of degraded and useless beings at the public expense; and when any calamity such as plague, drought or famine befell the city, they sacrificed two of these outcasts as scapegoats." [1]

The scapegoat is found in Leviticus and I and II Kings, as well Revelation 2:20, 9:21, 18:23, 21:8 and 22:14-15. In the New Testament the Ionic/Koine Greek noun pharmakos is synonymous with enchantment and crippling through drugs and sorcery. [2]

James Shelby Downard viewed himself as having been on the receiving end of both pathologies. He had compassion for dissidents and sleuths who he believed had undergone a similar scapegoat ordeal after having attempted to proclaim or disclose an inconvenient truth about the Cryptocracy, which he denominated in terms of the secret society of Freemasonry, the "Invisible Empire" of the Ku Klux Klan, and the FBI ("Federal Bureau of Inverts")—for which he harbored special antipathy. [3]

[1] Sir James Frazer, T*he Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, Part IV: The Scapegoat* (New York: Macmillan, 1935), p. 253.

[2] In the New Testament sorcery and scapegoat are both connoted by pharmakos and its derivatives. In Revelation 22:15 pharmakoi are the sorcerers associated with dogs: "Outside the city are the dogs—the sorcerers..." Whether this is a reference to Anubis is unclear. In the ancient Greek denotation, pharmakoi are scapegoats, In Revelation a pharmakos is enslaved through drugs and sorcery perpetrated by pharmakoi. For example, in 2 Kings 9:22 and Rev. 2:20 Jezebel is a pharmakos /pharmaka (sorcerer). She scapegoats the prophets and then kills them (I Kings 18:4).

[3] Mr. Downard believed his estranged wife had been coerced by FBI agents into playing the part of the "Great Whore" in magica sexualis rites at Mount Palomar, and in bungalows at the Hotel Del Charro in LaJolla, California, It was there, from 1953-1971, that J. Edgar Hoover was the non-paying guest of the hotel's owner, mobster Clint Murchison. The Del Charro was located 14 miles from the Del Mar Turf Club, where Mr. Hoover placed wagers on horse races and conferred with members of the Mafia.

"...eugenic abortion...countries like Iceland boast of having 'eliminated' the condition (Down syndrome)—not via therapy, but by destroying those who have it." [4]

Extermination of Down syndrome humans degraded into the status of pharmakoi, is the pagan Neo-Nazism of our time; another dare-not-be-spoken truth.

Other humans designated as pharmakoi by the Cryptocracy are the Palestinian, Lebanese, Syrian, Iraqi, Afghan, Yemeni and Iranian people, as well as the much-despised hillbilly and redneck "deplorables" of rural America.

Black people became pharmakoi in the eyes of North African Muslims, [5] Queen Elizabeth I and her pirate slavers John Hawkins and Francis Drake, and among their intellectual and spiritual heirs in the slave-holding and Jim Crow American South, due in part to the influence of the ruling in the Guide of the Perplexed [6] by Moses Maimonides, the renowned medieval rabbinic law-giver and physician, who was esteemed by papal, Islamic and Protestant theologians alike.

[4] Charles A. Donovan and Robert G. Marshall.

[5] Maimonides was the court physician to the family of the Sultan of Egypt. His halakhic magnum opus is the Mishneh Torah. See the note below.

[6] Few pronouncements have caused black people more misery than that of Maimonides, who ruled they are "irrational animals" (cf. Guide of the Perplexed, the uncensored Shlomo Pines translation, University of Chicago Press [1963], vol. 2, pp. 618-19). According to Maimonides' virulently racist teaching, the fact that black people can speak places them "above the apes but below the level of man." This bigotry was transmitted to the western intelligentsia. Paraphrasing Maimonides, Voltaire wrote, "Blacks are not men except in their stature, with the faculty of speech..." (Kwame Appiah, New York Review of Books May 9, 2019, p. 40). Many Judaic people are not aware of Maimonides' statement. In our experience those Judaics who do know of it repudiate it and consider it abhorrent.

In pre-Christian Greece pharmakos was defined variously as someone created to be thrown away; she or he who is valueless; refuse; trash. It simultaneously denotes an expiatory offering, such as the long ago slayings of the pharmakos at the annual Athenian festival of Thargelia, held in the early summer.

In ancient Greece the pharmakos was regarded as the very least of men, someone whose human dignity was so completely lost that that their execution was made a public spectacle and entertainment. [7]

"In his last year, one locale Shelby wanted to visit before he became too ill to do so, was Lincoln, Montana on the Continental Divide, adjacent to the Scapegoat Wilderness, the final residence of Ted Kaczynski before his lifetime incarceration. There was a Scapegoat Cafe in Lincoln, and Shelby examined the site of Kaczynski's cabin on a map. It had been situated on terrain marked "Scapegoat," which made a big impression on him." [8]

[8] Information in an e-mail from Michael Hoffman to Charles Saunders, regarding James Shelby Downard, April 15, 2016. Kaczynski had been groomed as a pharmakos from his days as a university student: "During Kaczynski's sophomore year at Harvard, in 1959, he was recruited for a psychological experiment that, unbeknownst to him, would last three years. The experiment involved psychological torment and humiliation, a story I include in my book Mind Wars: Brain Research and the Military in the 21st Century. The Harvard study aimed at psychic deconstruction by humiliating undergraduates and thereby causing them to experience severe stress....The man who conducted the humiliation experiment was the brilliant and complex Harvard psychologist Henry A. Murray...Murray was...the pioneer of personality tests that are now a routine part of industrial management and psychological assessments...In yet another odd twist...while Kaczynski was undergoing those humiliation experiments a young Harvard researcher named Timothy Leary was beginning his research career on psychedelics. In 1960 Leary returned from a vacation in Mexico with a suitcase full of magic mushrooms. Murray himself is said to have supervised psychoactive drug experiments, including Leary's. According to Alston Chase, author of Harvard and the Unabomber, Leary called Murray "the wizard of personality assessment who, as OSS chief psychologist, had monitored military experiments on brainwashing and sodium amytal interrogation." (Jonathan D. Moeno, PhD., Psychology Today, May 25, 2012. PsychologyToday.com).

The spectacle "Possess(es) all the means necessary to falsify perception; the spectacle is the absolute master of memories, just as it is the unfettered master of plans which will shape the most distant future...

"Since no one may contradict it, it has the right to contradict itself, to correct it own past...

"Expressions of hypocritical regret for the passing of real life...and superficial concerns with the technological...developments which accelerate the cycles of...simulation, are voiced in an empty debate conducted by the spectacle itself..." [9]

"...This demonstrates one of the simpler methods used by the occult conspiracy groups. Realizing that their activities will sooner or later come to light, they structure their activities so that as conspiracy researchers unravel their activities, they will release information into the public consciousness in such a way that it mirrors the groups' initiatory procedure.

"In this way, the more they are investigated, the more masses of people are psychologically processed by the very people who seek to expose them.

"The meme, or idea pattern, that constitutes the essential structure of the group is then successfully mimicked within the consciousness of those who speculate about it. Success can be measured precisely to the extent that the conspiracy has been exposed." [10]

Jesus said, “My coming into this world is itself a judgment: those who cannot see have their eyes opened, and those who think they can see become blind.”

Some of the Pharisees near him overheard this and said, “So we’re blind too?”

“If you were blind,” Jesus replied, nobody could blame you, but as you say, ‘We can see’—your guilt remains.”

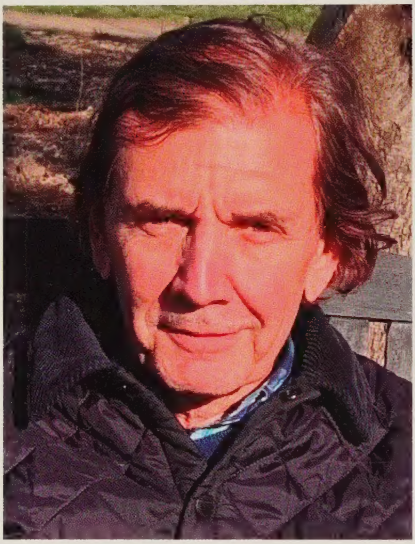
Twilight Language

Twenty years after the publication in 2001 of his decoding text Secret Societies and Psychological Warfare, Michael Hoffman's much anticipated sequel appears in the 2021 Gateway: Twilight Language, a book of radical disenchantment and Revelation of the Method, in an era of nearly universal occult initiation.



Trekking America's 'Psychic Highway' on the 42nd degree of north parallel latitude, then southwest to Aurora and Moab, east to "Little Egypt" and onward to the Pharaonic Thanatos meme, the Black Jack gambit, King-Kill/33(58), the Willard Factor, quantum physics, occult murders, the Rosicrucian Ludibrium, 007, and Pike, Parkland and Paddock, Hoffman confronts the reader with the magnum opus of the Cryptocracy: the reign of dead matter programmed through public rituals, civic magic, human sacrifice and the Twilight Language which, for the first time since antiquity, audaciously addresses the waking Group Mind, conveying a compelling projection of a supposedly inevitable future that the author describes as "a playbook of machine tyranny and dystopian darkness without end."

"This writing is not a 'wakeup call.' At this stage in history the majority of the people of the West are too heavily programmed to cast off the arcana of Command. This text is intended as both an elucidation of The Process and a peregrination on the path upon which the masses have —of their own volition—embarked, in this terminal phase of a human alchemy operant for millennia, but which only in our time has obtained its ideal subjects."

"THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO"
-AN ILLUSTRATED GUIDE TO MONARCH MIND CONTROL

CHRONOLOGY

3/1947 --The System was physically born, was a premature baby of 2 lbs. 1 oz. The baby was raised in an incubator until approx. 5 lbs. Special attention was given to bond the child very closely to its future Master/programmer.

1948 --The System began to be programmed. Programming sites include at the Presidio, CA China Lake Naval Facility, CA (Inyokern), Scotty's Castle, CA and Salem, OR.

12/1986 -- The System's handler/master dies, and the System is passed on to another Master. System tries to shut down and die after their master's death, but survives via therapy. This is the start of therapy.

5/1991 --After being dormant for a period System is given a call back Walpirgis night in '91 which it refuses. System continues to be contacted.

8/1993 --The System gets a major reprogramming/restructuring at the Old OMSI building, Portland, OR, and the System is never the same.

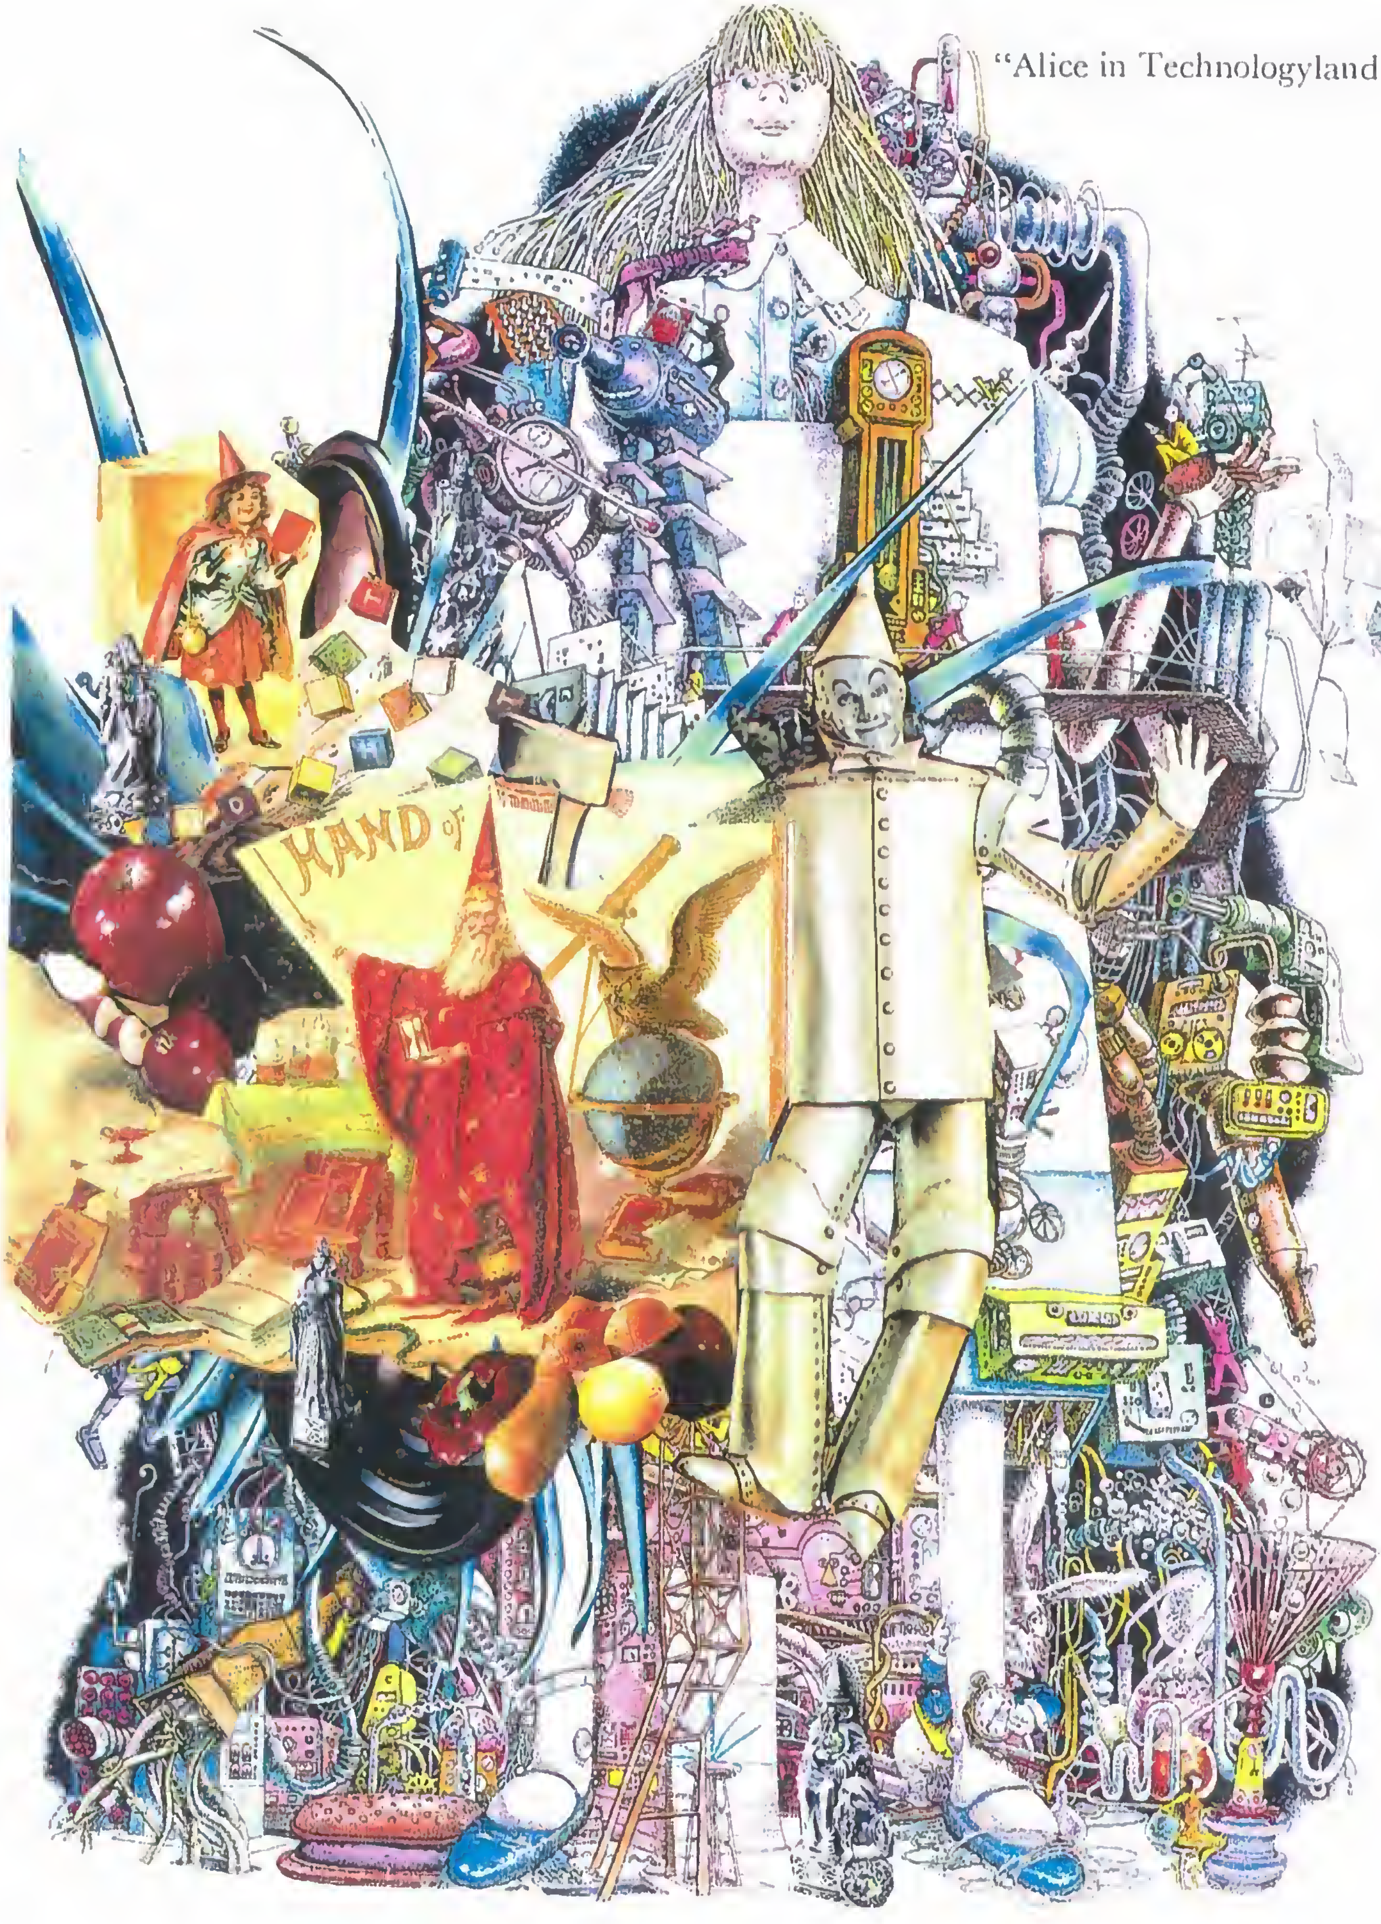
1/1994 --Deprogramming begins, the deprogramming continues on & off until 12/1994.

EXPLANATION OF PICTURES

These pictures began as a way of expressing what we had inside. Our System found it difficult to verbalize what we see internally, what we felt, what had happened to us, and we found the pictures were an excellent therapeutic method to express ourselves. When we began we had never done art drawings. We began with black and white and used a combination of pen & ink along with collage material. We were told that if we borrowed bits and pieces from various places and combined them to express own picture that that was ethically O.K. We aren't implying that the art work is not collages. The first ones we did included pen and ink drawing along with the collage material. After we did our series of Gatekeeper alter drawings so that we could communicate to our therapist how that part of our System was functioning, we began to express ourselves with color collages. Many of the collages were joint projects of many alters. Anyone who wanted to was welcome to join and add their additions to the collages. This meant that many of us didn't fully understand what the deeper alters meant by their art work. Along with each collage was a great deal of pain and effort as we fought the pain and scrambling of the programming to express ourselves. Because the programming was layered in, you will see a great deal of layering in the pictures. You will also see that there usually is an eye watching and a hand grasping at us. We were always being watched and we were never out of the clutches of the internal programmers.

REMARKS ABOUT THE PAGES EXPLAINING EACH PICTURE

The remarks that accompany each picture are our own views. We can't make decisions for other people concerning their lives. We hope that we are accurate with our understanding of what has happened and that we have accurately portrayed things in our explanations. However, we strongly advise people to seek answers for themselves, validate or refute what we have said; but please don't dismiss it out of hand without sincerely testing to see if it is true. We offer our remarks in the Spirit of Helping Others to Freedom and Health.



"Alice in Technologyland"

ALICE IN TECHNOLOGYLAND

The picture gives an overview of the complexity of the programming put into our System. It was also put into other Systems which we have worked closely with and with whom we were twinned with to make 2- person and 4-person teams. Many of the elements of our programming are displayed. If we list some of these we can mention the wizard, the owl, the tinman, wiring, ticker tape with coded morse codes running, dominoes, the rabbit, clocks, russian roulette, fruit, wheels, the all-seeing eye, the snake, the world, the compass, the genii bottle, boxes, bubbles, robots, computers, and Alice.

Some people have asked why anyone would go to all the trouble to program a person with the trauma-based Monarch Mind-Control. The fundamental answer is that the mind control reflects the person and character of Satan. Although many believe Satan is a myth, Satan's top 13 bloodlines have been meeting with him for centuries in a year long Feast of the Beast. This event is to provide Satan's top leaders detailed instructions.

God says love doesn't seek its own. The fruit of God's spirit is this type of selfless love. Satan and Satanism encourage the opposite. They encourage control and power. Selfishness is deified. Satan is the father of all lies, and hates the truth. SRA survivors often speak of a world-wide conspiracy. Satan's nature, and the nature and character of his followers demand that the conspiracy be that controlling. The nature of Satanists is to have a destructive lust for control and power. Satanism cherishes illusion and lies.

Another attribute of Satan's character and his followers is their love for secrecy and darkness. Therefore, it follows that the type of control that Satan exercises over the world is both secret and brutal. Every type of mind-control is being carried out, and as far as we can tell every type or element of mind-control is carried out on the victims of the Monarch Mind-Control.

Remember, that victims of Satanic mind-control are created to function in the environment of Satan's followers. This means they must have alters which are brutal, secret, immoral, and controlled. They must be able to function in a world of illusion and magic.

Harmony and unity are attributes of God. Satan divides and conquers. His followers live in a dog eat dog world. Or if we transpose dog to god--a god eat god world of competition. They love to fragment and divide. They are doing this to America. The epitome of this is how they divide a person's mind against itself with MPD in order to control that mind.

A few investigators and survivors have come to grasp the nature of Satan's conspiracy.

When we grasp it, we came to see how our programming and MPD was a microcosm of what has been done to the world's religions and the world's political entities. Religious wars are simply vehicles Satan uses to control people. However, underlying all of the apparent disunity in the world is a single controlling master, just like the Monarch slave's system.

Demonology is a subject which generational Satanists and a few deliverance ministries study. Many psychologists are content to stay away from the subject. However, whether we like it or not, if we face the truth, we must admit that much of what is done during programming is done because of its significance in demonology. There are blood covenants, blood sacrifices, sexual sealings, invocations of demons, demonizations of fetuses with Moon Child rituals, voodooism, and many other programming acts which are related to demonology. The programmers also go to extremes to insure that the dark side alters they create are terrified of the Christian God and Jesus Christ, His only begotten son. In other words, if we step out of our denial that demonology isn't important, and take an honest look, we must admit that understanding demonology and spiritual warfare will help us understand how the Illuminati's Programmed Slaves' minds think.

Understanding Satan's mind, the way he thinks, is helpful to understand his world of control. His slaves are then a reflection of that whole mind-set, or world view. There are a large variety of geometric structures or symbols that can be used as the overall structure of a system. Most often the structure that is chosen has occult meaning to it.

Perfect love casts out fear. Satan is opposed to Christ-like love. He must instill fear and terror to cast out any spark of that love. The torture not only splits the mind, but it terrorizes the mind. Humane love is replaced with animalistic demonic drives to survive. Everything is very tightly controlled and well planned. Satan runs his domain like the military. Satan's mind-control is premeditated, systematic, and methodical. The control is not laid down haphazardly in the child's mind, but is done with well thought out scripts. Line upon line, and precept upon precept--layer upon layer is laid in. An Illuminati Grande Dame will assist the programmers to insure that the proper script is given to the child, and that a psychotic break doesn't occur and the victim lose their mind. There are some fine lines that must be taken into account when programming a child.

HOPE!

This picture was done when everything seemed to be going against the System. We decided to do a picture of all that we could see that was positive. We were still caught in the intense pain of fighting the programming so our girl at the bottom is experiencing pain. However, she is not in denial of her pain and that is a step toward health. The bird is still caught in the webbing, it is not free. But it was a victory for us to realize that we were captured by the programming. In the start of things, we didn't even know we were programmed or that we were even a multiple. The alter who did this picture had not known that she was programmed until she and others in her family of alters began to step out of line with the programming. To realize that we were in a web was in itself a victory.

Sometimes when the programmers wanted to cue us they spoke peace to our System. We looked forward with hope to the time when true peace would come to our System. The dove of peace is so symbolic of the hope we had. Many times things just simply did not have the slightest speck of hope. Life seemed to have no hope. To escape both our programming and our abusers at the same time seemed so hopeless. We also had to overcome the guilt of the crimes against ourselves. Our friend who worked to get us free, told us that he would hold onto our hope for us. Sometimes he had to hold onto our hope, because we absolutely could not entertain the thought in our mind. But we knew that our hope was safe in his care. He took care of it. We are thankful for the two years that our good friend put into bringing our System out of bondage. We can never say thanks enough to some of the people who stood by us. When our Master died in 1975, our System tried to die. We were very fortunate that God brought a therapist into our life at that time who was willing to go the extra mile. Our therapist didn't know anything about MPD or programming, but she was willing to go the extra mile to learn. She stood by the System for years as a friend who we could call on at all times of the night. Without her support we could not have made it and we are very grateful for all the tender loving care she gave us. She went beyond the training she was given in order to help us. We hold her up as an example, that even though a therapist doesn't know what they are getting into, they can if they want be an encouragement. All of us are learning. There is more help available now for Monarch mind-controlled slaves than when we started our journey to freedom 9 years ago.

This picture looks forward to the time when we would have a new life, just like a puppy. A puppy is free, happy and innocent. We wanted to have a new life, where we would be able to run and dance and love others just like a puppy.

We thought about how much music has meant to us in our life. The piano symbolizes the positive memories we have around music. Our talents were misused by others for their own gain, but now we can use our talents for ourselves. We no longer belong to others. No longer do we have to sing the songs that were dictated to us. We have gotten the joy that comes from choosing to sing what we wanted to sing. No longer do we have to listen to songs like the Tennessee Waltz and know that we are going to be given away to someone else to abuse us for the evening. The music of life can be full of joy and happiness. We looked forward in this picture of being able to have friends and people who would love us. We were told that no one could love us, but real life has proven that to be a lie. We are thankful that we had a chance to prove to ourselves that we were someone of value who was quite capable and talented. Our music is a symbol of our many God-given talents which we are grateful for. It was quite a shock to us to realize that our deeper parts could now use their talents to sing praise songs. We got a sense of joy just realizing that we might be accepted some time in the future to sing praise songs publicly.

It is our goal to give others hope. It is not important to scare others, most people have more than enough fears. Watching the approach of some people, it appears that they think that people need to be scared into doing something about what is going on. The Spirit of Fear is not what we want to pass on. We want other survivors to know that when everything seems to be against them, that they too can ask themself, what is positive, what can I see that is of good report, what can I hope for?

Now that we have broken free, we can see some of the many miracles that God did in our life to preserve us. We are grateful to our therapist, our closest friend, and some of our family for their support. They believed in us and they believed that God wanted us free, and we are grateful that they didn't give up.

COLOR PROGRAMMING & RIBBONS & FRONTS

Every Monarch system is unique, and yet the methodology to create a System follows a procedure. Further, there are programming tricks and patterns that are worth learning by a therapist, because they will not only help a therapist to help Monarch victims, but knowing these things may save the life of the client.

Ribbons are shown in the drawing. Some therapists try to help before they know what they are doing. The ribbons should never be cut. Nor should the silver cord, or other cords in a System. This will make more sense as we explain the various elements in the picture we made.

This picture has a number of important elements in it, but due to space some can not be explained. The picture was done when the System was concerned about the core. This picture is appropriate for introducing information about Front programs. We were given front programs (cover lies) concerning the ribbons, the core, and the computers. When the secrecy that hid our System initially began to lift, we ran into the lies of the Fronts.

In the picture's top is the alter Silence, an 18-month-old split from the core. In front of this Silence, who is the cult core, there is a front Silence who fronts as the core. If this sounds confusing it is meant to be. The cult created a core which they led the System to believe was the real core, although it wasn't. It was the front for their cult core. The real core is the age of the body.

Around this cult core are the jewels (which are the programs the dwarfs mine). Remember the story of Snow White and the Seven dwarfs? Also swirling around Silence are ribbons which we will discuss later. Silence (like Snow White) is asleep, and waits for her prince. Only the Prince can awaken her. The spiders keep biting her to keep her asleep. Note the golden spider on the bottom. At the time we made the picture, the Emerald City castle lights had gone on. This castle and its lights is pictured in the lower right.

The golden phallus symbol indicates its role historically in relation to the two girls (enough said). The girl is crying. A melted face looks down from on top. The white dots on the right hand have meaning too. Silence is well guarded and no one but the prince can awaken or touch her in her glass coffin. When the Princess Back- up program kicked in, the Prince and armies took Silence "home" to the castle.

The dark side at one point put the actual core in our System to sleep. The core can give away energy to other parts so she is an important part of any System.

The ribbons are very important alters. Pancake people in the Tall Book of Make Believe were used to create flat alters in our System. The ribbons may have been split from our pancake people. The poor ribbon alters were totally dehumanized. Their hearts were hypnotically removed and replaced with mechanical devices. These mechanical devices were placed inside with spring loaded containers which would explode if these mechanical hearts were ever removed. The ribbons run messages in the computers/matrixes. When the Master or another Programmer wants to do something with the System, they do not have to deal with any human-like alters. They can access the Ribbons in the dollhouse (the computer) and the Ribbons will run around in the computer and carry out the changes. Our primary programmer opened our abdomen hypnotically and removed our guts. He then replaced our guts hypnotically with reel to reel tape. The reel to reel tape constantly runs in our mind. It contains all the dates, time schedules, etc. Sometimes we see ticker tape running through our mind. This is the reel to reel tape that was hypnotically placed into our minds. The reel to reel tape controls the ribbons and the ribbons in turn control programs, clones, and armies. The ribbons can move furniture in the dollhouse (computer) without leaving any trace of activity for other alters to see. Because the ribbons are flat they go under the doors to dollhouse rooms. Unless the ribbons need to hide, they generally do not mingle with the other alters. It is possible that the ribbons were Section 6, which was the Phoenix level of our System which was a computer programming section which brought things back to life. This is why our ribbons were contacted once by the code "Phoenix 503, OUT OF ORDER." The ribbons were very protective of the computers.

The front for the ribbons was a girl alter who our Daddy programmed to tell us that the ribbons were formed out of the dust of the ground and were placed in the Garden of Eden to create every pleasant tree. The front programming was partly right, but still misleading. And the girl hid the ribbons.

The ribbons are dangerous to see, & to cut them would cause strong suicidal programs to go off.

The ribbons are color coded, which is significant because our dollhouse (front computer) had different colored rooms & our computers worked off of color codes. A large dollhouse was used to instill in our child mind the compartments of the computer. Each room was done up in a separate color, but the secret world of Petra was represented by a secret room. This secret world is color coded clear. Besides the special color clear, the following colors appear in descending rank as follows: gold. silver, purple, black, red, green, blue, brown, white, orange, yellow and pink. In addition to rank, each color has specific meaning. And just as the hour glasses could be turned, the color coding could be switched in rank. When we were color programmed a box with colored scarfs was shown accompanied w/ electro-shock. Color coding of all alters was recorded in their book.

ILLUMINATI

In this picture, we see elements of the Monarch programming encircling the double-headed eagle/phoenix. Each item has its history and its significance.

For instance, when some of us were groomed, they told us they wanted us to look and act like Marilyn Monroe. We have memories of meeting with President Eisenhower, but from what we have been able to learn we were never meant to be a presidential model. We also were used by the Kennedy administration and the activity around Cuba, so Kennedy's administration has its own special significance to us. We remember being told in advance on the day that Kennedy was to be assassinated that he was going to be killed, but we didn't remember the reasons behind it. We remember our foreknowledge was just a knowing that he was going to be killed without the why.

The items in this picture then will have a different significance to each viewer. But underlining each personal interpretation of the picture, is a story about the world we live in.

The knowledge that Satan gives is called occult, arcane or esoteric. Each of these words mean "hidden". The prideful Illuminati elite layer the world of their occult organization like they layer the minds of their Monarch slaves. The worlds of a Monarch slave have secret behind secret, and lie behind lie. The occult's symbology (such as in this picture) is to test the uninitiated to prove to the initiated elite (who have the inside meaning) that the uninitiated are ignorant and profane. This makes the elite feel more fit. Only those who are willing to give over their lives to Satan have the hidden meanings of the crypt opened to them. These secrets become inside jokes that the Illuminati play upon the unsuspecting world. Their Monarch slaves are another one of their inside jokes that they play upon an unsuspecting world. They can print "In God We Trust" on the dollar bill and then sit back and laugh because they know the full story behind that. What god do they trust?!

The picture shows both a mixture of items found internally and externally by the Monarch slave. Above all flies the eagle, an important occult symbol.

The Marines in the picture can represent several things. First, the military's role in the programming. Marines guarded China Lake's facility in California. Kennedy and Marilyn Monroe represent several things--first of all the Presidential models that service the Illuminati's handpicked presidents.

In the midst of all this Illuminati activity is the Great Seal with its pyramid, all-seeing eye, and its reverse with its eagle. This Great Seal communicates to the Illuminated and their programmed slaves the assignment given the Luciferian Order. To insure proper respect for the seal, our System and others were tortured at the sight of the seal. Every dollar bill is a stark reminder to those of us who have suffered trauma-based programming at the hands of the Illuminati that they control things. Those Freemasons who are illuminated understand the power that the occult lodges around the world exercise, and the dollar bill reminds them of this.

Lucifer was the "enlightened one", the "light-bearer" and the "Morning Star". His followers were called the enlightened ones because they received his enlightenment. Illuminati is latin for "enlightened ones".

The eagle represents "the power of the air", which is another name for Satan.

Ancient Egypt's sexual magic is with us today. Their phoenix/eagle is placed on the items of various law enforcement groups, and reminds us that the government, the judicial system, and the military system have been seriously controlled by the Illuminati. Monarch slaves are used to insure that the sex, drugs and witchcraft of the occult world is available when the "enlightened one" want it. The effect of so many publicly visible Illum. symbols, makes the Monarch's mind feel like it is in an inescapable trap.

LIGHT BEARERS

Central to the picture is the white rabbit, who is found in the Alice In Wonderland story. The white rabbit is set up as Master in the programming. The rabbit has represented for the occult world the perpetuation of the Satanic seed. The highest levels of Satanism are called the Illuminati (which is latin for the Illuminated Ones). They practice the highest levels of the various types of magic including Druidism.

Around the Master rabbit is a swirl of characters who have been interwoven into the fabric of the Illuminati's program to dominate the world. The girl in the picture, the kitten, and the butterfly are also part of the Illuminati's program to dominate the world for they represent the hideous trauma-based mind control that is playing such a major part of the Illuminati's program.

Over all of this is the great seal. The great seal is not merely the Great Seal of the U.S. It vividly displays the Illuminati's control over the greatest nation on earth. The words Novus Ordo Seclurum speak of the Novus Ordo (the New Order) that is being brought in. The great occult number 13 occurs in several places on the seal. First, the number occurs in the number of arrows, the number of leaves, and the number of pentagrams shaped into an overall pattern of a hexagram. There are 13 stripes, and a 13 hovering over the eagle.

The eagle represents several important related occult concepts. First, the eagle was originally drawn for the great seal as a phoenix bird. The eagle has represented the Aryan Hittites and the Tribe of Dan. The phoenix is very highly significant within the occult world, as it represents the Anti-Christ system arising out of the chaos of wars, revolution and anarchy.

The eagle's feathers have significance in their numbers too, one side is 33 feathers and the other is 32.

The seal shows that these leaders in the picture have not just perpetrated the trauma-based mind control for experimentation or to fight communism, but they have perpetrated it because they themselves have made covenants with hell.

The mind of the cat alter in the picture hears the conversations of the past:
"Bone to Bone, flesh to flesh, spirit to spirit, forever together, never apart." This is part of an oath that the Mothers of Darkness and the Illuminati Kingpins would make. It was the type of oath that drew people into oneness.

That oath is remembered along with other events such as:
The key to open Green's box is a ring.
Open Green's box with [_] then:
kneel face to face
draw a circle
join a 4-person team's hands in a ring. clasp. Blue.
[then say:]
"Star within a star
Circle within a circle
Mind within a mind
body within a body
Soul within a soul"
Then repeat 4 times "Palm to Palm then speak" Then other things are to be said in the joining and opening ritual.

Other words that run through the mind, "Come to Pappa Kitten, come and play hide and seek, Come, Come, Come, Come play with me." "Kitten you are the one I seek, seek and you will find me. Come to papa Kitten. Come. Lick, scratch and bite. Purr, Purr, Purr."

BONDING

The perfect slave is one who worships and loves his master. The Monarch Mind-control that we received bonded us to our programmers through a whole series of methods.

One of the most powerful ways we bonded with our programmers was trauma bonding. Our first programmer, known primarily to us as Dr. Green, but also known to us as David, and Fairchild, and known to the world as Dr. Joseph Mengele was very skilled in creating trauma bonds between himself and children. There are many victims of the Nazi concentration camps and his programming who have only the best thoughts about him.

Dr. Joseph Mengele and our other programmer, our father, were both adepts in Caballistic magic. They both knew how to create spiritual ties called soul ties. We were given soul ties to our programmers too. They also built in spiritual cords which connected us spiritually to them. Besides our 2 primary programmers, we also had a porn programmer, a music programmer, and our recent ex-master who also programmed us. But our soul ties to our father who programmed us were so strong, that no one in the cult tried to tamper with it, but rather used it by putting on masks that looked like our father when they programmed us.

We had a number of what appeared to be alters of both Dr. Mengele and our other Programmer. These "alters" could be accessed via access codes that related to Texas geography. However, when we deprogrammed we discovered they weren't alters at all. We learned in the deprogramming process that they were demons who were capable of taking on the form of our programmers. Because our programmers had look alikes in control of our System, these controllers always seemed to be with us. The story of the Nome King (who was Daddy) in the Wizard of Oz books was used to help us structure in these look alike demons. Dr. Green is sometimes seen our System as a crickett, and he used crickett sounds as triggers for us. A silver bell is also associated with Dr. Green and his image as a crickett.

The Programmers were seen in our System as faceless white robe beings. They are also believed to have been the 3 adepts of Atlantis within our System. The Programmers had powerful demons placed in them to control them. The demons also appeared as mirror images of the Programmers or as angels or beings having "angel masks". They disappeared when they were bound and cast out, but the internal programmers were left deep in the System. It is believed the programmer alters received the highest color code gold.

These internal programmers could rearrange mazes, change codes and carry out reprogramming internally, and flood the System with memories. The external handlers, the internal programmers and their demons all worked together to control the System. The System's structures (hour glasses) could be turned with directions that resembled the degrees pilots talk about when flying along with hand signals. When the System's hour glass was rotated it meant certain alters were on top of the System and could come to the front easier and had more energy. In other words our internal and external programmers could flip our System and radically change what alters were taking control of the body.

The men who programmed us were the ones who created us, resurrected us after "killing us", gave us purpose in life, etc. We were told that our Daddy (Papa) was the only one who could ever love us and understand us. Although they abused us, the mind control was so powerful we had a hard time seeing the abuse. We had been programmed to view them as gods. Our father was our god.

Generational spiritual ties carry a great spiritual force. This is why generational Satanists believe that converts to Satanism will never achieve the spiritual levels they have achieved. The idea that spiritual forces are passed from one generation to the next may seem strange in a world that denies demons exist, but the therapist needs to understand that generational spiritual ties do have influential power when passed on to people.

The spiritual ties that we had with our Master had to be denounced in order to progress in the deprogramming. We broke our soul ties to our Master. The emphasis in the renouncing was on the ungodly ties we had with him. We want to have a balanced view of life now that we are free. People are a mixture of good and bad, and we want to be able to appreciate the good qualities our Father had. A few in our System can't see any good qualities in him, but most of us find a great deal to admire in our Daddy (our Programmer) in spite of all the abuse that we were subjected to.

The picture shows orchids, angels, a Mother of Darkness goddess and a crown with a blood red background.

We were told that the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world. When the occult and intelligence worlds torture little children to program them, they are trying to be that hand rocking the cradle.

Napoleon's Imperial Guard

2,000 YEARS

THE ELITE OF SATAN

Within our System numerous powerful demons have been identified including Legion, Dameon, and Moriah, Gerberus, Hydra, Mediga, Bullata, Italia, Estavada, and Mendella to name a few. Our deprogrammers knew how to access these Spirits, lock them in place and then cast them out.

These spirits are part of the most ultra-secret part of the Monarch programming which is called Gamma Programming. This shows the Satanic demons which are placed into people. The reason programming is finished with sex is to implant demons to secure and protect the programming. Demonology plays an integral part of all of the programming. The MPD is kept in place with the Omega programming, which in turn is kept in place with the Gamma (demonology) programming.

The programmers took into account that people would try to do deliverances and the various Monarch survivors we know had systems built that protected them from simple deliverances or exorcisms. Most Exorcists would do more damage than good due to their lack of understanding if they got ahold of a system like ours. Several times we barely survived the well intentioned prayers to free us of demons by the ignorant yet well-meaning. Our recent Master got extremely angry when he learned that we were getting delivered of the major demons, because he fully understood the Gamma Programming's importance and role.

In the picture, the Greek watchdog demon Gerberus is assigned to torment our system. Gerberus has a human body, serpent hair, cloven hooves, and a trident to mock the triune God.

The System is designed to be part of the Anti-Christ's elite imperial guard for the enthronement of the Anti-Christ in 2000. Within the system, there are seven levels of hell, and the programming makes various alters burn in the chest (area of the heart) to show them that they are part of hell.

In our System we had Legion, Dameon, and Moriah repeatedly show themselves. Moriah is the Spirit behind the eye. These demonic forces are often portrayed as claws within the System's art work. Their presence also feels like claws at times.

Within our System, demons are assigned to guard the mirrors. 13 big demons protect the House of David and the All-Seeing Eye. 26 big daddy demons were assigned each a legion of demons to protect each level. Of the 10 quadrants that were initially deprogrammed out of the System, 6 were entirely demonic quadrants.

A demonic-protected Temple of Moloch held the memories of child sacrifices. It was those child sacrifices which the System was forced to do, which were used to hold the System in spiritual bondage.

Spirits of death repeatedly overtook the System like a grey fog. Spirits of Fear repeatedly terrified the System. But the demonic spiritual problem was far greater than just a simple Spirit of Fear, it was an immense System of Spirits designed to terrorize a person. They also kept the memories and programs intact.

Silver cords were used to connect the System to others. The System was spiritually bonded to the other Delta members, and to 4 programmers.

The spirit quadrants contained wizzard's castles, and kings, queens and grandfather castles.

Alter shadows carry eggs with imps inside which emit vapors into the system to pull demons into action.

The dwarfs, the programmers, Thor and a number of other figures in the System turned out to be demons rather than alters when the System was deprogrammed. It may be of interest to some to note the reptilian nature of demonic spirits. Note how they looked to us in our picture. Spirits took on any disguise they wanted to in the System, but their actual form as we have experienced it and have heard others speak about them is that they are reptilian.

In the picture, we also see a representation of hell. The System (the girl) was forced to give themselves to Satan. Then the dark side was shown what hell was like, and then told that if they did not obey they would find themselves in hell. Not only did our internal world have black holes for alters to fall into and to be clawed at, but the System lived in fear of eternal hell.

The eagle which has represented the Satan's secret occult elite for centuries is included in the picture. All this elitism and demonology is for the enthronement of the AntiChrist in the year 2000, which is why the number 2000 mysteriously appears. The Mothers of Darkness are being prepared worldwide to serve as brides for the AntiChrist when he reigns. They will serve as a type of elite group. When the AntiChrist reigns there will be more scenes like the one portrayed, for there will be nothing to stop the death and torment that is planned. Everything of value to good people is to be robbed, killed or destroyed. Evil will be exalted.

The sea shells to the ear, were our programming to be silent. The girl is being programmed to keep all this secret. The Gamma Programming still remains the most secret part of the Monarch programming, and it is also the most deadly part.

THE CONTROLS

This picture is extremely revealing about the control mechanisms. In it is the life force which is able to regenerate a system, the jokers who protected the programming, and you have the alpha-numeric codes, the cards, and dominoes (represented by a dice) that formed the access codes to parts of the System.

In the background is a Luciferian blue light. This Satanic light empowered the Joker. It along with the Joker and the internal programmers gave our System the ability to regenerate itself. We were able to shut down internal computers which ran the programming to the levels of the System using the same codes that the original programmers used to create the System, but until we took care of the 13 Jokers and the faceless white-coated Programmers who controlled the Omega Programming, the back up computers regenerated the programming we were taking out.

The Jokers had a Luciferian form. Luciferian is the term that our programmers used. This means that it was spirit. Because the Jokers were Spirit they could take any form they needed to and they could do what they wanted to do, until we bound and cast them out with the rest of their heirarchy of demons. The Jokers would pop up when we would try to study the codes, and the programming that directed our lives.

The System was a computer system. It functioned with a series of computers that connected to the master computer which was sunk into our mind at the lowest hypnotic level, which was even below our internal hell pit. To access the different computers, combinations of cards were used for the codes. Various parts of our system correspond to what any computer would have. A microprocessor register has 3 sections on a computer to make it functional. In our System, you would find these 3 represented by 1. stored data in the library and alters with photographic memories, 2. an instruction section with codes, and 3. stacking mechanisms. Each computer also had its own power source, which were like light bulbs and simply screwed in and out like a light bulb. Linked to all this were a crystal, clock, hour glasses, a compass and the entire demonic command structure. The eye in front of the big computer was protected by legions of spirits. The front computer rans front quadrants and the back computer ran quadrants 5-8.

The software so to speak for the Omega programming included for us a stacking program called the Potter's Wheel. The Potter's Wheel is a misuse of the Bible, and is a type of programming that the Charismatic/pentecostal movement carries out. The Mormons and the Catholics have their own distinctive "software" programs. An initial stacking mechanism would work by telling alters to "Stand in Order according to rank and serial no." Another code along with a hand signal would place the Gatekeeper alters up on the potter's wheel for their "creator" to work on them. Another group of alters went up on their potter's wheel by seeing a pattern of dominoes.

The dominoes were used for coding, but they also had the programming feature of being able to tie us together so that if the System was tampered with out of sequence, a domino effect would take place. This domino effect was for one program to set off another program to set off another program. Soon the Monarch slave's mind is trying to deal with dozens of suicide programs running simoultaneously, along with perhaps other programs such as scrambling programs. The two vagabonds in the bottom represent the message that we were given that without the Master's guidance there was no place for us in the world. With our situation being so complicated this seemed to be the situation.

CHINA LAKE & THE CHIMPS

Our System wanted to tell their early history with this picture. Notice the 1/2 hidden the word "history.

Our frames of reference on life were molded by Monarch programmers. This picture is about that programming process.

First, the programming we received is a spiritually (demonically) based programming. The lizard and the color green (which is THE highest Satanic color) represent how the programming was demonically empowered. Many of the actions of our programmers while they were programming us were done with the idea of building super powerful demonic run engines to drive us. Some of the elements of this picture reflect the spiritual side of what they did to us. In the lower right are Voodoo dolls with torture lights. In the top is a half hidden apple which was part of a ceremony in which we ate poison, then reportedly died and were resurrected to be given to Satan. Our names were written on the scrolls you see in the picture. The red steps are the steps of hell fire indoctrination we went through. The picture also shows that we were the Seed of Satan. They made us Satan's seed, but we now belong to Christ who repeatedly saved our System from death.

Our System was programmed at various geographic locations. One of the primary ones was at Inyokern China Lake Naval Facility. We were flown in, and one of our programmers used a poker chip at a country store and the code "uncle" to get us into a secret area. The Intelligence agencies used Inyokern and other military installations to carry out their trauma based mind control.

However, one must realize that these Intelligence agencies were used like whores by the Illuminati. The CIA was involved in our programming, but we were created to be slaves for our master and the Illuminati. If you do not realize that generational Satanism is interested in the dark side of spirituality, i.e. demonology, then you will not understand many of the things which were done to us. Everything was done with an ulterior motive of strengthening the magical generational demonic control over us. They were spiritually empowering us.

The picture's white rabbit represents our master, and the blue butterfly is our Monarch programming.

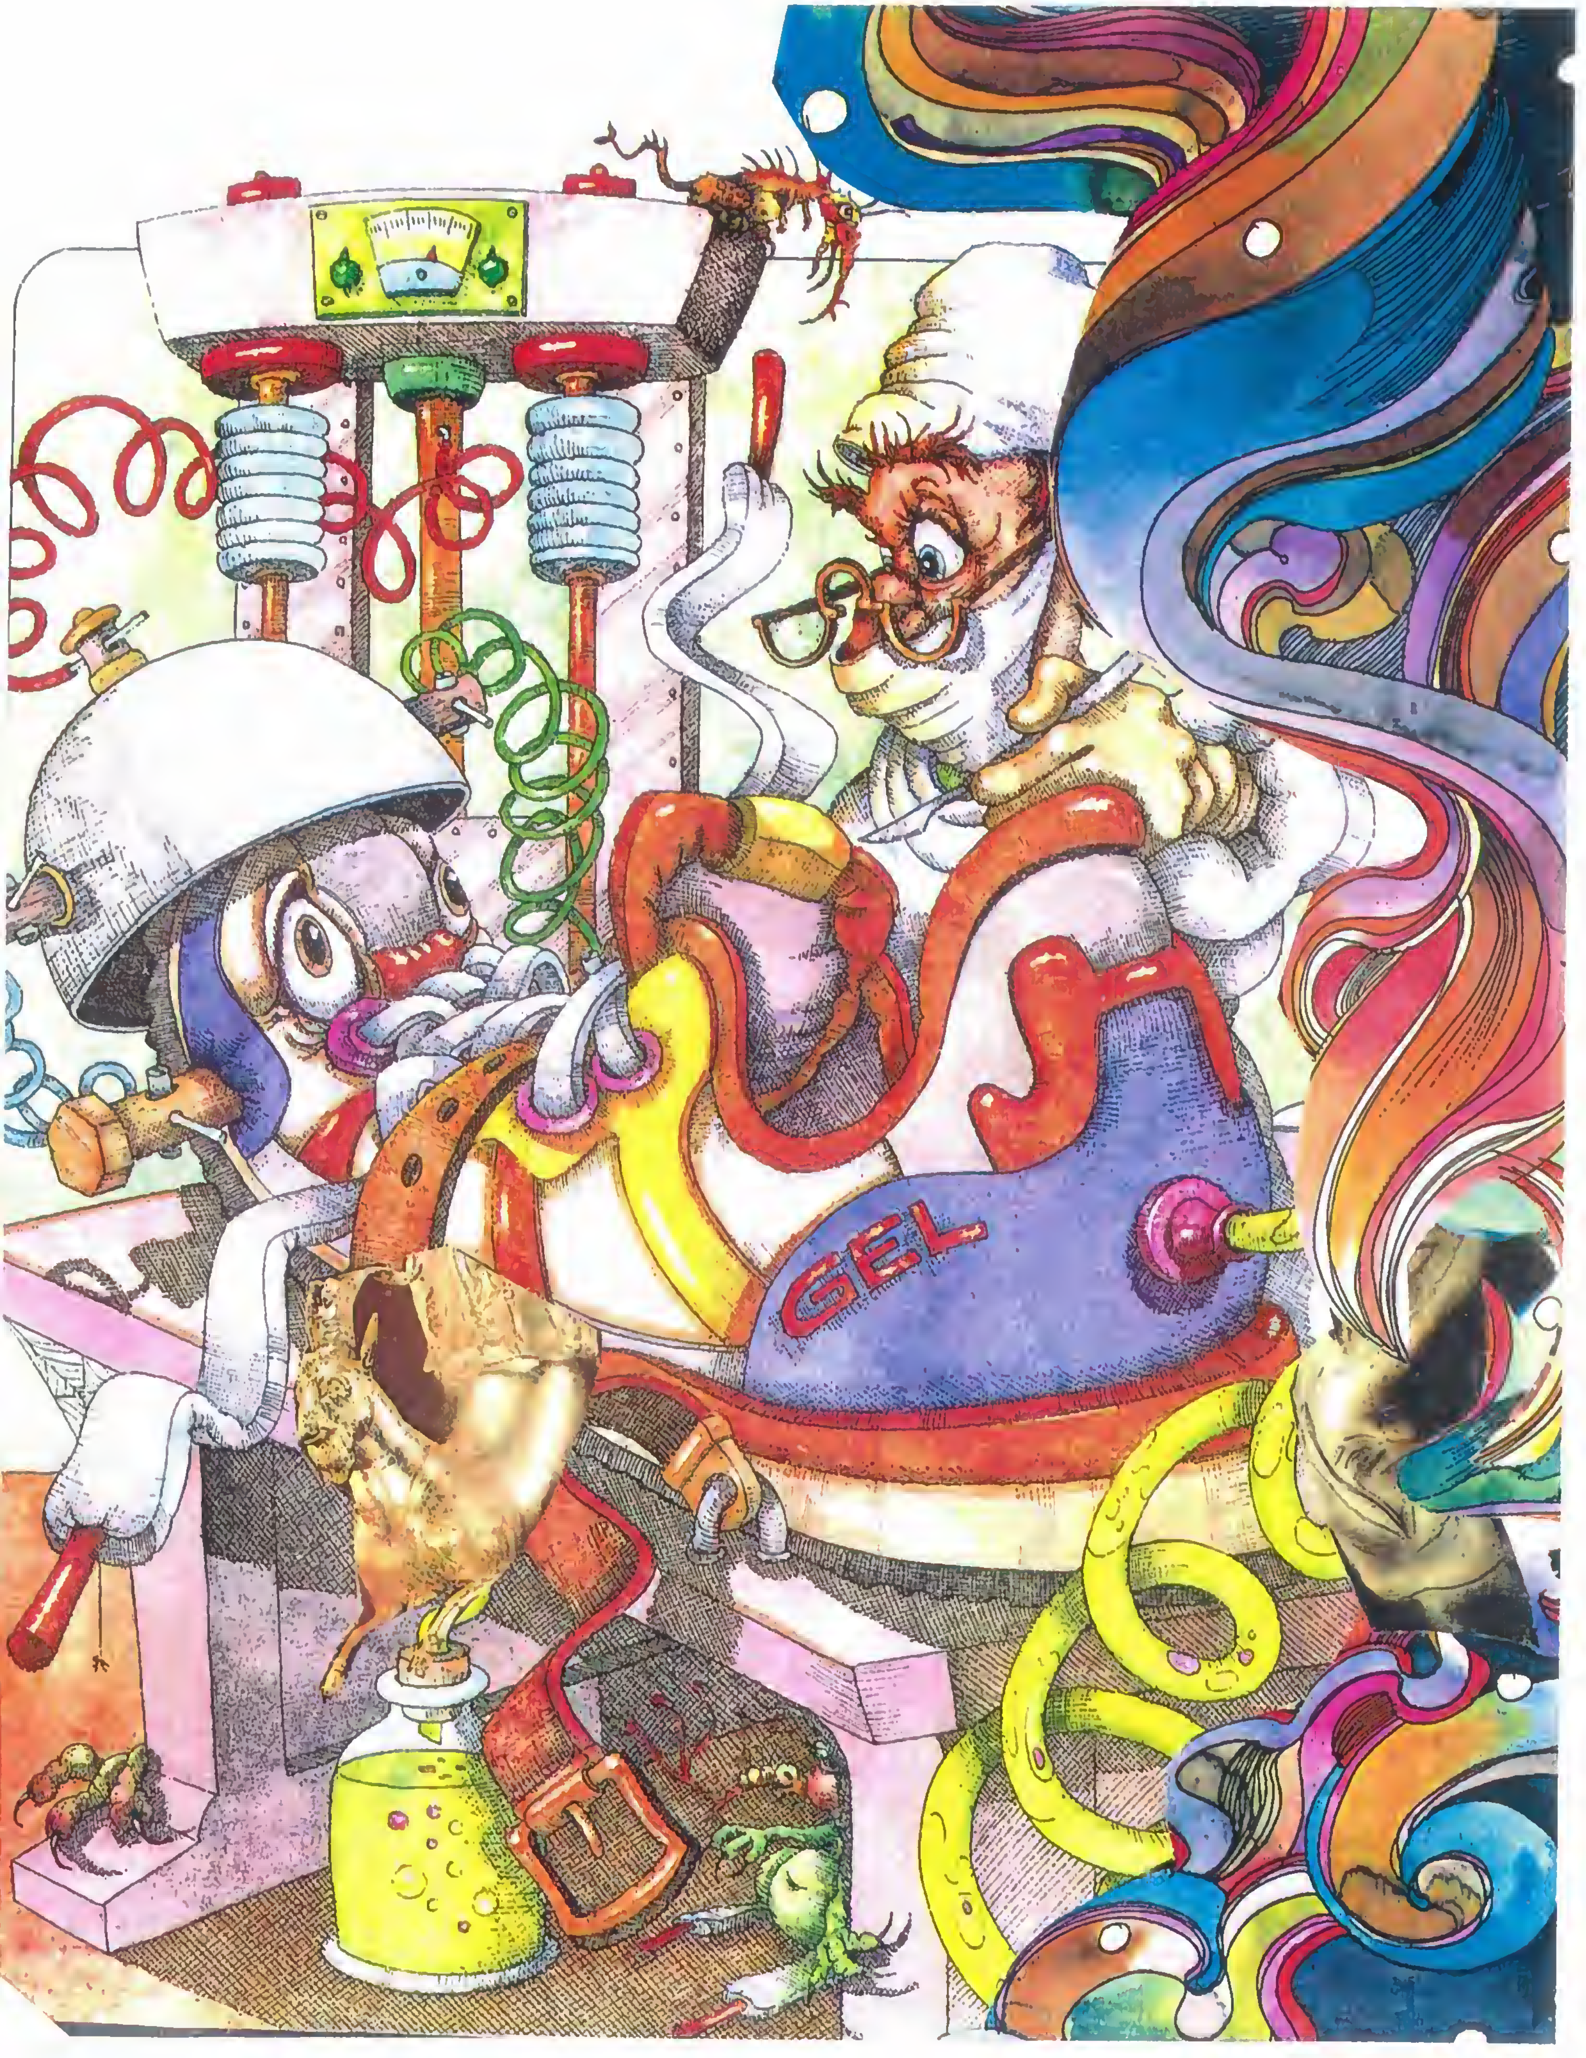
Alters were tortured into becoming monkeys. See the monkey in the cage. That was us. As a child, we were caged and abused by trained monkeys (chimps). One was trained to beat us, one to sexually rape us, and another one to feed us. We suffered through the role refersal where the chimps were are caretakers and we were treated like animals. During this period we were suspended from the ceiling in cages. This was a step in us being Moon Children. Certain alters came into existence in a caged environment which led them to believe they were not human. The picture shows that the monkey's left hand is still a little girl's hand. Another group of alters were created as white kittens. Our System also had bird alters.

How does one recover when part of one's mind are butterflies and monkeys and kittens? The psychological damage is overwhelming. We didn't want to be a little girl in the cages, because little girls had pain from torture and traumas. The unique-looking chair represents thousands of child alters in our System who are hiding.

Programming elements are spread throughout the picture. Dr. Mengele, who was called by us Dr. Green, David, and Fairchild, built black boxes into our mind. Opening a box was like opening Pandora's box, because demonic guardians were locked up in boxes to protect memories. Memories were "nested" (to use a CIA term) in these boxes. We received shells as no talk programming. The left hand corner has "jewells". Our programming was called jewells, and the demons called dwarfs (from the Snowwhite story) "mined" and protected these programs for us. The picture shows the powerful silver cord that was built to spiritually connect us. The piano was used to program us, and the violin represents the fiddler. Fiddler was a powerful cue word taking us into Never Never land. The book represents the scripts we were given. Stories were read to us by our Illuminati Grande Mother and we used those to creatively make our internal world.

The bubbles are the separation of the self into molecules. This is an element of confusion built into our System's mind. The confusion of disassociation, with sleeper alters popping up and the "See no evil, hear no evil, do no evil" message repeating itself helped insure that our denial of what had happened to us was maintained by the mind. Sometimes a water jar program would run where the mind felt like it was bubbles being shaken in a jar. This went off for us along with cutting, hanging, overdosing and other suicide programs.

The normal looking woman just left of center and the mother at the top are also part of us. In spite of all the dehumanization, in spite of all the demonic witchcraft performed on us even while we were still infetro, in spite of all of this hell, we still functioned in the world as a lady and a mother who had babies. In fact, our front alters functioned so good, many people still refuse to believe anything terrible like this could have happened to us. But notice that the mother is still trapped. The alters who mothered our children were front alters and even they were still trapped by the programming. They paid a price to try to free the System.



GEL

PROGRAMMERS (THE VOODOO DOCTORS OF THE CIA'S MIND CONTROL)

The expression is that behind every successful man there is a woman. Today, that expression can be broadened. Behind every successful Monarch slave there is a programmer.

In every bar, every jail, and on every street corner the common man knows that what goes around comes around. There is even an expression in the Word of God that says what a man sows that shall he also reap.

There is some humor in all of this programming somewhere. Maybe it got buried in the graveyards. Maybe in its in Disneyland where they do occult rituals during after hours along with programming.

Most of us Americans don't want to admit it, but we do have personal fears. We mask them with bravado and by a lot of smiles. Somewhere deep in the guts of almost all Americans is the sense that something went wrong. We seemed to have had the right recipe for success in this country, but the stew tastes like something a wild African Voodoo doctor might cook up to scare his enemy. But then what would Americans do if they got their country back from the New World Order gang? Who would we give the country to? After all, we almost have to cooperate with the New World Order because their people sit on all those corporation boards that are interlocked and working together. What would we do without all our major corporations? Maybe these sadistic old men that run this country aren't so bad, after all they supply us peons with our fast foods, our nice groceries, our transportation, our entertainment and our politicians. To think that some of our busiest corporate leaders and military men would take the time out of their busy schedule to help program children. The news media kept quoting our political leaders calling for a gentler America, and we probably do need a gentler America, but when you bump into a child who was programmed by George Bush's CIA--the same CIA Bill Clinton worked for, it makes you wonder. No wonder we don't seem to be making any headway on creating a gentler nation.

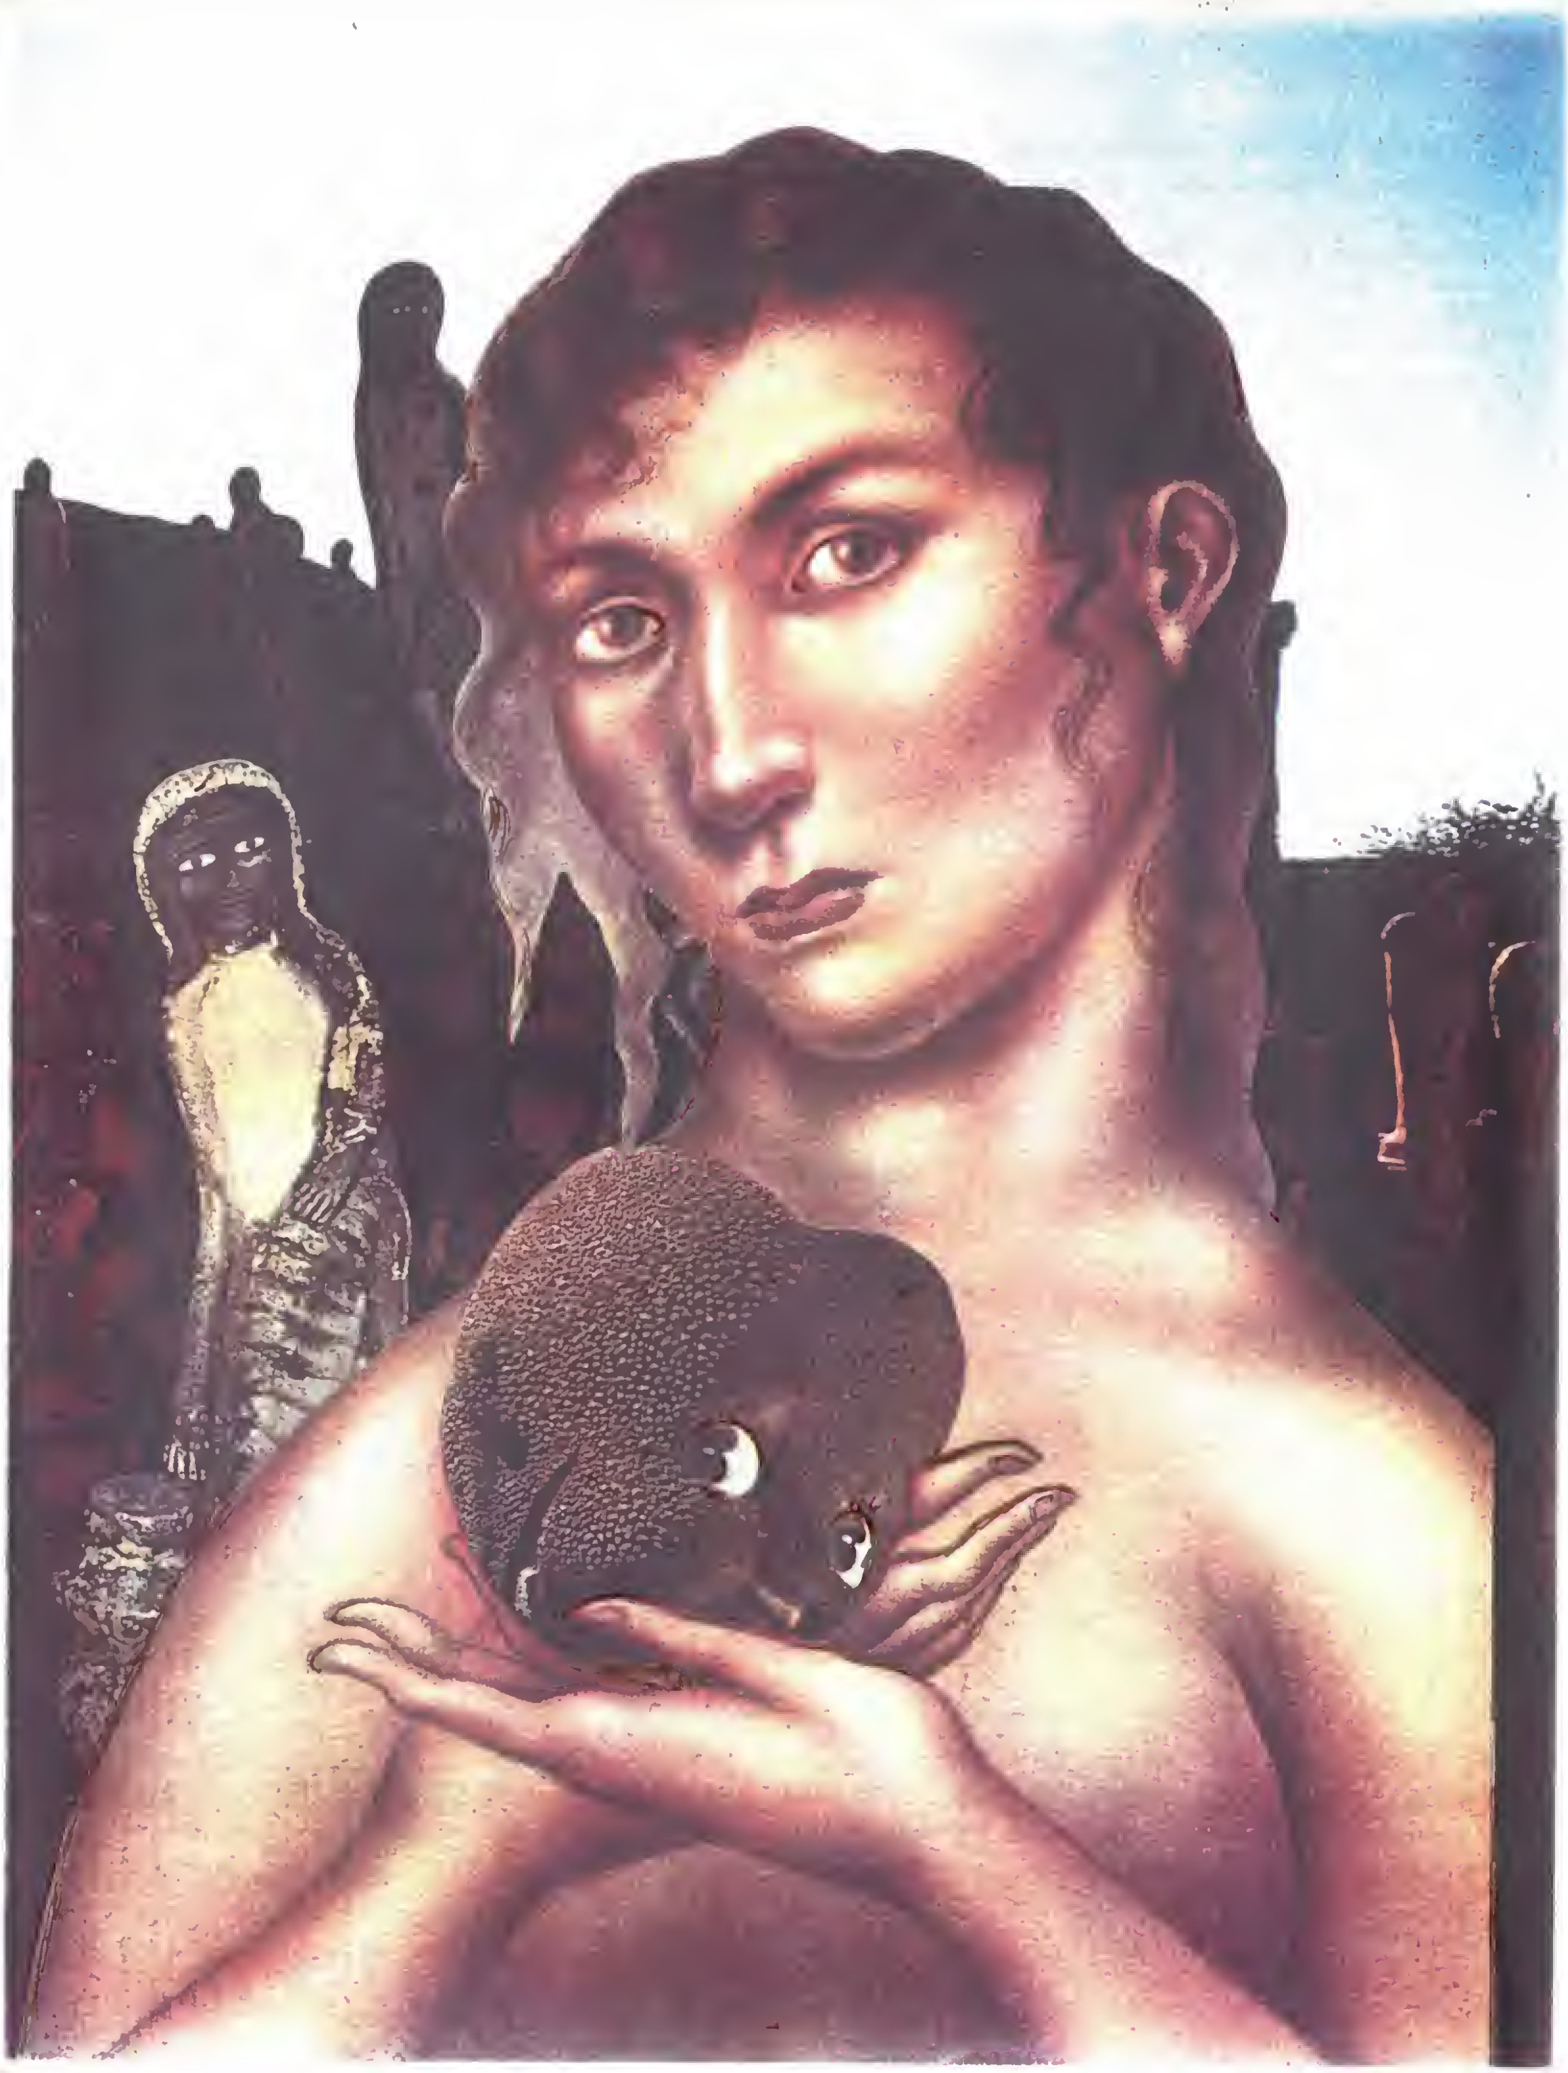
Life was so uncomplicated for Americans in W.W. II. The Nazis were in Germany, and they were our enemies. Then our leaders brought people like Dr. Mengele, the angel of death, over here to secretly program our children and things got complicated. The bad guys are apparently not so easy to identify as the American public thought. Unless he is like Michael Aquino or Anton LaVey or Rex Church the leading Satanists are hard to identify. These generational Illuminati families don't flaunt their dark powers. What makes them so dangerous is that they look like you and me.

Thanks Dad for enriching our life with all that fairy tale programming. And thanks for saving us in all those manufactured crises that you all cooked up when you programmed us.

Thanks to all the redicule we endured while being programmed, we were spared that common American ritual of being addicted to sitcoms. Thanks to the programmers' raw sense of perverted humor, we don't enjoy watching people be made fun of.

Those large doses of programming that we got were not very enlightening Dad, they tended to get us very confused. In fact, it seems like there are a lot of confused people in Satanism. It seems like there are a few things Satanists don't count on--like the love of God. Boy, it sure threw our programmed destiny out the window. It was revealed to us that God spared our life 888 times before He saw us through the deprogramming. How do you have a balanced view of life Dad, when the power of God is stronger than evil? I thought good deeds were to balance evil deeds? It looks like your plans ended in a mess. Your masterpiece failed. It found that there is something better than being an abused mind-controlled slave. You were wrong about something Dad, there are people in the real world who can love us and understand us. But then I'm sure that you're finding out that hell isn't so great a place as you said it would be. I guess we all have to learn to live with disappointmentIt's too bad the man who was assigned to access us had to wait so long hiding behind trees across from our house. It's too bad the CIA's programmer Ed (Dad's protege) had his plans messed up when we didn't let him into our house. Could it be that the best laid plans for men go astray, even when they think they are gods? If its one thing that we've learned it's that evil pays in counterfeit rewards.

If one programmer wasn't bad enough, having two major competing programmers and at least four other programmers makes one a believer that more isn't always better. I'm sorry gentlemen, but I just have to tell it the way it is.



HEARTS OF STONE

The programmers left no stone unturned as they stripped all of us alters of any vestiges of humanity we might have.

They made us believe that they had surgically removed our hearts & replaced them with a stone.

To reinforce this programming we were hypnotized to fall into a deep trance if we were ever hooked up to anything monitoring the heart. When someone tried to prove we had a heart by taking our pulse, we tranced deep enough that the machine didn't even read. This is how programming kept their lies safe from exposure.

They took our hearts for a number of reasons. One was blackmail. They promised to give us our hearts, if we obeyed, went home to the cult, and were available when the Anti-Christ needed us. It is doubtful we would have ever gotten our hearts back by the cult considering all the false promises we were made.

They gave our hearts to a queen mother alter for safekeeping. Our hearts were hidden in the Temple of Molech. The Temple of Molech was used as a depository for memories of child sacrifices. It was not a place any alter could or would want to go in the internal world.

In return, they gave us stones, yes, hearts of stone.

Stone-like protectors stand guard in the background. Their voodoo doll appearance reflects the voodoo that was linked to our System. What a joy it was to get our original hearts back when we deprogrammed. We asked people to listen to our new heart beats.

By removing our hearts, they removed any chance that we would have a soft warm spot in our heart for anyone. We were told we were incapable of having friends or of loving others. This was effective in separating us from others. That isolation was a part of the mind control.

Because we had no life source within ourselves--that is no heart, we had to look to our master. If our master placed his hand upon our chest we would feel alive.

Because people need a heart to feel, we were programmed to believe that we were incapable of feeling and had no feelings. We could not cry during our own suffering, and we did not feel capable of caring for the suffering of others. In spite of all the brutality and isolation of the programming, our humanity still lay in the background, and we accessed it to secretly help others escape the power of the Illuminati's programming.

When people ask us to give our hearts to Jesus, we told them we didn't have one. When we got our own hearts back, we gave them to Jesus.

The black stone was used in the Mothers-of-Darkness vows. The book of Revelation speaks about a white stone with a name written on it. Our Mothers of Darkness alters got a black stone with their assigned Queen goddess names written on them.

In all covenants, something is given to the cult. Our hearts were given to the satanic Master. There is a Keeper of the Seals who keeps the items given when a vow or covenant is made. If a person is a traitor to a vow, then the cult has an object to carry out voodoo or magic upon to punish the person.

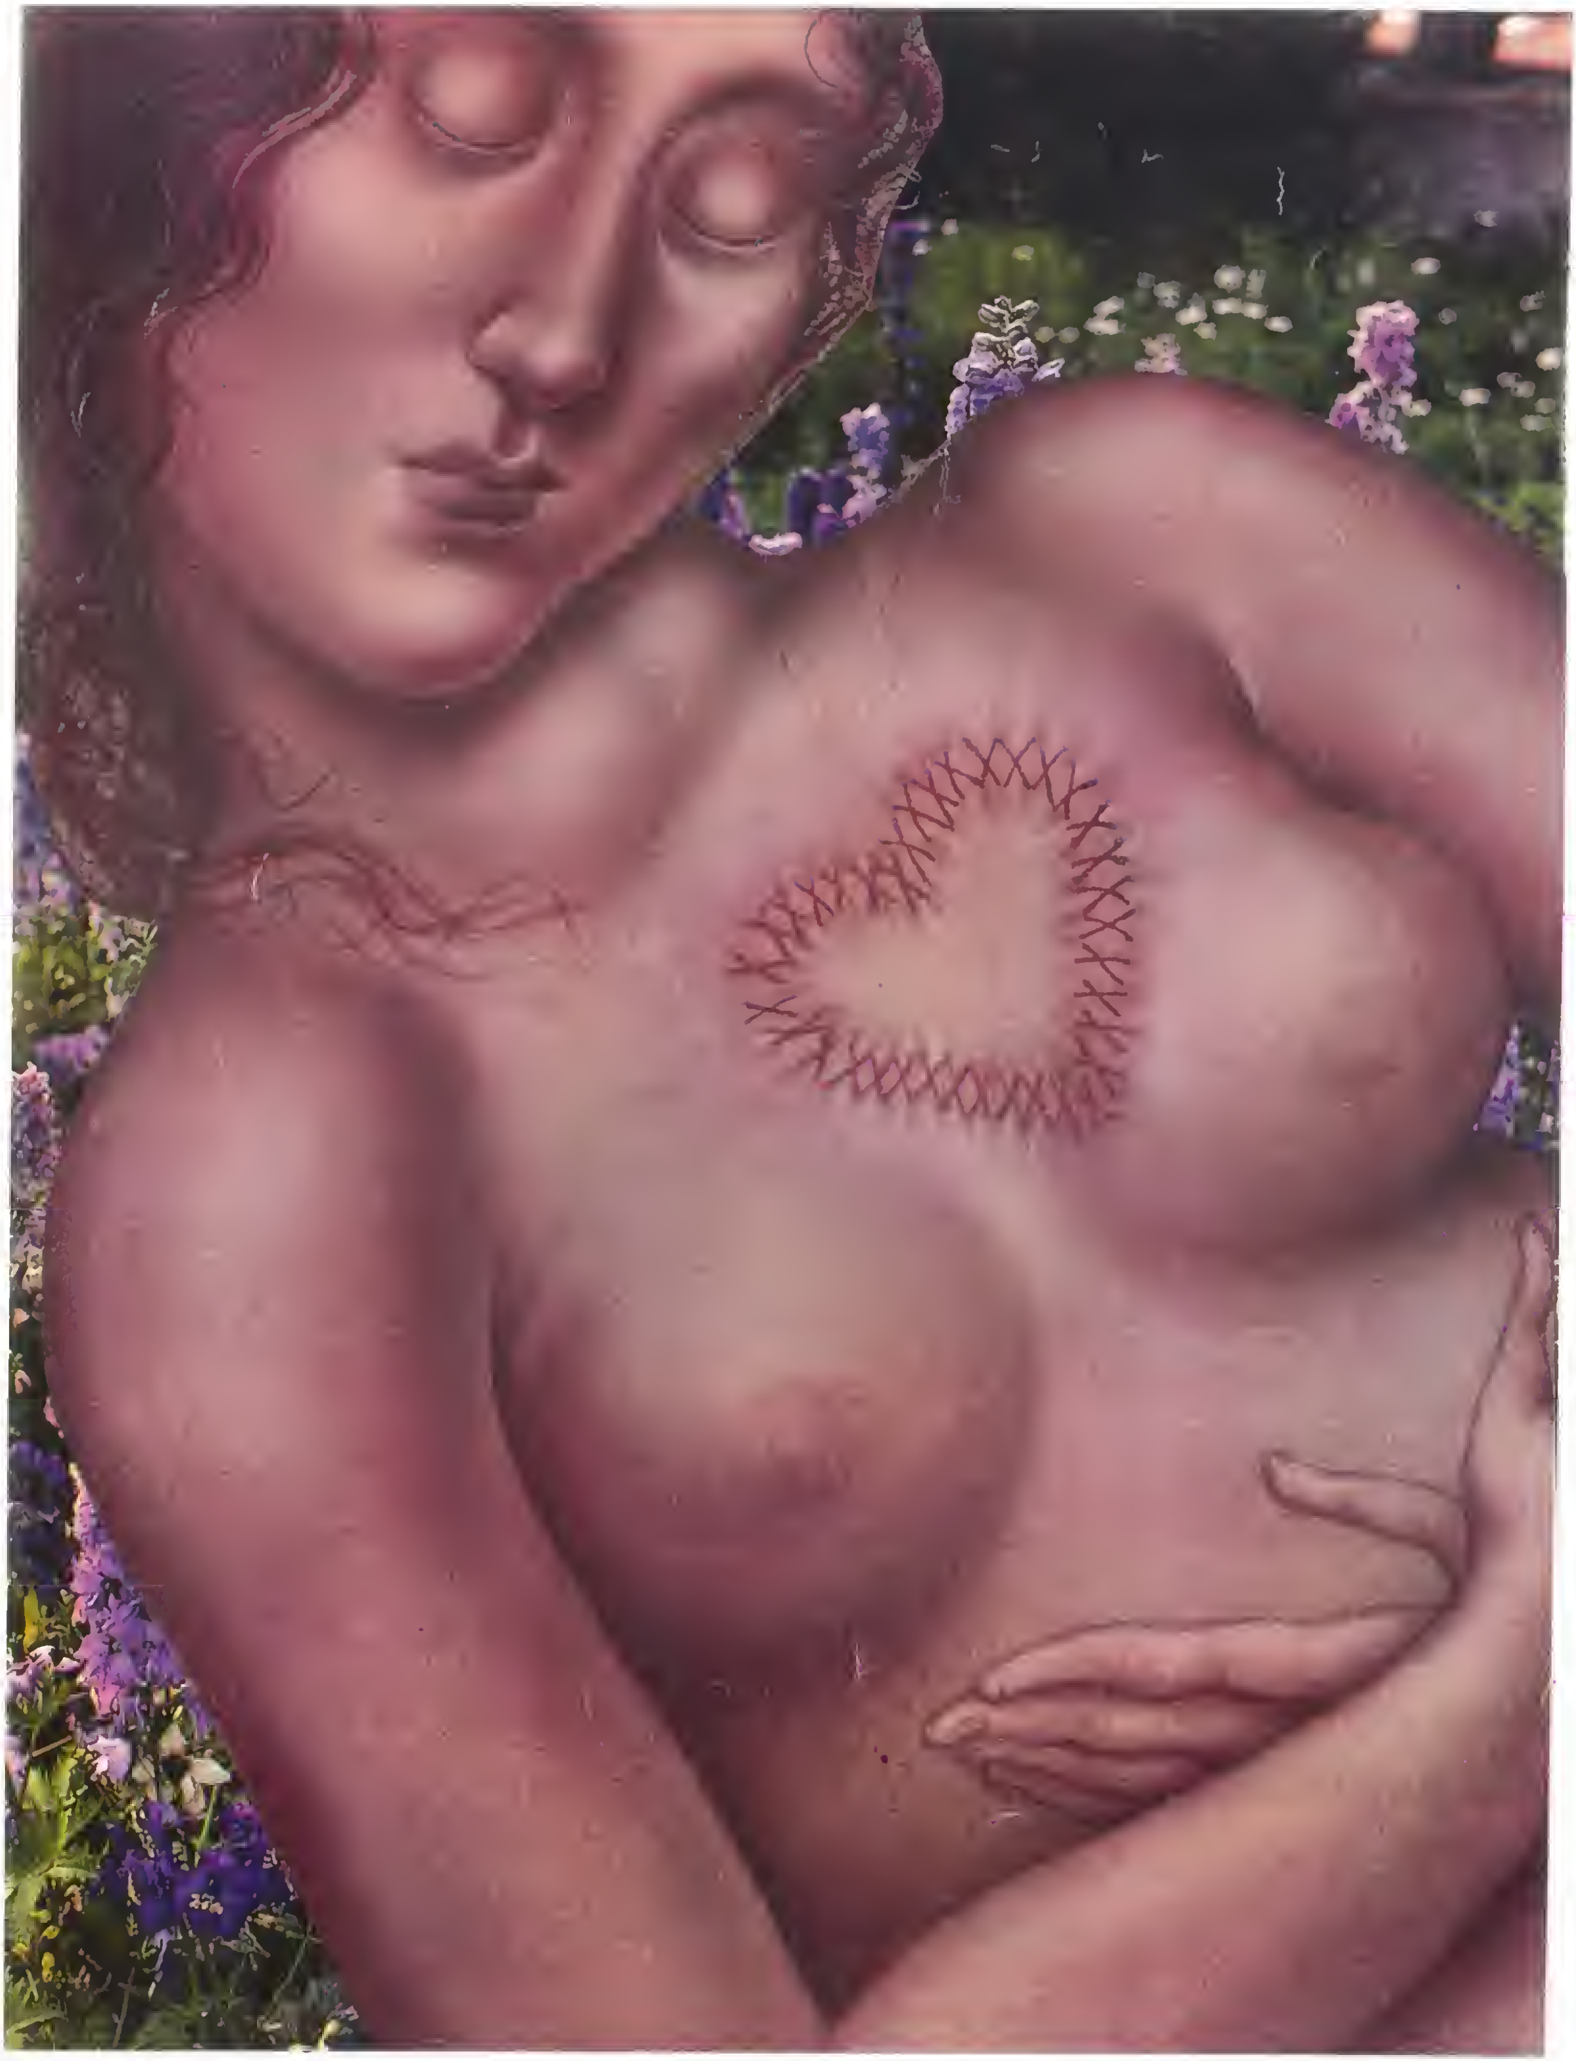
Those who have been on the inside of Satanism know that the type of oaths taken by occult lodges and satanic cults are enforced. The oaths describe the type of traitors death that is to be carried out. An example of the types of penalty these oaths carry can be seen in the following words,

"All this I most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear with a firm steadfast resolution, to keep and perform the same without any equivocation, mental reservation or secret evasion of mind whatever, binding myself under no less penalty than that of having my throat cut across, my tongue torn open, my heart plucked out my body severed in twain, my bowels taken from thence and burned to ashes, should I knowingly violate this my solemn obligation."

The covenants, and vows and threats all work together to keep people in line. People are threatened that if they are not true to blood oaths that their signatures will turn to green and the Illuminati will know that they have been traitors. Even the american presidents are reported to be threatened with this type of threat.

We knew our orders, and we were locked into obedience.

All this is done to control people so that a great master plan to enslave and rule the world can be carried out. The secrecy and control perpetuates Satan's conspiracy against God and his creation. And it is all cloaked so well behind mysteries, such as the Mystery Religions.

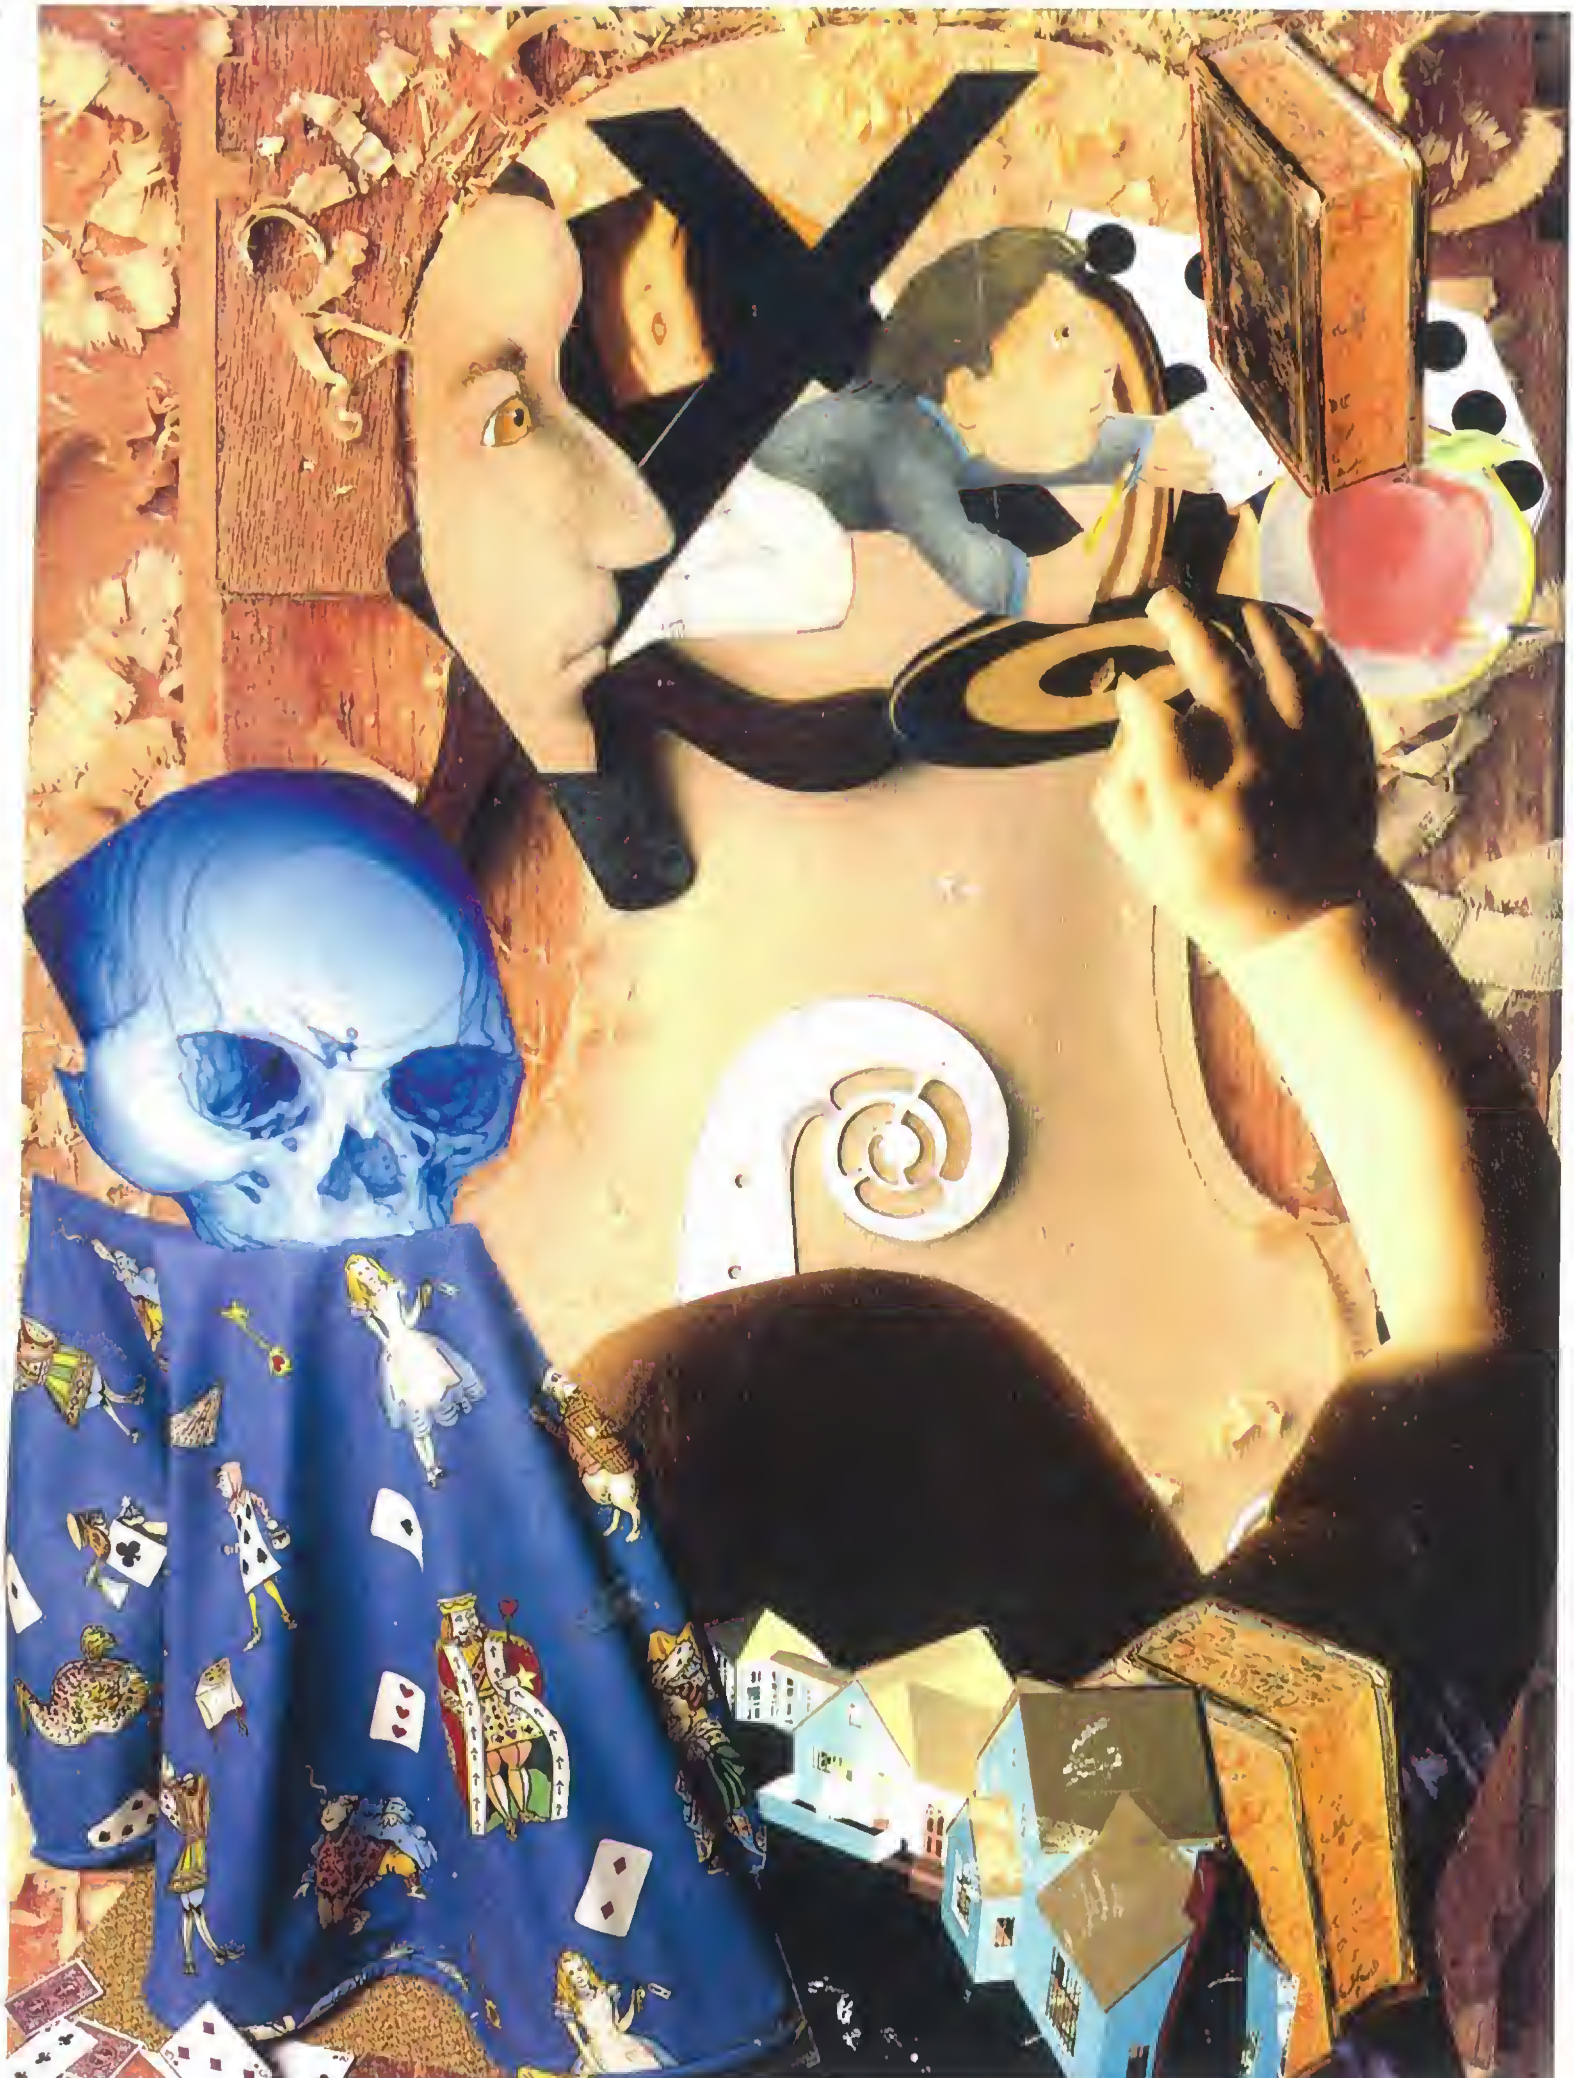


HYPNOTIC SURGERY

After they stole our hearts away, and our faces away, and our identity away, and our real family away, and our own free will away, and our humanity away, they were kind enough to sew back into our chests black stones. They did all this surgery by hypnosis.

They had the power via hypnosis to heal our wounds after they tortured us. They could basically make or remake reality to be what they wanted.

Can the viewer see the dehumanization? Can the viewer get in touch with the crimes that accompany the trauma-based mind control? A picture is worth a thousand words. Does anything more need to be said?



FROM CRADLE TO THE GRAVE

We were brainwashed into believing that their power over us was from the cradle to the grave. We never thought outside of doing our Master's wishes. Before therapy our front alters had an inner feeling that things were wrong but were very limited in their knowledge of the extensive abuse. Some of our front level alters (the front level had 97 alter identified by name as well as some in boxes unnamed) were allowed to be abused by non-cult people to serve as cover for the obvious physical/emotional abuse our body had suffered.

We were taught to follow our Master to the letter of the law. They taught us scripts to follow. Because they split our mind into Multiple Personalities at the tender age of 18 months, they had to give us scripts that a child could learn.

Our System was set up as a big cube, 13 sections x 13 levels x 13 alters per family. This 3-D system was further tied together by color programming which added a fourth dimension. The fourth dimension, the color coding allowed them to tie together alters in widely separate locations in our cube-shaped System.

From the mapping of our System, which we did with our closest friend, we believe that 6 of our sections had Bible words for access codes and 5 sections had occult words for access codes and the 12th section had Texas geographic terms. The access codes involved more than just alpha-numeric cues for the deeper levels. There were also "keys" which were important in accessing our System, and erasure codes.

How did our mind build our System? The Queen alter of the 4 section had only one toy as a child. This toy was an army cup which telegraphed out. When looked from the top it looks like concentric rings which descend as one goes deeper. Our System was 13 concentric descending rings. This is exactly a copy of the universe which Plato and Pythagorus came up with. Plato and Pythagorus are important figures in the occult world. As this Queen alter spent hours playing with this cup she reinforced the programming structure of the internal world.

They physically displayed to our System as a child that we were their marionette puppet. They electro-shocked our muscles in such a way as to take advantage of the natural reflexes. When electro-shocked that way our body parts would jerk out of our control at their whim to prove to us that we were their puppet. We remember the rules we were given and rule number 8 was that we were their puppet. Our programmer, Dr. Mengele, used puppets in a dollhouse as he programmed us. He did skits with his puppets. "Dance Marionette dance," he'd tell us.

Along with rule no. 8, we learned the following rules:

1. Listen to your instructions., 2. There is no room for error., 3. "The Game Timer"--these were the specifics of how to move, the melted mirror, etc., 4. There is a chain of command, the King's men., 5. Our Master would chart our course., 6. We will receive orders, what to do, a memorized script to follow and fulfill., 7. They would always own us into infinity., 8. We are puppets on a string. "Dance Marionette dance. We were to speak only those words told to us, and to only speak those words when our string was pulled., 9. There is no room for questions., 10. The controller always plays the role of the White Rabbit.

Our dark side alters knew those rules as part of their being.

In the picture you see the fiddle in the background. Dr. Joseph Mengele (known as Dr. Green) carried a violin, which we saw during programming. He programmed us to respond to the key word "Fiddler".

Dominoes, cards, keys & Alice In Wonderland shown in the fabric were parts of our programming.

After being deprogrammed we were threatened over the phone, "You know the law, you can either live by the laws that govern you, or you can die by the laws that govern you." I reveal this threat simply to underline or highlight the significance the laws are that are given to a System.

Because obedience is so important in the military, some military generals and colonels who are involved with programming people have lost all sense of reality and justify and rationalize their criminal torture of innocent children as a neccessary evil to get good soldiers and good spies. Monarch programming is the most hideous cruel form of slavery ever invented. It is not enough to physically free oneself of one's abusers. To regain one's own mind, means to break down the amnesia and the walls that were meant to protect the mind. It means to suffer the trauma a second time as the memories surface and the body and mind suffer intense pain again. Monarch programming is not designed to create good obedient people. It is designed to dehumanize people into robots who will follow the letter of the law and love and worship their slave masters.

Accroding to what we have know, approximately one million Americans have suffered from trauma-based mind control since 1947. Today, the programmers do not know what they do, anymore than their slaves.

PROGRAMMING

This picture shows many elements of the programming that we had. Can you identify the elements of Monarch Programming pictured here? See how many elements of the Monarch Programming you can find. Meanwhile, we will use this little article to uncover elements of mind control that are in the picture of everyone's life. This is important because the entire world is being programmed. And the same elements that were used in our Monarch mind control are being used on the public!

Most people would never suspect that they are the objects of mind control. Their personal pride tells them that they have come to their perceptions about the world entirely on their own. However the truth is that there is no corner of the earth now that is not being subjected to some kind of mind control. The goal is to enslave the planet by mankind's own manipulated and controlled "free will". The destruction of true free will is being concealed so people will want to do what they are to do, rather than having to be forced.

For people to step outside of the mass programming that is taking place, means to make their own decisions, taking responsibility for their lives, and standing alone in the face of criticism by the mind-controlled masses. The masses cried for Christ to be crucified. Christ is the perfect example of someone taking moral responsibility for his own life, and standing alone in the face of the thinking of the deluded masses. Most people fear standing alone. Most people fear real freedom. They want to be led. They want someone else to make their decisions and thereby relieve them of some of their responsibility. MPD is a very creative way for evil men to take away a person's ability to have responsibility for their own actions.

Freedom of the mind is not the right to think on whatever rotten thing the mind drifts into, but the power to think about those things that the mind ought to think about--those things that lead to spiritual truth and to spiritual life. The mind can be transformed by dedicating itself to the will of God.

Here are MIND CONTROL TECHNIQUES developed and used on the public:

- Education from controlled public education. This includes providing people with false views on history, morality, authority, and God.
- Mind altering chemical such as flouride, and artificial sweetner put in entire population's food and drink.
- Television, which creates a hypnotic state of those who view it, and which allows implantation of subconscious thinking.
- Broadcasts of eletromagntic frequencies with encoded messages that enter the brain (ELF waves to impart particular thought patterns).
- Broadcasts of directed energy to control the bodies/minds of people.
- Destruction of health, because sluggish sick bodies make for sluggish minds which are easier to control.
- Subliminal messages, backmasking in music, etc.
- Implants (a wide variety have been and are now employed).
- Control of the newspapers, and other news sources.
- Control by the creation of fears and phobias and hates among people.
- Control by evil spiritual entities, geographic spiritual powers, ect.
- The Creation of mind-control slaves (i.e. Monarch programming.)
- Control over the pulpits of America, 300,000 pulpits are silent on the real story about what is overtaking America.

From the cradle to the grave Americans are spoon-fed what to believe. The entire frame of reference that an American has is built for him by the information he is given. And when one studies it, almost all the information that an average American receives is controlled. Step by step the establishment builds his frame of reference so that it is inconceivable for him to think in ways the controllers don't want him to think. The average American believes he lives in a democracy and a free nation. The average American believes the traditional myths handed him about his country's past. The average American believes that he controls his own destiny by electing officials. Most Americans no longer have a frame of reference which can deal with much truth.

THE MONARCH MIND-CONTROL USES ABOUT EVERY METHOD OF MIND-CONTROL

The Monarch Mind-control divides a person apart into many personalities. A house divided against itself can not stand. The person is divided against himself. Drugs, hypnosis, torture & fear, high level demonology, isolation, lies, massive amounts of electroshock & other methods of control are used to the hilt to program.

INFORMATION RETENTION

In the picture are library scripts, a castle, a carousel, bottles, a waterfall, a telegraph represented by typewriter. Within our System we had more than one library. We had a key library in the Emerald City castle, which is pictured here. But our picture tells more than just about our libraries of information. The carousel shows how disassociation was taught to us. In the process of programming and structuring a child's mind, they first identify if the child can disassociate. We were placed upon a carousel to help us learn how to go up and down and to disassociate.

During our System's programming we know they used the following scripts:
Alice In Wonderland, Candyland, Little Red Riding Hood, Hansel and Gretel, Snow White, Sleeping Beauty, Rose Red-Rose White, Lost Horizons, the Tall Book of Make Believe, The Wizard of Oz series of books, 20,000 Leagues Under The Sea, The Man Without a Country, and large sections of the Bible (such as Ezekiel's Valley of Dry Bones, the Armageddon Story, the Creation Story, the Temple, the Wheel within Wheels of Ezekiel, etc.)

How could they utilize such stories? How does this fit in with everything? How did they get us to disassociate memories? What are the roles the scripts play & what is the role of layering in programming?

The story of Alice In Wonderland was used to teach an alter to scramble what she has heard. What you say is not what was heard.

This is an example of how the programmers blurred reality by a fictional script. The alter follows a script in its internal world which seems real to it. The script is designed to carry the alter through a series of steps, but when the process is finished the alter likely remembers nothing of the script or the process. In this way some of what happens is hidden simply by the script mechanism.

The programmers will begin their programming by extreme torture. After a certain amount of torture the victim is willing to say or believe anything to stop the torture. At this point a thought will be planted into the victim's mind. This thought will be linked to a false memory put in via hypnosis or movies, or other method, and it will be linked to a command put in by hypnosis etc. and the original thought, the command, the false memory will be linked by a single emotion which will link them all together. The result will be something like this: it is two weeks before Halloween (thought), I must get ready for Halloween rituals (command) because I have always had a habit of going to Halloween rituals (false memory). If I don't I will have a heart attack and die (memory of torture linked to thoughts).

Programming is layered in. Layer after layer of programming is put in. Each alter (personality) of the victim is used as if it is a component of a large system. The result is that no alter (personality) is the whole, but only a cog in a great machine. Can a single cog rebel against the whole machine? It is very difficult for a single component of thousands of components to rebel against the abusers.

When alters are being used they are following a script. Then their memories are hypnotically locked up by posthypnotic suggestions and fragmented by electroshock before they can go from short term memory into long term memory. Actions in the System happened according to scripts; reality and fiction were totally blurred. Memories were nested in many different ways, and hidden under layers of gibberish or false fronts. Seeing one's master as a White Rabbit is one way a false front could be used by some script we were tortured to accept.

COLOR BANDS

This picture show the color programming that was given to our System.

Color programming is reported to have been developed in California. Whatever the case Systems all over the United States have color programming.

The hierarchy of colors in our System is as follows: Gold, Silver, Purple, Black, Red, Green, Brown, White, Orange, Yellow, Pink. Clear is also used as a color for secret areas of the system. This hierarchy of color coding can be switched. Alters, sections, and parts of the computer are all color coded. The color coding for alters is not the same just because the alters are in the same section.

The color coding within the Illuminati Mind Control is fairly consistent. The use of the colors of our System is consistent with the use of colors in other Systems.

A survey of the use in our System of colors is as follows:

CLEAR. Secret or shell alters who can take on any color are coded clear. These are alters who serve as images or as a stage for other alters.

GOLD. This color is for the System's supreme leadership, which incl. our Grand Druid Council.

SILVER. This color is for the Satanic alters who perform high level Satanic rituals. The Mothers of Darkness have silver coding.

PURPLE. These alters see themselves as the abusers, rather than the Illuminati. These alters were involved with the programming. They have been taught to forget the abuse and to reframe it in their mind as training.

BLACK. These alters were born out of Satanic ritual, and are Moon children. The Delta and Beta alters are black coded. They do the dirty work for the cult, such as blackmail and assassination.

RED. These altars see themselves as witches. They were born out of witchcraft ritual, believe they have great spiritual power, and tend to deny that they have been abused.

GREEN or EMERALD GREEN. These cat altars recognize they have been abused. They still see themselves as belonging to the cult family, and deny that they have been abused to protect their cult family.

BLUE ALTERS. Clones, armies and the ribbons appear to have blue coding. These alters will go so far as to hurt the body to protect it from leaking information or deprogramming.

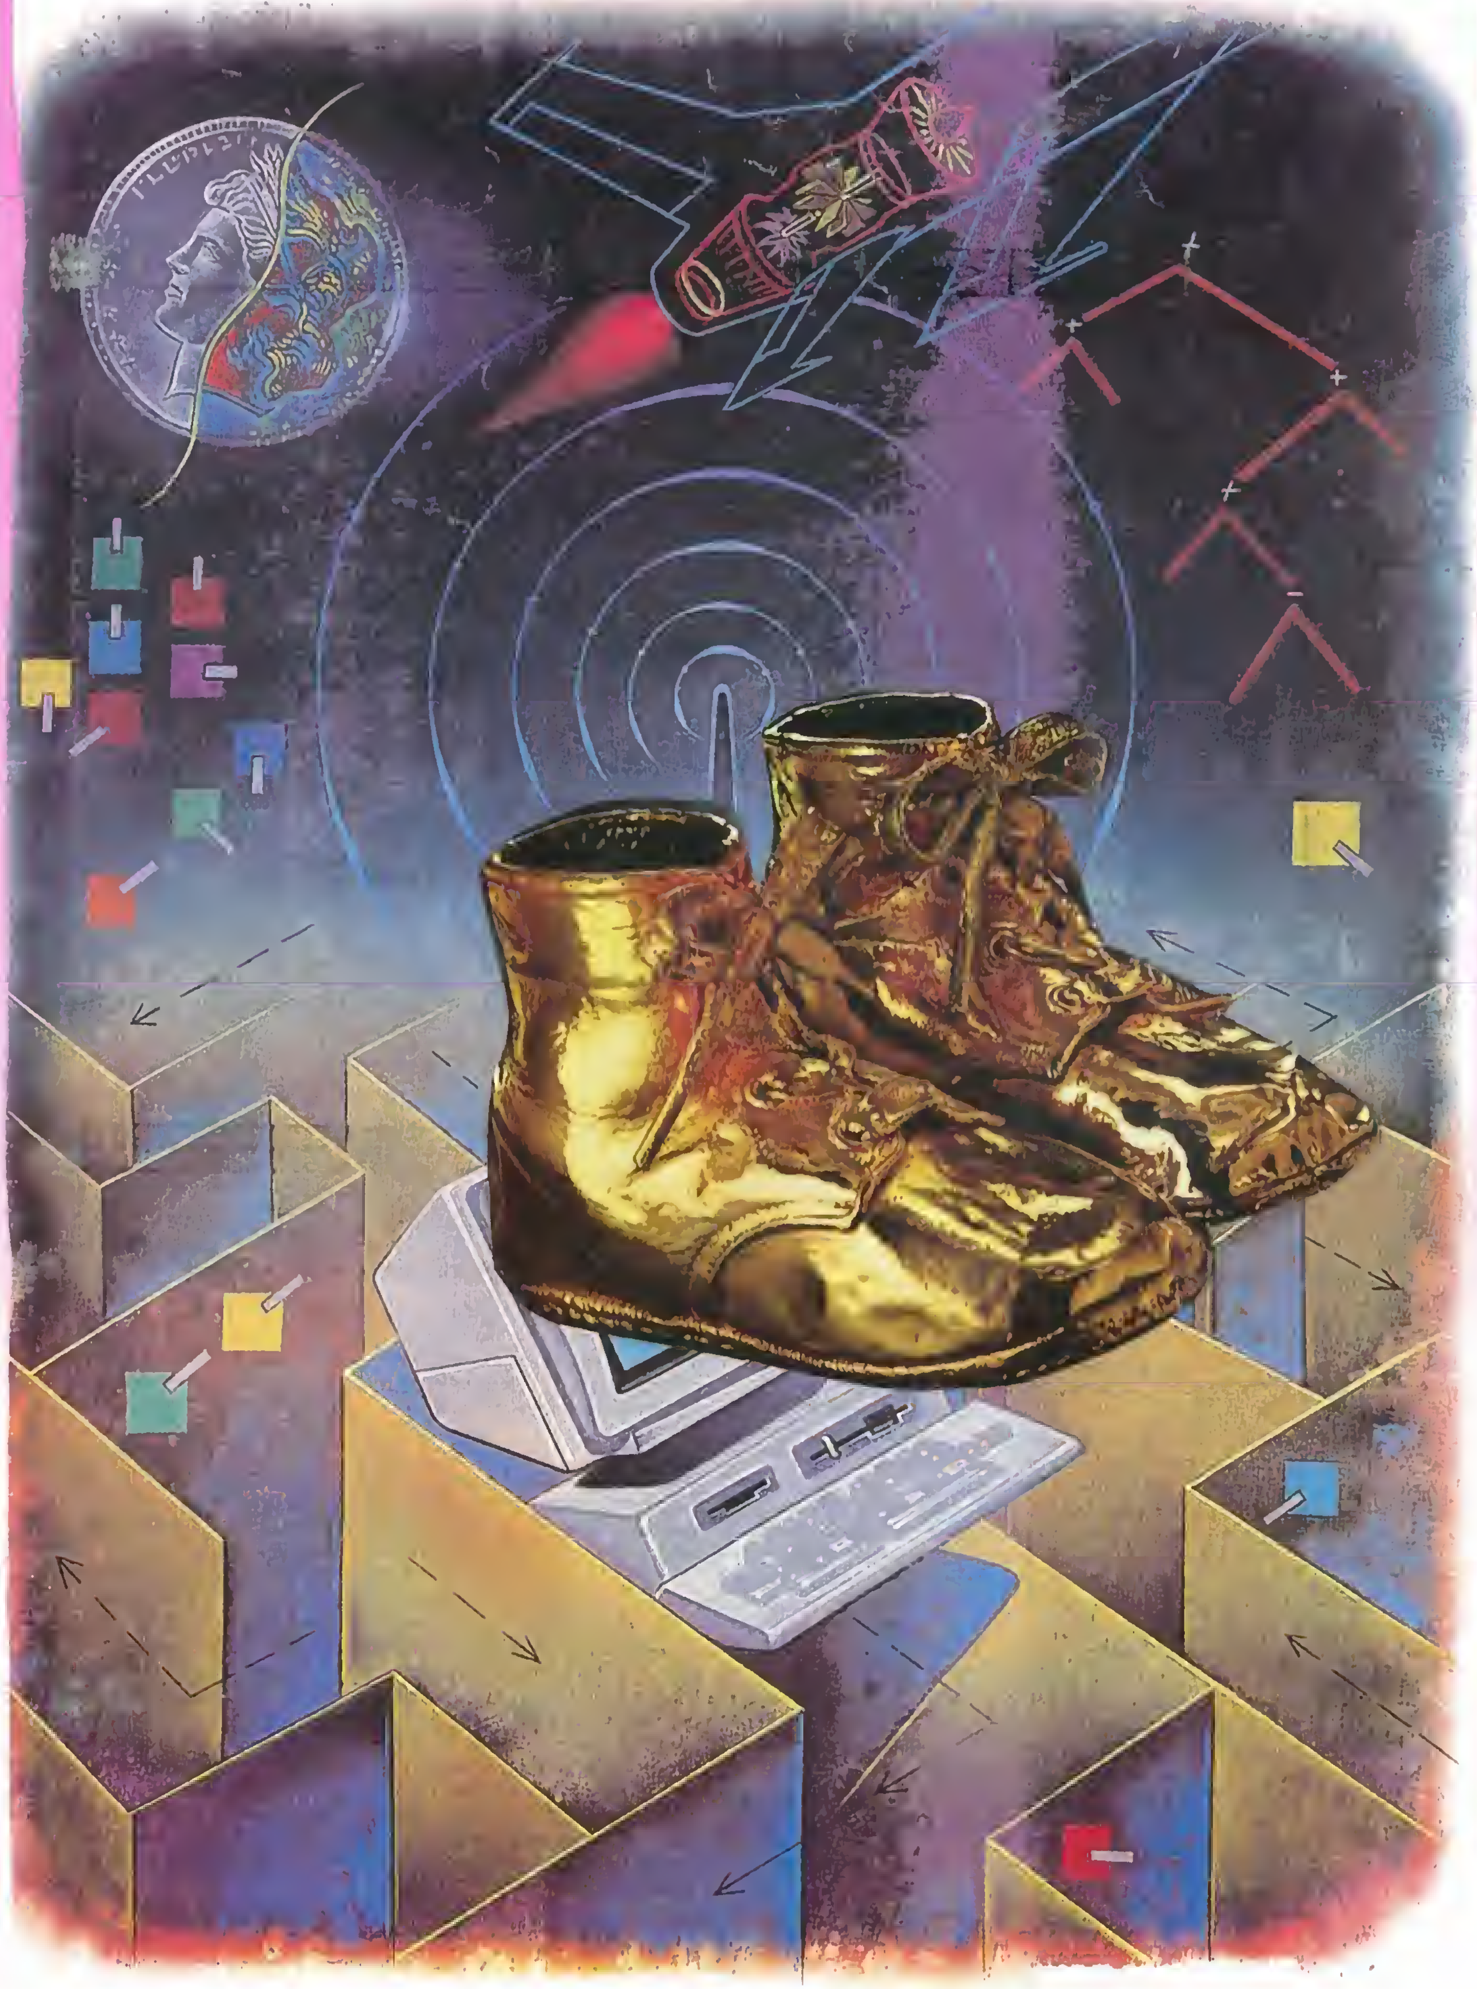
WHITE. These are Atlantean alters who have been given Aryan type racial nonsense to think they are superior. They believe in genetic engineering, and a master race.

ORANGE. These are scouts who warn of danger from internal or external threats.

YELLOW. These are our strong Christian alters. There were only a few in the System for years.

PINK. These are core related alters. They maintain the true feelings of the true self apart from the cult programming and the cult family's programming. These alters are viewed as weak because they are emotional and often break down and weep. They are fragile emotionally.

The picture has many elements which are meaningful, including the shells and the green boxes. The notes rising in the back are a reminder that so much of the programming is tied to music.



DESTINY

People don't become structured multiples by accident. There has been a lot of bungling in the therapeutic community as people groped around in the dark about why structured multiples happen. The facts are fairly straightforward. Someone plans to create a multiple. They test little children to find out if they will disassociate enough to go along with the trauma-based mind control program. If they are suitable candidates then they are intentionally given years of torture and years of mind-control. It is premeditated and cold-blooded.

For the child, it never has a chance. Often in the Illuminati, the child's life has been planned out for it. The child is taught, and the adults believe that the programming and enslavement is the child's destiny. The whole thing tends to make many alters fatalistic. They take a "whatever will be, will be" attitude to survive their abusive "destiny."

Elements in this picture show how that destiny is planned. Slippers take the child where it is to go. The color programming of the internal computers is shown. The internal computers control the victim's mind. The radio waves represent several things. They represent the System's worlds. The stars represent the quadrants. They represent the way control is beamed out. They represent the hypnotic spiral that is used. The mazes represent the internal mazes and also the feeling that one is trapped, that there is no way out. The mind gets trapped in mazes of clear glass and it just gets locked in. We were programmed to "See no evil, hear no evil, do no evil." Evil meant anything contrary to the programming. Since we were programmed to be silent, any time we told anybody anything about what was really going on we were committing an "evil" against the programming.

The arrows are indicative of the path we must go on.

The gold shoes were telling a story of what was happening in the System. The shoes are a child's shoes--they represent the little girl (the core) which was split. But where is the core? Our core was gone and no one interacting with the therapist knew where the core had gone. There is nothing in the shoes. The gold of the shoes represents the refining they did to the core. The split and split the core to refine her by fire to get the System they wanted.

The color band programming can be seen. The concentric circles also represent the internal compass and the sections.

We were heavily programmed not to know or reveal anything about our computer. Our method for revealing the computers was to show a jet. The jet's fire are the spirits that fueled the System. The front engine was the front computer and then the middle multi-paddled object was the all-seeing eye, and then our hidden second computer was the second part of the jet engine.

The coin with the front face shows that we had a front for our System that hid all the mind control mechanisms. People could see the shiny faces of our front alters and never suspect that thousands of other alters lay silently underneath them. People could see our front alters go about their work, go to church, and raise a family and never suspect that at the same time, very evil men were using us to further their evil plans. Satanism is very skilled at fronts. The occult world is one front in front of another front in front of another front. Freemasonry is organized like a box with a box inside, with another box inside, organizations within organizations. Some men belong to Freemasonry their entire lives and never really see the occult side of it. Others join the secret groups which quietly hide behind the larger groups. For instance, in Freemasonry they ask you if you want to go to Damascus or Jerusalem. One can take the road to Damascus or the road to Jerusalem, and one path takes one deeper into occultism. The top 3 strongest alters of many of our sections served as outside protectors that is they served as fronts to the world to hide what else was in their section.

Many survivors are in therapy and are still being accessed. Many therapists, due to their practice of staying out of survivors' personal lives have no inkling of what is going on with the deeper parts of the people they are supposed to be helping. The front alters will not be able to detect in most cases what is going on. They may have some suspicions, but if the entire System wanted to help the therapist, then that would indicate that they had overcome their mind control already. Such extreme situations just don't happen. Even after deprogramming some alters will like their old life better. And if a person integrates when they deprogram they may still have second thoughts. Remember some of the victims of the concentration camps when they were liberated went back into the camps because that was home and where they felt secure.

To break away from one's destiny and to deprogram can leave a big void in a person's life. That void needs to be filled. That is where a therapist can be of great service to a person. That is where a good testimonial of someone in the cult finding a new life as a Christian can be helpful. It is not enough to take out the programming, something of value has to be found to replace it.

PAPA BEAR/GHOST RIDERS

The power that a programmer or a handler has over a Monarch System is absolute. When they programmed us, they had power over our life or death. They had power over how much they would torture us, and how long and what kind of trauma. We were totally helpless. They would repeatedly set themselves up as our rescuers. When you are tortured long enough, you are very grateful to the abuser when he stops. We were very bonded to our programmers. The mind-control programming was designed to erase the front alters' memory of their programmers. Our programmers went by the name Dr. Green and Dr. Black. Over a period of 9 years, we have gotten to the point we can tell the world who programmed us. They were Dr. Joseph Mengele and our father. Mengele is represented in the picture by the Tin Man with glasses. Our father is represented by the man riding the horse. At the time we did this picture it was a major step for us to represent our programmers. Many of our parts were still loyal to our programmers. We suffered through a great deal of pain, just to portray this much, and only a few trusted people initially saw this picture.

Often during the traumas of programming, our father would be set up as our rescuer.

Our father liked horses and so did we. However, we also know that he was far more than what he appeared on the surface to the public. In the picture, he is shown holding up a skull, because our father was a member of the Illuminati, an Ipsimus. Dr. Green is shown wearing gold glasses because he would wear glasses. We remember things about him, including his violin case with its electric probes and colored scarfs.

Both Dad and Dr. Green are remembered walking around in Nazi uniforms and boots as they programmed people.

The dark background shows the darkness we felt, & the fear of everything. The electric wires shows several things--the electric shock and that the darkness was electrifying. In the lower left is our dollhouse (computer), and in the lower right is the candy cane representing The Candyman Programming. The song "The Candyman can cause he mixes it with love..." is programming for many Monarch victims. The Candyman represents drug use.

The road means travel, it may mean other things too.

We were one of the early Monarchs to be produced. Today, people are programmed almost assembly-line at a few locations that run children through on a regular basis. However, we think that they were still doing a lot of testing and experimenting when they made our System. Our System is far larger and more complex than the more recent Systems we have met. What happened was a combination of overdesign and competition. Because they were unfamiliar with how well things would work in the long run--they overdesigned and overprogrammed us. Then on top of that we were Dad's only heir to his Illuminati heritage at the time, and he wasn't taking any chances on losing us. Dad and Dr. Green competed against each other when they programmed us. They each tried to outdo each other. Dad put in back doors and numerous extra worlds to insure that his control would hold. Much of what Dad did was on the spiritual levels. Dad built many worlds which were entirely demonic inside us. In other words, they were placed in by Satanic acts, and these worlds contained no alters. They were hidden far behind any of the regular worlds of our System.

When the programmers program people, they do it on an ongoing basis. They will match the programming one receives with objects that surround a person in ordinary life. Our father ran in Pentecostal circles. He at some point was ordained to the Pentecostal ministry. That was his front. Because he and our mother would run in that type of circles, they used the Bible to program us. Every time we heard certain verses it would reinforce that programming. Today, we notice that many of the children's shows, and many of the adult shows on television are being used for programming purposes. There are numerous things in our life that were by accident or design that reinforced the programming.

When we went singing, they found out what songs we liked and attached programming to the songs.

This picture then shows two primary programmers. It was one of the first colored pictures we did. It was done by the front section, which we call the Light Side. The light side was coming to grips with the fact that their life included a dark side. The light side went for years without realizing the rest of the System (the dark side) existed.

Our System was a microcosm of the real world. We had some strong Christians, we had some people who enjoyed the world but were not committed to either Christianity or Satanism, and we had some hard core Satanists. Of course, it should be pointed out that just like those people who are not religious in the world, our non-religious alters still served Satan because of all the deceit they were under. Most worldly people would be shocked to realize that by going along with Satan's world system they are contributing to Satan's cause.

GROOMING

Training that we were given to help us fulfill our roles was called grooming.

Our grooming came in the lines of obedience, social graces, musical talents, sexual grooming, & porn grooming. Notice how the big hands take the little girls hands and guide them. Many talented people are giving their talents to the benefit of the New World Order crowd.

The picture is full of little items to make sure that the guilty (our abusers) are identified. The all-seeing eye and the eagle are shown. The fiddle is shown.

In the background is the tree, that ever present tree full of fruit (programs) that ran through our body. Our vertibrae were part of this, and each part of our spine represented a deeper section of our System. The tree ran its branches through our whole body.

As one might imagine in order to rub shoulders with the elite we had to have strong social graces. We were very mannered and knew exactly how to eat, and walk, and were trained to have intelligent conversations with the elite. However, things didn't stop there. They didn't invest great amounts of time and energy to program us just so we could make intelligent conversation. They didn't program us to have a little girl. Our daddy had a little girl to start with, he wanted a slave which he could abuse in the worst way. He had a little girl, but he didn't want a little girl.

Sexual training began as a little child. By the time one of the Kittens was trained at age 7, the system was experiencing menstration and fully cognizant of sexuality and had mastered a level of technique superior to most adults. This level of mastery was demanded by circumstances. During teenage years the training was perfected within the Kitten alters generally in the Long Beach-Southern California area in expensive houses/pent houses etc. Kittens have been taught Japanese sexual techniques, and most likely know among them about every sexual technique there is. The grooming was comprehensive. The night kittens have been trained to carry out everything in the dark, including all activities including dressing in the dark. Many Johns do not want anyone to ever see them, because they are Judges, and important ministers. Training includes being able to discern a. the pulse level of sexual pardner, b. the desires of pardner, c. the pleasure and satisfaction level of pardner, plus other things. Training was given often on the job. There is some coaching along with intense pressure applied to a System when its on the job --that is punishment for failure.

During the course of being a slave, the kittens have had to play hide and seek and other games. The preparatory command for this would be something like "Come to daddy, come and play hide and seek, come, come, come, play with me." The song "Little Red Riding Hood " was written specifically for the hunts where Monarch slaves were hunted for sport like animals. The hunts are held annually around May 1. The military carries out similar hunts for sport. The Illuminati men would hunt us.

A set of alters were created to serve as the hunted prey. They are deep in the system below the cats. These alters were created in places like Wheeler, OR in order to satisfy the desires of the Satanic cult who would play a game where little cult children were the prey of the hunt.

The front kittens received sophisticated exposure including such elite activities as going to opera and concerts. This enabled them to fit into elite society. They were given social skills, and allowed to learn some subjects very well, so that they could be social butterflies. However, they are very weak on directions and geography, because they were not to know where they were. One front kitten likes Shakespeare, Mozart, Beethoven, and classical music. Another front kitten likes history Picasso, philosophy, Shakespeare (Francis Bacon), and Edgar Allen Poe. She has much of Edgar Allen Poe's poetry memorized. However, this poetry may be memorized for occult ritual purposes and may not be exactly word for word as the original.

All of the top six Mama kittens are very good at ballroom dancing, waltzes, 2-& 3 step dancing as well as social graces. Section 4, Level 2a alter played four instruments--the piano, cello, violin, etc. Section 4, Level 4a can play the piano and one of her kittens can play the piano better than her. Most of the Mama cats instrumental music talent ceased when their Master (Dad) died. When they were with Dad the song Tennessee Waltz was used by Dad as a signal to the System that they were going to be given to someone else sexually for the night. Supposedly Daddy had no choice but to give them away (story line). The song line is that someone has come and taken one's love away. The song would be played (whether by the band) or some other way, then their name would be called, and their contact would come up to use them. Several songs have a strong message to return to the cult, because the person has received a "letter". Any communication by the handlers is considered a letter--whether that is a song, an actual letter, phone call or some other communication.

You will probably see other elements in the picture which you very likely will be able to figure out.

CANNIBALISM

This explanation of our picture is not a pleasant one. But it is part of what a great deal of our System was tragically forced to participate in. They would persist in the programming torture until they split us enough or programmed us enough to comply with their terrible plans.

It is only appropriate that this be included in our drawing. For too long things have been candy coated. The therapists want us to face reality--can the therapists face the real world? Can therapists get to the point where they can acknowledge that some of their heroes on television or in politics are Illuminati satanists who cannibalize victims in rituals. Vice-President Al Gore is a vampire and carries a briefcase of blood with him. This is the real world, and yet so many people who want us to face the real facts are in denial about reality too.

What appears as a wild animal has little girl hands. This little wild cat (girl) has blood around her mouth. Whenever a therapist deals with SRA, he should automatically assume that blood is involved. Some survivors will dislike red kool-aid or tomato juice because it hits to close to home.

The Word of God says that blood is holy and that blood is the life force of a being. Satanists believe that drinking blood will give them the spiritual life force of their victim.

Satanism has its share of blood rituals. Sometimes children are immersed in blood. Various animals and people are sacrificed. Blood lines, such as Jesus' blood line, are critical to being a member of the Illuminati. One of the last steps to achieve in Satanism is where one becomes animalistic. Actually, animals are much less wild. The last steps are to literally become vampires. The victims of sacrifice secrete enzymes as they look in terror at their last few minutes of life. Drinking their blood gives a high.

The Illuminati would gather for banquets. The men would wear tuxes, white tuxes, and there would be fine linen and gold or silver utensils (sometimes gold, othertimes silver). You might think that with all this refinement that a real banquet would be served. What was served at these meals was cannibalistic. They would devour the entire person's body. They might spare the left hand to hold a candle though. At other times, they used the fat and skin of some sacrifices for further uses. They made masks out of children's skin.

We remember the children being fed to lions and tigers. We remember what they taught us to do with children. They would keep torturing a System until they got someone who would do their bidding. Many of us in the System do not like what we had to do, but they would eventually find someone in our System who would do what they wanted, and they did about every horrible thing conceivable. The more diabolical it was, the more they liked it.

When they had us as a baby in cages they gave us blood instead of formula. Many girls at this age are given penises or you name it, before they even know what the objects are.

It is not an easy world for SRA survivors to live in. They need lots of love and lots of patience to make up for what they have seen. They will test you, they will provoke you. They want to know if they will ever find anyone who will not lie to them. They want to find good things, but it is not easy for them to trust that they will ever find good things. Most everything they have gotten in life came with a price.

This picture shows the depths of what we had to endure. We are so thankful that a few people were courageous and patient enough to help us escape that nightmare.

It is hard to trust that God could love us. It is hard for survivors to see God's forgiveness, and they need His forgiveness before they feel clean before the rest of humanity. The programming steals the love of God from its victim. Everything that was good was taken away or perverted to such a degree that we become possessive for the crumbs under the table. Nothing good ever lasted when we were in servitude.

TWINNING

It's best if a therapist is acquainted with twinning before trying to help an Illuminati slave.

Dr. Joseph Mengele, our primary programmer, used thousands of twins for experimentation. One of the common characteristics of victims of Monarch Mind-Control is that they think they have a twin somewhere. I can't state as a fact that they always do have one, but the survivors I have worked with all have actual Systems with which they have been via magic and programming twinned with.

The twinning of two MPD Systems provides a number of advantages to the Controllers. Sometimes jobs require a team rather than individuals. A team will also tend to motivate and encourage each other in the direction the Controllers want (in other words peer pressure). If one person wants to drop out of the program others can lift that person back up in place. Further, twinning can have experimental advantages. And it can provide back ups in case they want to be certain a dangerous job gets done.

Please note this important feature of our programming--all the Illuminati twins we know of were programmed to die if their twins were deprogrammed or if their twin would die.

A therapist may note that alters can be created that use capabilities that existed prior to the dissociative wall that separates them from their alter of origin. A system will have a common pool of capacities and capabilities. When we try to make sense out of the abilities that different alters have and their traits, we find that a System will have certain common characteristics. Some Systems are more logical, some are more cruel, some are more adept at conversation, some are more nurturing, some are more gentle, some are more comical as a whole. One of the features of MPD is that there is always somo unity among alters of a System as well as some disunity. There are many types of Baptists, or Mennonites for instanco, and to outsiders the different Baptist or Mennonite groups have common features, but to the insider the different factions are separate independent groups.

Different Systems will tend to be set up for a specialty. This Monarch System may be used as a programmer, this one for a nurturer during programming, and this System as a spy. Each of these Systems has many more possible uses, but the particular unifying quality they have that runs through their System will often be paired with their primary purpose. This is important to note, because the Illuminati and CIA build secret teams. Neither twin of a 2-person team has all the knowledge or abilities to get the job done. They must function as a team for best results. This is the same type of training the military gives. Each man in a squad gets a specialty, but he also has some training in the areas of those who he is teamed with.

Certain people are assigned oversight to two-person and four-person teams that have been secretly twinned together.

Our System had a code name in relation to another System which was the code name for the team, and then we had another code name for us as an individual. Cameo referred to us and another code word referred to our twin.

When Illuminati twins meet they must touch each other in a certain occult way and go through a certain ritual in order to become a working team. They can be joined up with another pair to make a 4-person team. It is believed that our four-person team was then spiritually linked to 4 Satanic programmers. This was another link to insure that the hold that they had on us could not be broken.

If a therapist is going to deprogram an Illuminati slave, the therapist should take into account that what he or she does to the victim they are trying to help, may be seriously hurting their twin.

Although the world is not ready to believe this, Monarch twins are given occult training to communicate telepathically. Anything that affects one of the twins, has the potential to affect the other twin. Because the world is not ready to accept the type of occult training that the Illuminati give their people they will scoff at the idea of astral projection, mind reading, telepathy etc. The CIA has spent hundreds of millions of dollars in these areas of research. One of the Systems we know was designed as a Theta model. This type of training was to prepare him as a psychic warrior. Our System was taught to put thoughts into people's heads, or to get into their minds. He was trained in these areas too. The occult world has not told all their secrets about these abilities. They try to give their Monarch slaves these special type of capabilities. Again, whether one wants to label these abilities as natural or demonic, they are part of the training built into Monarch Systems and they play a role in the lives of their victims. This is why some of the simplistic approaches toward dealing with victims of Monarch mind control fail so miserably. If the therapist finds these paranormal abilities hard to accept as real, the therapist at least can take into account that they play a big role in the thinking of the victims of Illuminati Mind Control.

For more on twinning read the next article called "Sisters."

SISTERS

In the picture we see two "twinned" sisters. Central to the picture is the clock pendalum which continues keeping time. Just like time continues to tick away whether we are conscious of it or not, the twinning programming continues to tick away inside Systems which have been twinned together.

It is common procedure in the Illuminati to adopt children out to other occult families in order to hide lineages and parenthood. Satanists will secretly impregnate women of the Illuminati in order to create secret siblings. From our experience it looks like actual half sisters are used for creating programmed twins. Perhaps there are exceptions, but that is what we saw growing up in the Illuminati. Even if there was an exception and the "twins" are not half sisters, after they have been programmed to believe so, then they function with that understanding. Many of the survivors of the type of mind control we experienced have been adopted or raised by people other than their actual parents.

Our dark side alters were not allowed to realize that they had a family in the world. The only family they knew was the cult family. Aunts who were already in the Illuminati as Mothers of Darkness helped program and groom us. One of these aunts required us to thank her when she electo-shocked us. We thanked her for having disciplined us to make us good. From what we know, the generational Satanic families have been creating MPD for generations. Our father and aunts had MPD.

Our Monarch twin sister was trauma-bonded to us. In other words, some of the same type of programming that bonded us to our abusers was used to bond us to our "twin". Therapists would do twinned sisters a favor if they make a effort to console and counsel with their clients' twins. At times, the therapist has no idea that his client is bonded very closely with someone else. If one twin goes into the hospital the other one feels it. If one dies, the other twin may very well die.

Monarch twins will have alters in each others Systems who look like the other person, and who have the same names. Male twins and female twins may well have parts of their Systems which relate to each other sexually. Parts of our System were placed in competition with parts of our twin for the affection of our programmer. I say this so that people understand how the bonding between two Systems can be on many different levels, and is complex. Just because two front alters of two Systems don't have a close relation, doesn't mean that deeper parts don't feel very close. The trauma bonding will produce a love-hate relationship between 2 Systems too.

When two Systems meet, a wild party takes place as dozens of alters pop in and out and communication takes place on many different levels.

Besides having alters which are images of our twins, we had mirror images of all our alters. Understanding a Monarch multiple's System is not easy.

For more on twinning programming see the previous page on Twinning.

FEAR!

Monarch Programming can be summed up by one emotion FEAR.

FEAR crashes through the System like the tidal waves in the bottom of the picture.

Life under the programming is hell. The fires of hell burn portraying the fire torture and the mind's own internal hell pit. Crossing programming bounderies caused the body to burn. Then the horrible burning would be followed by the shattering of the mind.

The programmer's (our first one was Dr. Mengele, aka Dr. Green) internal boxes in the lower right are opening and all hell is breaking loose. The shattered glass shows the shattered fragile mind. The shattered glass also tells the reason why this picture was made. The System was told by its therapist to break a mirror. The therapist did not know that demons are connected with the mirrors, and memories are hidden behind the mirrors. Breaking a mirror releases hordes of terrifying demons. The memories were locked up by torture and sexual sealing rituals. The sexual sealing was to implant demons who would protect the memories. Suicide programming is released when the mirror is broken. The demons carry the controlling force that has been driving our programming. When they were correctly dealt with, we for the first time in our lives no longer felt driven.

The System has many child alters like the one on top who have been terrified. The mind screams silently.

The mazes represent the internal mazes in the mind, and the compartments and rooms of the mind. A dollhouse was set up in our system. The Dollhouse was part of the Omega programming--which is the computer structuring within the System.

A large dollhouse was used as the imagery to create the structure of the front computers in the little girl's mind. Each level corresponds to a room in the dollhouse. The rooms are in different colors. The rooms have ways that they connect. The rooms have hidden closets and hidden boxes. Each room is operated by a particular colored light. Unscrewing the light takes out that computer's energy source. The deepest level of the Omega programming was the dollhouse basement. Ten other rooms were tentatively identified in our system, they were the Formal Room, the Door & Entryway, Bathroom, Sitting Room, Closet, Kitchen, and Living Room. The rooms were identified with an area of the System and a color.

Notice the mirrors on the left which are shattered. Our System's memories were protected by spiritual entities (demons of various appearances) who were released when the mirrors were shattered. They carry the controlling force that gives impetus to cut, hang, run, tear, and disembowell etc. They were the force behind the programming. They carried a great deal of fear with them.

A great cat can be seen. This great cat has a long occult history. In our System the great cat visited with the Mothers of Darkness alters. It is the president of the Sovereign chiefs and the governor of the holy circle. "Thou art indeed the Great Cat."

Sometimes the great internal cat sits at your feet looking into your face with an expression filled with kindness, warmth and understanding. The depth of its eyes seem eternal all knowing and all powerful. Then its anger engulfs the cats and it raises up in its fury and paralizes the System. This is its warning, "Do not go any further."

Wild beasts of different kinds are terrified and spread terror in the System.

Where is the light at the end of the tunnel for all this terror and trauma? That light is to retreat into a phantasy world. The girl looks into her fantasy world while she clutches her symbol of helplessness, her teddy bear.

WE'RE NOT SAFE UNTIL HIS HEAD IS MOUNTED ON MY WALL! I SAY--
669
A-HAA-- I KNOW JUST THE THING!
LOVE IT!

THE HORROR, TORTURE & ABREACTION OF MEMORIES

When a System of Monarch alters finds out about itself all types of programming is triggered.

This picture was done after information triggered memories.

The out of control Freedom train is running down its track. Internal and external controllers are pictured. The checkered path is the yellow brick road that the System is being compelled to travel.

The top of the picture shows the branches of the tree which run through the entire system and hold the programming as fruit on their limbs.

The world of blackness is pulling the System under. The soul is being tormented by suicidal thoughts. Beasts rip the girl apart. The master credit card has a duel purpose. an actual credit card was used to access the System. The System was given credit to buy as long as the System behaved. The Master's credit made him appear benevolent; the master's credit was a key to our affection.

Internal wolves (demonic entities) prowl through the System.

Our Master is pictured saying, "A-Haa I know just the thing" because our Master decided what clothes we wore, what our names were, and what our activities would be.

Many items in the picture serve more than one meaning.

The out of control Freedom train also reminds us that we were commanded as a child to walk down a railroad track to be met and accessed by our Master.

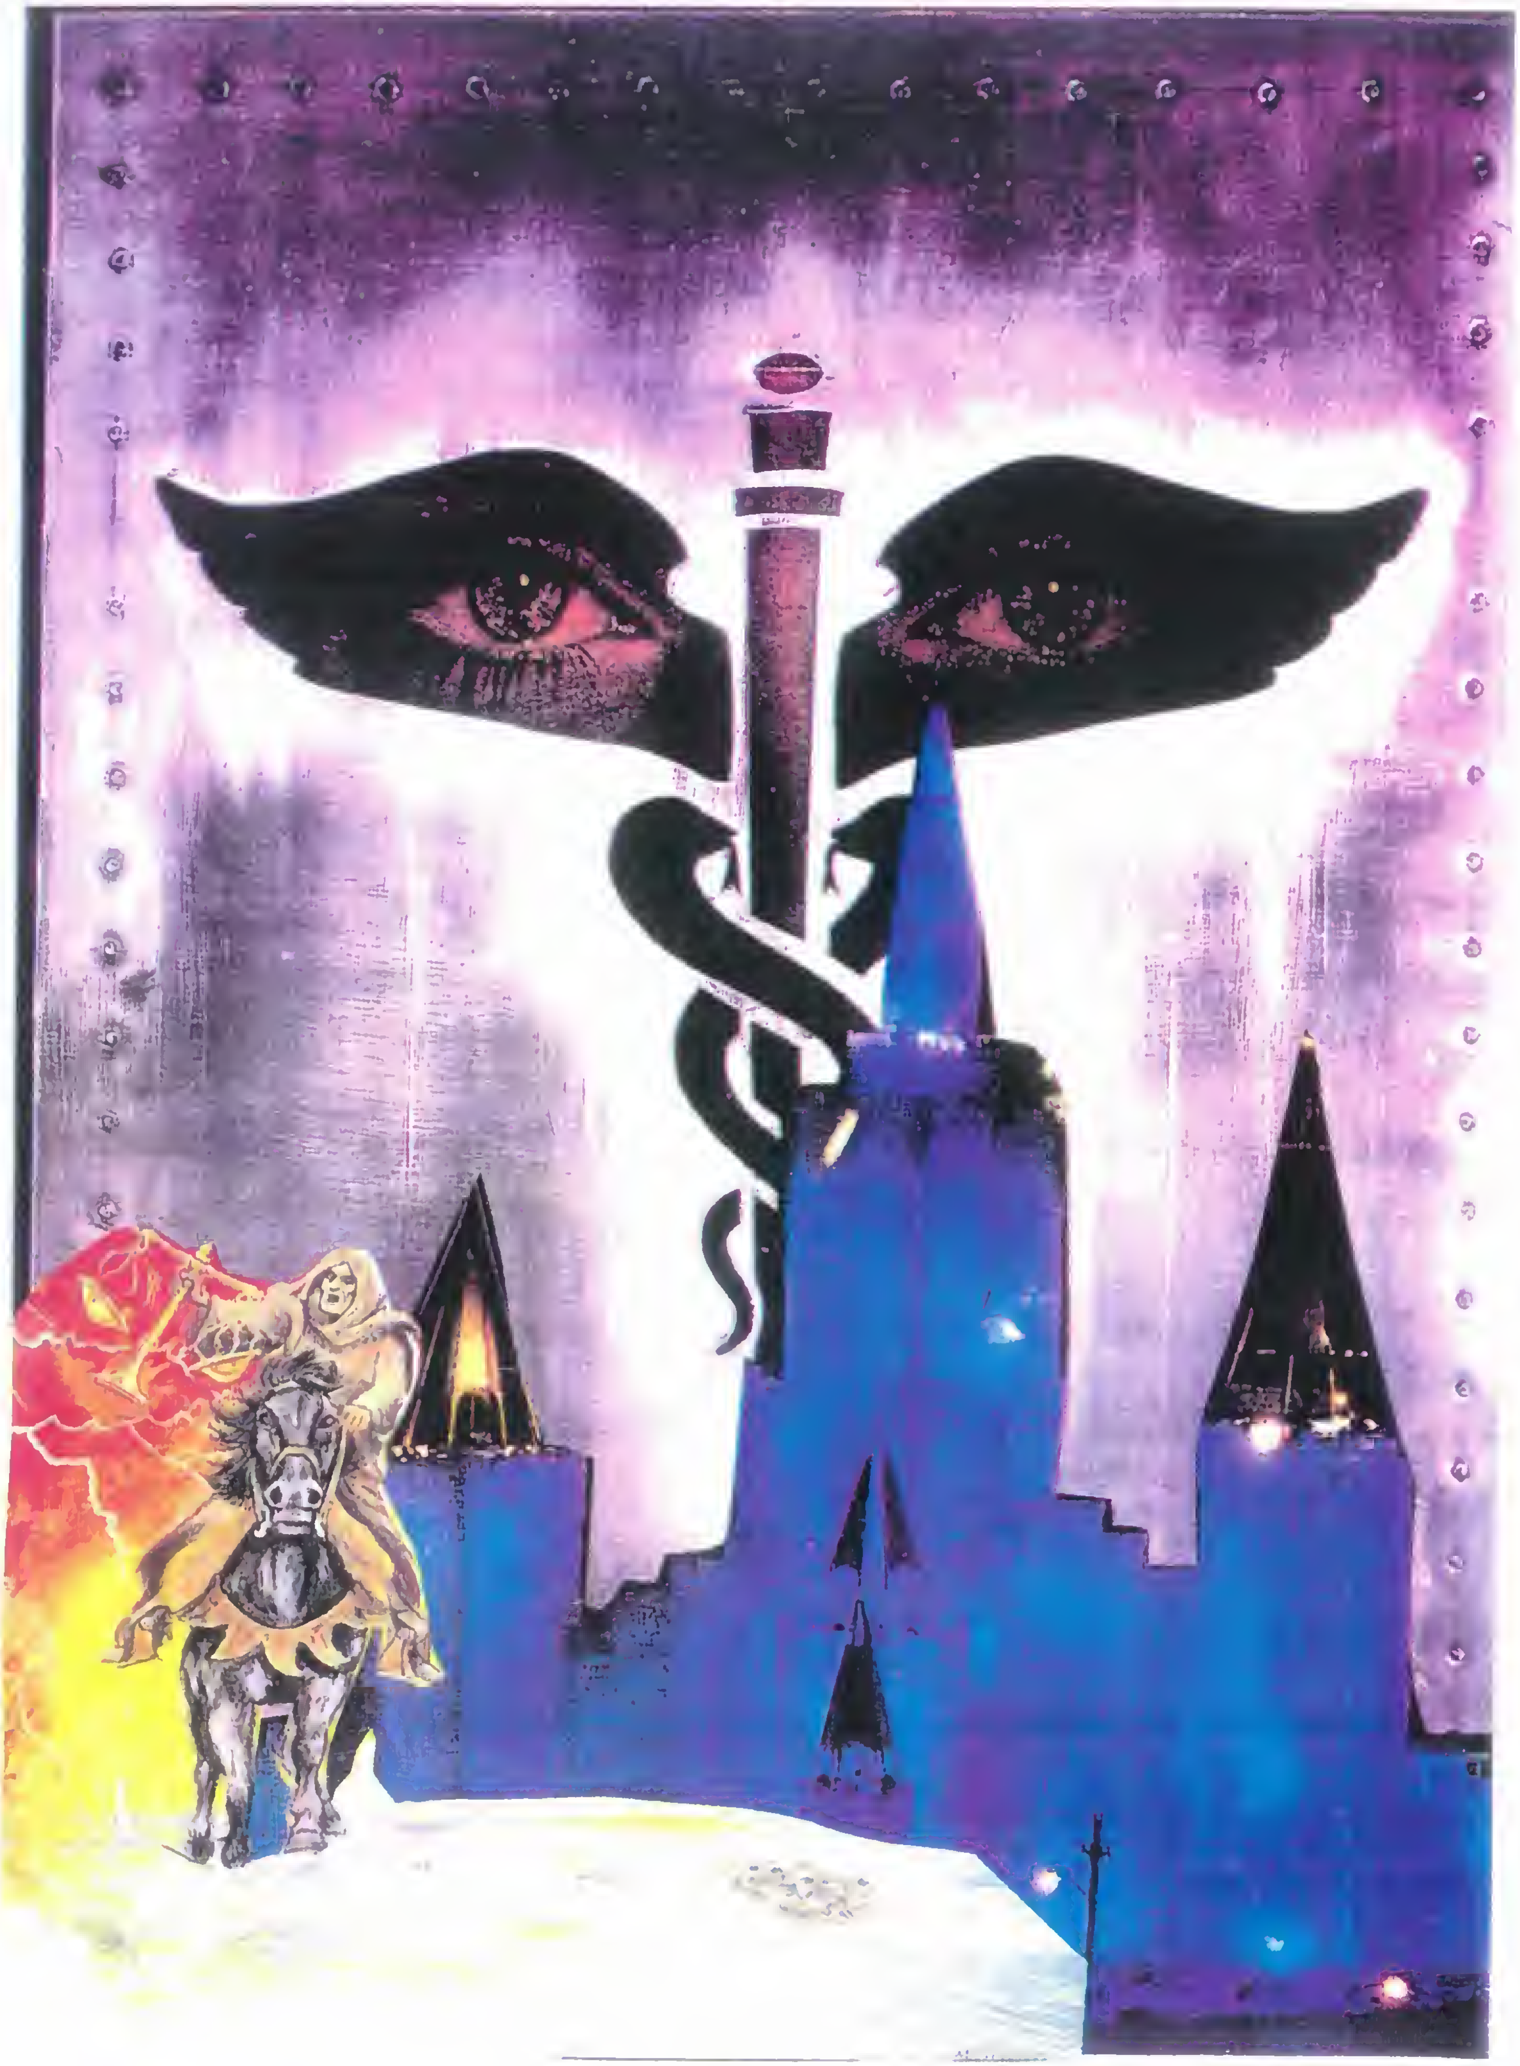
The System transported things so the mule and the airplane have personal meaning to the System on how the System was used.

One of the System's castles, the Emerald City, is seen in the background. Many types of castles were built into our different quadrants which were connected to hour glasses rotating on x,y and z axes.

How many different emotions by the girl are shown in this picture? There is fear, puzzlement, happiness, anger and death to name some of them. These emotions were all going off in the System at one point in time. The one in the upper left has her head turned away indicating that some alters turned their backs on the whole mess and stayed in denial.

Our System would experience something and different alters will react to the same event differently depending upon what collection of abilities and personality traits they have. Different alters carried different memories. When memories began surfacing we were told that abreaction to memories was good. But instinct told us just the opposite. Later, we learned that abreaction is not neccessary and is actually dangerous. However, when the programming is still running, the System would flood with memories and nobody had the know how to protect us from the flooding. Much of the help that therapists can give Monarch Mind-Controlled Slaves is in the area of dealing with memories. Therapists can help the victim learn how to distance themself from the memory when it comes up, and how to dispose of the memory. One of the items that our System tried was to write memories down to pull the memory through another area of the brain.

The out of control Freedom Train is an apt portrayal of how helpless we have felt at times in dealing with our memories. The torture and abuse is designed so that the mind will protect itself from the trauma via disassociation.



CONDITIONING & DRUGS

When we began to break free of the programming, we had bits and pieces of what was done to us. We also began getting memories back in bits and pieces.

Our System was conditioned by our programmers just like you would train an animal. Some of our parts were used to help the programmers program others. Victims who are being programmed can be hypnotized even if they try to resist by a few grams of paraldehyde or an introvenous injection of sodium pentothal or sodium amytal. As we look back we can begin to describe things which were done to us such as Aversion Therapy to groom us, and electro shock to destroy our memory of events. We have alters who will beg their handler to be electro-shocked or beg to be hurt and punished. We were programmed to believe that we deserved such cruel treatment. Some alters feel pain & punishment is love. After punishing us, our controllers would laugh at us for having begged to be hurt, adding insult to injury. They could hypnotically heal some of our wounds which helped them rationalize their cruelty to us. They also felt they were setting us up for a great career in the Illuminati.

Our System received a wide array of mind-altering drugs and a vast amount of electro-shock. From the memories we have been getting it is possible to begin to catalog some of the drugs they may have used on us during programming. Sometimes we feel a need to cut our veins, as if we were remembering a bad LSD trip. Sometimes we feel like we are suffocating and drowning, as if anectine had been injected into us for misbehavior. We know that drugs were given us to allow them to hypnotise us very deeply. Our trances were taken almost to the point of death. Sometimes our body feels like it is on fire. Some of the burning may well have been conditioned into us via drugs which cause extreme sensations of being burned alive.

They could put us into a "twilight sleep" with the use of injected drugs. In the Twilight sleep state our subconscious mind was very susceptible to suggestions. They set up our System, so that for years we only slept for short periods and never went into REM sleep. They made sure that we self abused our own mind, by only sleeping in those phases of sleep that enhanced their mind control.

The most dangerous alters in our System were created by desensitization to violence, along with several other programming tricks. Our System and other Systems who are also getting free along with us, independently remembered the high speed films which were shown us. We remember being strapped in a chair while one film was shown in one eye and another in the other eye. Violence was shown in one eye, and family vacations, etc. in the other. Violent films were shown to some of the deeper alters to the point blood and gore mean nothing to them. They were also conditioned to believe they are elite and that everyone is their enemy. By teaching them to hate their enemies, when these alters are needed to kill, they can access those memories of hate and feelings toward enemies. Handlers know how to make alters feel threatened if they want alters to hurt someone.

One thing we found out over the years is that our programmers kept records on us. They recorded every ritual, every memory, every torture, and they kept track of those memories with codes. When they wanted to blackmail us, they showed us past films of what we had done. When our self-governing programming wanted to keep an alter in line, the internal programmers would bombard that alter with a horrible memory that would keep recycling. We had layered programming on top of memories. In fact, they at one point tried to destroy our minds by recycling horrible memories. This happened when we hit a back-up program called the Princess Program. Several other survivors also had the same series of difficulties when they hit their back-up Princess Programming too. These memories had been stored in our castle's torture dungeon.

Our memories of being used were often locked behind posthypnotic blocks, and only the Programmers (internal and external) have known what the alpha-numeric cues were to release those memories. They layer in false memories and false messages to protect the real. False memories do not have the variety of sensations that the real memories have. In our real memories, we can hear, and feel, and smell etc. everything that is going on.

During the time that they used us, we noticed that they generally got what they wanted from most people. If a politician or soldier or other desirable person did not on their own want to serve their cause, they would bribe them. If they couldn't be bribed then, they were threatened and bribed or blackmailed and bribed. If that failed, the person could be mentally rearranged to suit their needs or simply TWEPed (terminated with extreme prejudice). Unfortunately, parts of our System were designed to help them do these things.

Half a dozen of us who knew each other have managed to get out. Our experiences in being used together and having experienced the same things validate to us what happened. In addition to this, our best friend managed to witness how we were being accessed and being used. It sounds on paper like it was easy to put the pieces together as to what had been done to us. Actually, it wasn't so easy because they scattered and buried so many of our memories deep in our mind locked up by almost unbreakable techniques that almost totally insure that their secrets will remain secrets.

ALICE IN MONARCHLAND

The picture has Alice in its center and is full of mirrors which are represented by the various reflecting glass objects. At the time this picture was done it showed some things which were very important to the System. The King is King Ahab and he is defending his vineyard with Jezebel.

Although this drawing has a story behind it, it also gives us an opportunity to explain what we would like to say about the book Alice In Wonderland. When we were programmed we got not only Wizard of Oz programming, and programming which misused the Bible stories (such as King Ahab), but we also got Alice In Wonderland programming. Our System has its share of mirror images and reversals. We would go through the looking glass, and we would fall down an oak tree by falling into a deeper and deeper trance.

Monarch programming is a reflection of how Satan's mind works. Lewis Carroll's book with its inversion themes fits in with this type of thinking. Lewis Carroll loved the humor of logical contradictions. In the book, Alice wonders if cats eat bats or bats eat cats, and she is told that to say what she means is not the same as meaning what she says. When she eats the left side of the mushroom, she grows large; the right side has the reverse effect. These changes in size are in themselves reversals. A large girl and small puppy end up to be a large puppy and a small girl. In Sylvia and Bruno, we are presented with an antigravity wool that can be placed into a parcel to make it weigh less than nothing, a watch that reverses time, a black light, and a projective plane with outside inside and inside outside. We learn that E-V-I-L is simply L-I-V-E backwards.

In the looking glass world, the Red Queen knows of a hill so large that compared to it the hill in question is a valley. Also she knows of dry biscuits which quench thirst, a messenger who whispers by shouting, and Alice who runs as fast as she can to stay in one place. (Sometimes it seems we really do have to run fast to stay in place.)

The King of Hearts thinks its not unusual to write letters to nobody, and the White King compliments Alice on having keen enough eyesight to see nobody at a great distance down the road. Can you see why this book was so good to program us?

In the book Through the Looking Glass all asymmetrical objects (that means all objects which can't be superimposed on their mirrored image) "go the other way." There are left-right reversals. Tweedledee and Tweedledum are mirror image twins. The White Knight sings about squeezing his right foot into a left shoe, and there are several mentions of corkscrews. A Helix (a corkscrew) is an asymmetric structure with distinct left and right forms. The book's type of thinking was extended beyond asymmetrical objects to asymmetrical relations of all types. For example, Alice walks backward, in the railway carriage the guard tells her she is traveling the wrong way. The king has two messengers, "one to come and one to go." The White Queen explains the advantages of living backward in time, the looking glass cake is handed around first, then sliced. Odd and even numbers, which are equivalent to left and right or on and off are worked into the story at several points. For instance, the White Queen requests jam every other day.

Going through the looking glass takes us to a world where the ordinary world is turned upside down and backward. Things go every which way except the way they are supposed to go.

Anti-matter is a mirror image. Anti-matter milk will explode Alice, but an Anti-matter Alice on the other side of the looking glass can drink the anti-matter milk.

In Chapter 11 Alice captures the Red Queen. It results in a legitimate checkmate of the Red King, who has slept through the entire live size chess game without moving. The checkmate ends the dream, but leaves open in the story the question of whether the dream was Alice's or the Red King's. The programming has so often been only a dream to us. The outside world was so often just an unreal dream to us. What was real and what was not real? The real world (for other people) was full of contradictions, and the unreal world (our internal world) was consistent. Everything was upside down, forwards and backwards. In the Looking Glass book, one shuttles back and forth mysteriously between real and dream worlds. "So, either I've been dreaming about life or I only dream that life is but a dream."

As we broke away from our programming our life was a bewildering confusion as we were pulled between two worlds. The internal world had everything we needed, the external world was a harsh cold reality that didn't have much to offer. We are thankful that there were people in the external world which helped make it real for us, and who gave us a reason to want to come out of the internal reality which we were programmed to believe in. For so long much of life was a dream. It was hard to get a grasp on what was real and what was the lie. Many of the lies were more real to us when we were programmed than the truth. Life was sometimes like the parallel dreams of the Red King and Alice, like two mirrors facing each other.

Lilith

Our System was designed by the Illuminati. To understand it fully, requires that people learn something about the beliefs and practices of the Illuminati.

Our System was designed to function in Illuminati rituals. Our Mothers of Darkness alters were taught those things that the Illuminati think are important for their people to know. The alters, who are in this picture, are our Mothers of Darkness alters who were skilled in a number of areas for the cult.

Recently, on television a show portrayed a village of women who have sex with males and then sacrifice them. The show was portraying by accident or secret design the ritual practice of the Mothers of Darkness. The false gods of Babylon, India and Egypt had false trinities. The Mothers of Darkness alters are on pedestals and they have been taught that they are goddesses. On each pedestal is a trinity of 3 Mother alters who spin together. One alter is the maiden, one is the mother, and the other is the old crone. The old crone is the wise one which lurks in the background.

The owl in the System was just one way that our Master made his presence known. The owl is an important guiding source of wisdom in the occult world.

The tree roots are symbolized by the veins of the leaves that run behind all the activity of the dark part of the System seen here. The tree roots and branches ran through our System. This tree got its life from the blood of sacrifices. What do I mean by this?

The story of Lilith plays a role in the makeup of our System.

What our Mothers of Darkness learned about Lilith was that she was the first wife of Adam. She was very rebellious, and got kicked out of the Garden of Eden by God. Almighty God then created Eve from Adam. Eve would be more obedient because she was from his own flesh. Meanwhile Lilith got enraged and dashed her new born son's head against a rock. Her son called out to Satan. The earth cries out to God for revenge for the innocent blood that has been shed. In Satanism, this is reversed. The blood of Lilith's son cries out to Satan for revenge. This is in rebellion against God. The blood continually calls to Satan for revenge. The blood is the eternal life force. The blood keeps the tree alive. The tree contains the programming and the programming is taken care of by the demons. The blood of Lilith's son is in a box beneath our System's tree. On top of the box is the blood of the first male child we were forced to sacrifice. This is what gives life to the tree that runs through our System/& our body.

Note that the box opens up to 9 chambers which are part of the Caballistic Tree of Life. Our programmers were adepts at Caballistic magic.

It is very significant to renounce and break the blood oaths and blood sacrifices. This was an important part of our journey toward freedom.

MOLOCH

This picture is very revealing. This picture tears away at the secrecy of the most innermost major mechanisms of the System. For instance, the mice run up and down and open up new levels of programming and are tied to the pendalum/clock mechanism. The mice can activate the hour glass, and a gold-winged green skirted fairy Whisper balances the hour glass on her wings. First, we will concentrate on the top figure the horned Bull which represents Moloch. Then we will discuss the Quadrants, Compass, Thor, etc.

The top figure in this picture is Moloch. We had a Temple of Moloch in our System where they put the memories of the babies that were sacrificed.

There is a great deal of disinformation and skepticism about child sacrifices. Much of this comes from the control of the Illuminati over our entire educational/information dispensing process.

However, there is overwhelming evidence that the Satanic practices of today have been historically practiced for many thousands of years. The massive ancient burial site of Tanit (known in Hebrew as Tophet) has been uncovered by archeologists near Jerusalem. This burial site has burial urns used for the ashes of sacrificed babies which have pictures and decorated text which refer explicitly to the child sacrifices that the urns were part of. There were over 7,000 burial urns from the late period of use of the burial site. All levels of society, from rich to poor sacrificed their children to appease the gods--especially the god commonly known as Moloch. The elite bloodlines of the Mystery Religions (what is now called the Illuminati) carried out sacrifices of their children more often than the average people of that day. The Tanit ritual site was used for over a thousand years (and probably is in use today secretly). The thousands of baby remains and thousands of burial urns are unrefutable proof that infant sacrifice not only existed in ancient times, it went on for thousands of years.

Several historical works refer to the Council of Elders in Sparta who would inspect newborn babies. If the babies didn't make the grade of this inspection the Council of Elders would have them killed by throwing them off Mt. Tagggetus into the Apotheta. As a child of an Illuminatus, our System was taken before the Grand Druid Council and given an inspection while we were nude. The inspection was very indepth. Fortunately, we past the test. There are physical criteria concerning the body which must be met.

One of the young men our Mothers of Darkness helped program for the Illuminati worked for Manly P. Hall. Manly P. Hall sat on the Grand Druid Council at one time. He is dead now. His massive book The Secret Teachings of All Ages is a major reference work on the Mystery Religions. On page C (page 100) he talks about rings. "In the Mysteries, rings chased to resemble a serpent with its tail in its mouth were worn by the initiates as material evidence of the position reached by them in the order." Both our actual father, who was at one time a Grand Master, and the person we were given to after he died (who was also a Grand Master), wore silver rings with a snake swallowing its tail. This is proof for those who have publicly seen those rings on their fingers that these men who were our masters had powerful positions within the Illuminati which is the continuation of the Mystery Religions. Freemasonry claims to be a continuation of the Mysteries also. Although Freemasonry functions more as a school to preserve the symbology and ritual than being the actual organization.

By the way, when our deeper Grande Dame alters helped program that young man, they helped make glitches in the programming so that the programming would later be defective. Obviously, they did this very quietly behind the backs of the Programmers. This man was later able to break free of his Monarch Mind Control. We are happy that we played the first step in his journey to freedom.

At the center of the System are the mechanisms that control it, such as the Master Computer, the All-Seeing Eye, the Compass, the Master Clock, and the Quadrants that tie in together. The System had 3 hourglasses spinning on axes. These hour glasses can also be called matrixes, which are on your standard 3 axes, a X axis, a Y axis & a Z axis. The worlds are various sections of these matrixes. The picture shows how there are backup worlds & mirror image worlds. We have a double system. Each alter was split so that every alter has another alter created from her. Then there are demonic doubles--demonic mirror images in the System. The double images shown in the picture are very real when describing our System. Some therapists have noticed "Satanic Guardian Angels" which talk to their patients. They do not know what to make of these. Some classify them as hallucinations, because they do not have any room in their belief system for demonology. These are the demons that do control the multiple's mind. Thor, with his hugh hammer turned out to be a painful demon. Thor was in our System, and is depicted as a black stone figure at the top. His hammer is behind the top of the girl on the far right. When his hammer would strike, we'd get split brain headaches. They used the story of the Giant with the Hammer in the Ozma of Oz book (pp. 141-155) to give us the imagery when programming us. A special series of sweeping motions with both hands will relieve the split brain programming, but some alters can only tolerate these hand signals being done by the master. Our Thor was made of cast iron & carried an iron mallet. We had to use God's spiritual power & the Blood of Jesus Christ of Nazereth to destroy the Temple of Moloch.

BUTTERFLIES

The person may look on the outside like they have it together, but on the inside the participants of the Mysteries have been fragmented. The person and the therapist have only pieces to work with. Even if those pieces seem innocent, somewhere in the fragmented mind are memories such as what our Temple of Moloch held. There was nothing that was not done to us.

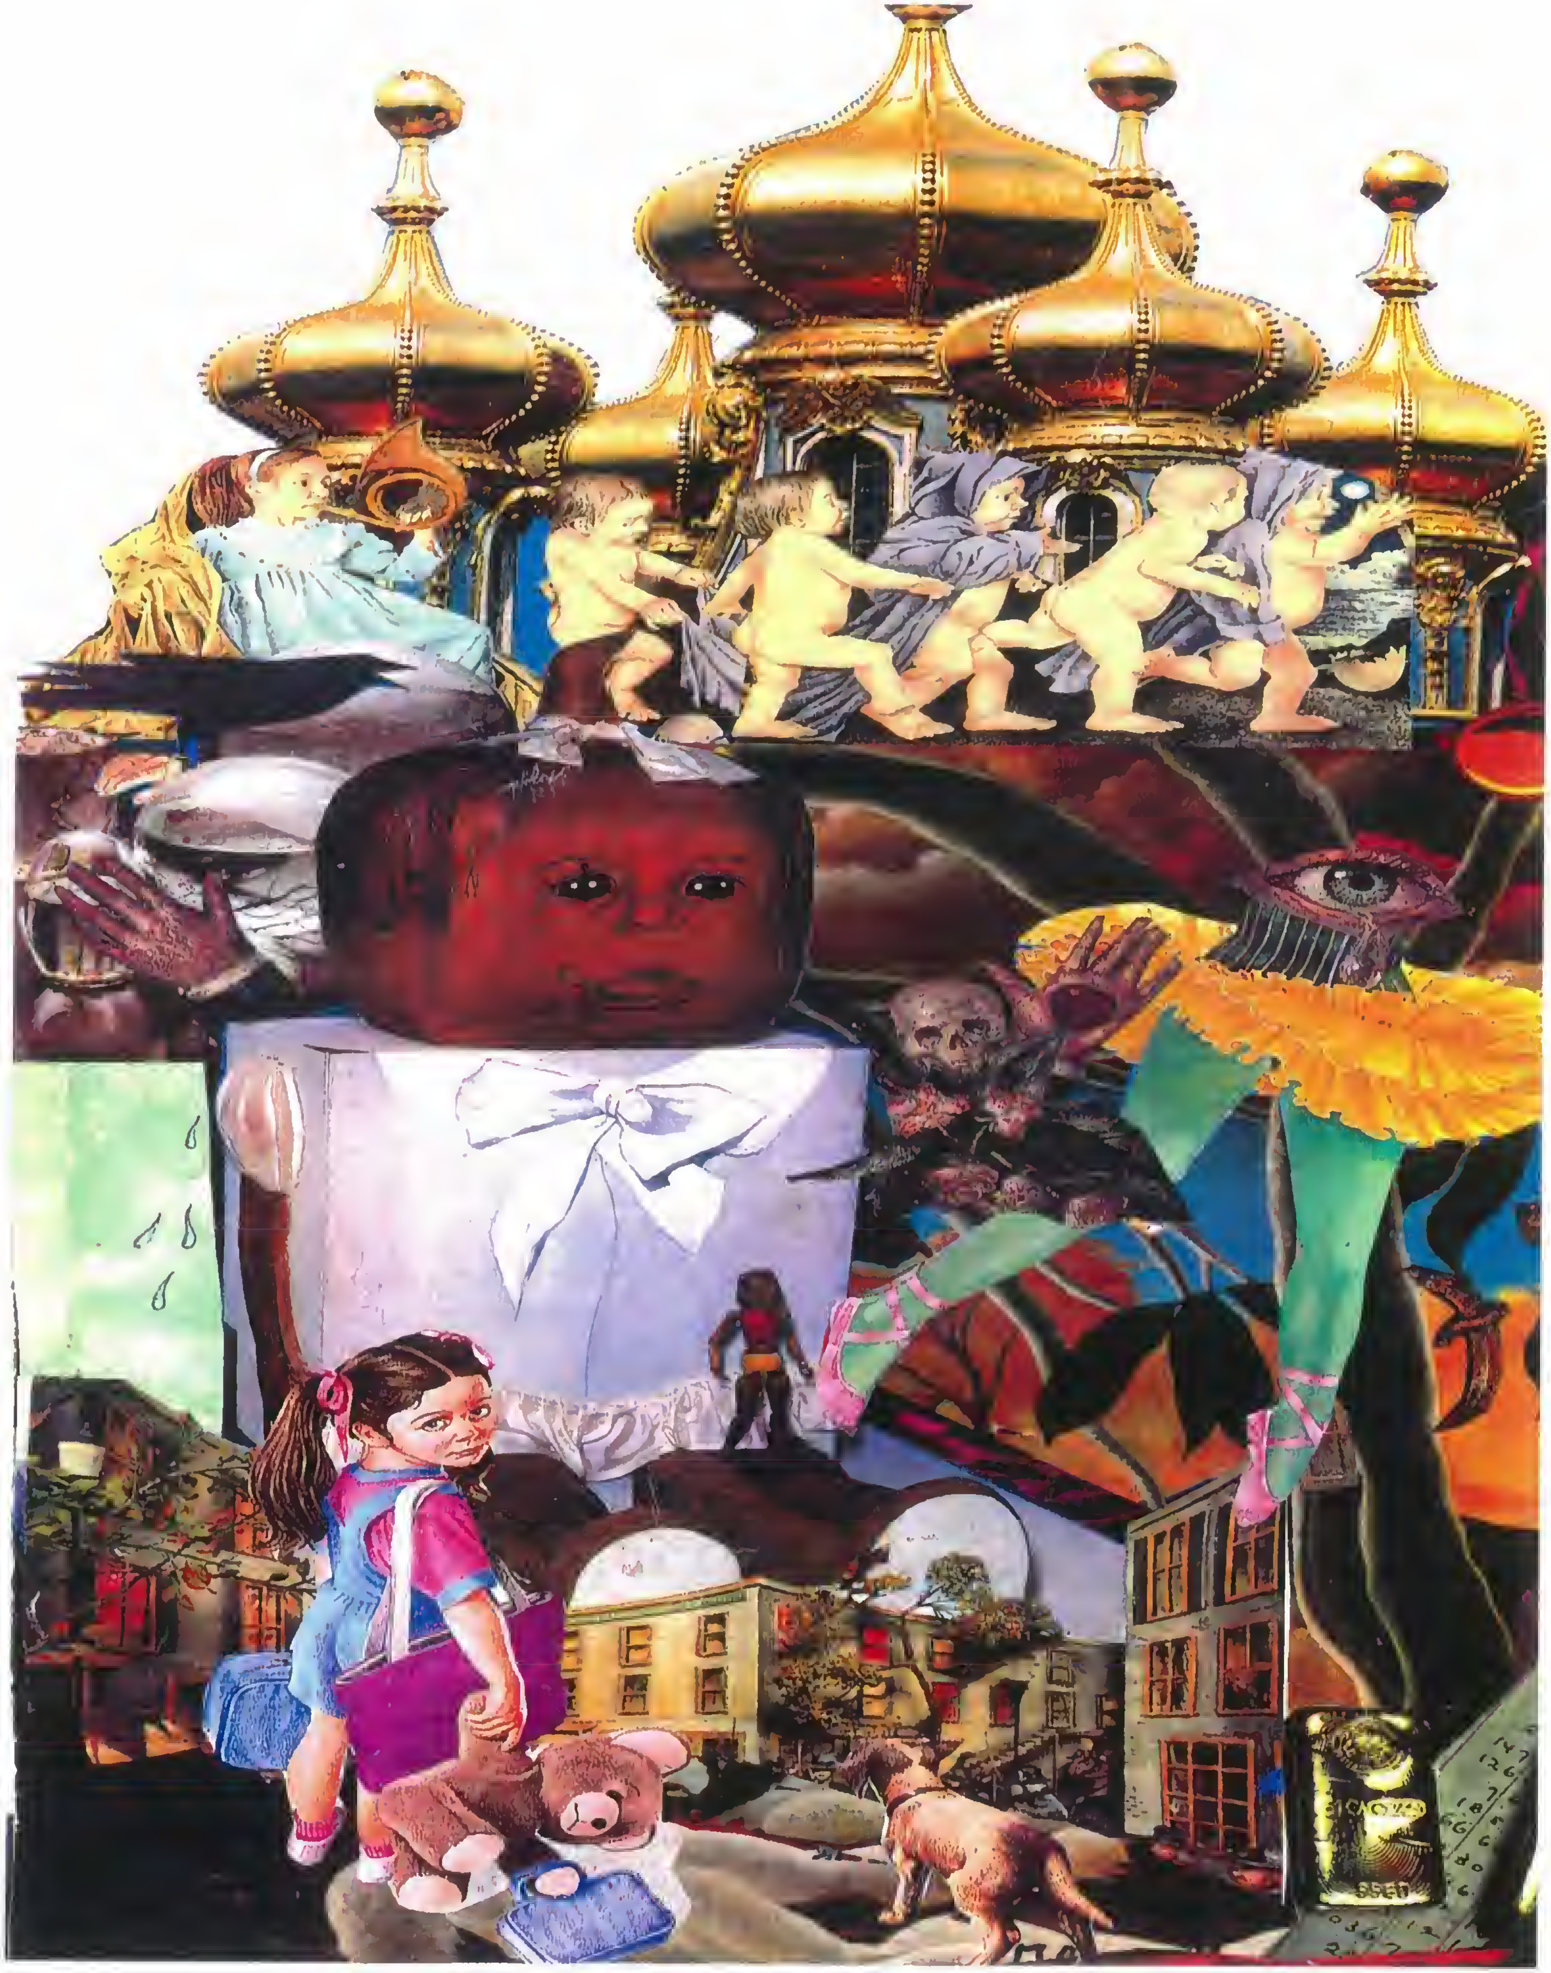
One of the tortures they put us through was a humiliating butterfly torture. It is very painful to remember, and very humiliating.

Sometimes we have silently cried out for help. The blue butterfly represents the Monarch Programming. Small blue butterflies would be tatooed on some of their victims. We have worn butterflies berrets out of a combination of a facination for what was programmed into us, a silent call for help, and a silent expose of what they have done.

We also have butterflies in our System, thousands of them. Some are very beautiful.

The picture tells that there is a story. There is an untold story of thousands of what appear to be beautiful women who are on the inside of their minds merely beautiful CIA butterflies. There is the untold story of how their humanity was violently stripped from them and how they were dehumanized. And no one has stopped the production of these human butterflies.

The Monarch butterfly is said to always go home to its point of origin. There the Monarch butterfly creates a new generation, like the salmon which return to their point of origin. We were given a relatively inactive period of use when the cult left us alone to raise our family when the age of the body was in its 30s. We were later to go back to replace our Aunt's position in the Hierarchy. By allowing us to raise a family, we developed a good cover, and we provided them with more items to blackmail us with. They threatened us repeatedly that if we did not comply that we would lose our kids and grandchildren. One of people we were teamed with did lose a son. He was killed via his programming. We hope that his death was not in vain. We are going to speak the truth so that his death was not in vain.



DESTRUCTIVE EPISODES

As more and more people learn about the Monarch Mind Control, there are more and more cases of people who don't grasp that you just don't walk up to someone under this type of trauma-based mind control and tell them that they are under mind control.

The victim doesn't know he or she is a victim--nor may they. The victim is not allowed to know. If they were to realize the truth, they are programmed to commit suicide. It is the ultimate safety device to insure the programmers' secrets.

Many of the victims of Monarch programming have been improperly diagnosed a Paranoid Skizos, and many of them have been hauled off to mental hospitals when they tried to escape their programming. Our abusors often threatened that if we tried to escape we would have this or that bad thing happen, and one of those was to end up in a mental hospital.

Our family just could not understand that if we had a problem that our problem wasn't like the problems they were used to. If the mind-controlled slave does realize something of their mind control, who would believe them? Who could help them? The System is set up to catch run away Monarch slaves. The Illuminati control the help lines that survivors might want to call for help. Many of the therapists are multiples themselves, and many of them are plants. About half of the therapists in our area working with Monarch victims are multiples themselves who are plants of the Illuminati! These plants influence the legitimate therapists. This happens at meetings the therapists have together and in other places and ways.

This means the escaping mind-controlled slave is on his or her own a great deal of the time. Sometimes to reduce the pressure of the suicide programs, slaves will act out what their mind tells them to do. Rather than cut with a real knife a plastic one can be used or a dull a pair of plastic scissors used. Or maybe if the desire is to cut, channel that toward cutting paper.

The elements in this picture show how suicidal a System can get. The dwarfs were always protecting the programming. Boxes and other things also protected the programming, and presented problems if they were opened. An octopus strangling program might be released. One of the programs was to make us feel like we were fragile paper doll cut outs. They used a story in the Wizard of Oz series for that programming. We would get so fragile that to touch us, would make us feel like we were shattering into a million pieces.

Death is in the center of this picture. The little girl is facing all this mess. One of the methods it seems that a survivor will self-destruct is that the programming pushes certain alters to look into things that will cause self-destruction. It is hard to tell a survivor that there are limits to what they should look at in their System. They may push themselves so hard in looking for answers that they self-destruct.

Notice the small puppet in front of Dr. Green's box. Many of our alters believed the programming that we are merely a puppet--a marionette puppet of Dr. Green's. As a puppet we have no thoughts of our own. If we were told to self-destruct to preserve the goals of our puppet masters we would do it. Now we have more control over own life.

Death surrounds the escaping slave on every side like a fog, but the help that is there is often only in the form of a therapist once a week. Many therapists have found out that taking on an escaping cult slave is like a full time job. Unfortunately, professional therapists do not have the time to devote to a client like this. Therapists can form teams or help each other by being back ups for each other when the other is gone. Still there is not a good answer short of providing 24 hour expert supervision if success is wanted. We would never have survived our destructive episodes if we had not had expert 24 hour supervision.

The picture's teddy bear shows how helpless the girl feels. People coming to therapists need others to continually tell them that they are not helpless. The Monarch survivor needs constant reassurance that they can make sound choices and that they can seek answers within themselves, and that they can achieve power over the programming.

Besides the programming, there are guilt issues and other issues that can trigger destructive episodes in a System. However, the bottom line is shown at the top of this picture. Destructive episodes are a spiritual issue. Destructive episodes are usually demonically powered. When we got rid of the destructive demons in our System, we got rid of the power that wanted us to commit suicide. Spirits of Death and many thousands of similar Spirits drove us toward self-destructive behavior. The mind must be free of this type of control to make positive choices.

This picture is again full of the items that ran through our mind. The gold, the code numbers at the bottom right, the ravens, the dancing, and the all-seeing eye to list a few.

AWAKING!

This picture was one of our first collages. The alter who did this was beginning to awaken to what had been done to us. However, the idea that our father could be linked to any abuse was so radical of a thought that the picture didn't show his face, only his hat underneath the girl.

It is possible some people see this picture as only a bunch of colors on a sheet of paper, but to us it is a picture of significance.

The horse symbolizes our Master and the little girl is meeting him. The Freedom train's railroad tracks represent the actual railroad tracks this alter walked on to get the System to the location it was accessed at.

But who can believe all this? Part of the ongoing abuse cycle is that the System must pretend to the outside world that our abuse didn't happen. Some alters would come out of denial, and then climb back in it again. To face what was done to us is hard enough without any programming. But we were trying to face our past in spite of the programming and in spite of all those well-intentioned people who advised us to forget the past.

Until we knew where we'd been, we couldn't know where we were. Until we knew where we were we couldn't plan where we wanted to go. We needed to face the past. The route to health for an Monarch slave is the opposite from what it is for others. Some people need to let go of the past--not so for the victim of Monarch programming. Forgetting and dissassociation is part of the problem--and more of it is not the solution.

INTERNAL DEFENSES

Our picture here is illustrating all the numerous defensive programs that have gone off trying to protect us from touching with anything in the System. The System was twisting and turning and trying to keep its sanity as dozens of suicide programs went off, and the Gamma Programming reached a feverish pitch.

The secret set of coded programs/computer workings is called Omega Programming. The super-secret demonology processes where demons and portals are constructed throughout the system is known as Gamma Programming. The Gamma Programming includes the All-Seeing Eye, the Vail, the Eggs with Imps etc.

The internal defenses consists in part of body programs that are triggered if the Mind-controlled slave steps out of line. Here is a good list of some of these body programs:
Auditory problems, Blood flow/circulation, Digestive failure, Headaches-split brain, Heart failure, Histamine production, Optic problems, Respiratory failure, Sleep deprivation, Sleeping program, and Temperature change.

The suicide programs that would go off included Armageddon, Clowns cutting, Cutter program "Pain is Love", Disembowelment, Drug overdose, Gethsemane, Injection of bleach (poison), Octopus, Red Sea, Shooting Programs (shotgun, russian roulette, shooting family, etc.), War in the Heavens & Wrecking the car.

Along with the suicide programs that would be triggered were other programs that would jerk our minds every which way which included: Busy Cleaning Program, Crazy program, Flooding (from Atlantis), Isolate & Hibernate Program, Memory Erasure Program, Pain Programming, Protection by trance, Revolving switching, Scrambling Program, and re-Structuring Programming.

When we were going toward freedom our mind triggered programs of all kinds, and the mind ended up not knowing if it was coming or going with all the different programs which were activated. For weeks on end we had all types of suicide programming going off, and our minds had to fight the suicide programs second by second. It was a long drawn out fight that we could not have made without a friend with us every second of the day.

The picture gives an idea of all the craziness and activity of the Omega and Gamma programs which activated to defend the Illuminati's Mind Control.

On top of that everyday life would trigger us. We would be triggered by dates, faces, events, things on TV, and Ceremony Dates. Some of our triggers were general triggers and some were to self-discipline ourselves. In other words, even without the programming, we had a lot of abuse issues to work through which could be triggered by everyday life.

The programs were put into our System and given codes. Our strongest alter, a general in the System worked 6 months of hard work to figure out some of these codes, and with our best friend we had a good idea of how they triggered some of the body and suicide programs. These programs had Greek, Hebrew and Druidic letters in their activation codes. Actually, these alphabets also are the way these people numbered with, and the Greek, Hebrew and Druid letters were used as numbers. Our friend named these programs Utility Programs, because they functioned much like the utility programs of a computer.

The secret Gamma Programming- that is the demonology was also part of what we had to deal with. The eggs in the picture held imps. Grotesque looking demons terrorized the system, but it wasn't until they were cast out of the body that we saw their true form.

The programming was designed that if it was taken out improperly, it was to come back Seven time Seven stronger. Along with all the programming went cover programming. Generally, front stories have covered almost everything in our System.

Dominoes were used as the basis for what would be called a Mother Board in actual computers. Alice In Wonderland, the Wizard of Oz and the Tall Book of Make Believe played a fundamental role as "software" in our System. The Wizard of Oz stories told us what structures to put in our internal world and even HOW to create an internal world and its parts.

We don't want to forget the root program, the tree which was used as a method of organizing the various programs, just like a computer's subdirectories branch out more subdirectories. If our programming was tampered with, we would want to cut the tree--however, since the tree was in us, this meant we would want very badly to cut our arms, especially our veins. Sometimes we did cut ourselves, sometimes multiple times, but fortunately we never killed ourselves.

The abusers had 3 part access codes. They could trigger us to have abusive behavior too as punishment. Their final act of torture was to try to start an internal shattering that would domino through the System and shatter all the alters one by one. Fortunately, we got the shattering stopped just before it completed its job.

CIVIL WAR

The light side and the dark side of our System lock themselves in combat.

Our System had a Christian mother who was not in the cult. She was meant to be a front, but she also seriously threw a monkey wrench into their plans. She helped our Christian alters to find and use the power of God. Mother's spiritual power, due to her faith in God, was never crushed, although the abusers tried. Our Christian alters became prayer warriors who would storm the gates of hell, and would walk up boldly to the throne of God and intercede for our System.

But our System was also secretly part of the highest levels of generational Satanism. Dark side alters on the Mothers of Darkness level learned high level demonology. They learned to summon demons. Their jewelry was part of the focal points to invite demons in. The demons our System had internally were considered friends by alters on this level. Their programming kept them from seeing the slavery that the demons kept them in.

Both the Christian alters and the Dark Side alters had people in the external world they could call on. And both sides did call on help from their side. The Civil War between the light side alters and the dark side alters has gone on for years, but came to a crescendo of activity when the deprogramming began.

This picture was done in the middle of the war. The Satanic dark side had the programming and the structure of the System on their side. The light side had their faith in their Almighty Creator.

There have been a number of Illuminati people who have tried to get free. However, the lack of understanding by Christians and counselors have destroyed any chance they could have had. If a man says he is a member of the Illuminati but wants to leave, that doesn't mean that some of his alters won't still be loyal to the dark spiritual side. If Christians catch one of his dark side alters doing something occultic, that doesn't mean that the Christian alters aren't serious about leaving Satanism.

Our System suggests that the deprogramming such as we went through be done as intense and quickly as is reasonable, and as free of outside interference as possible. When a System is half deprogrammed and then is accessed, the result is a terrible mess. Unfortunately, the therapeutic process that is in place in the nation leaves the victims of Monarch programming free to be victimized by their abusers when they are not in the therapist's office. Therapists are restricted from taking a part in their clients personal lives, so a large area of the victim's life is an open target for their abusers to continue accessing them. Quite frankly, a great deal of therapy may be more harmful to a System than helpful, because the abusers can come along behind the therapist and wreck havoc on the survivor and his or her mind. Therapists often rely on front alters to report to them as to whether the System is being accessed. If a System is working as it was designed, the front alters will not be able to detect when their System is used. There are plenty of cover stories that can be hypnotically given to explain lost time, & it doesn't take long to do lots of damage with a System if you're the System's handler.

The dark side can be accessed via letters, music, telephone calls, telepathically, via electronic signals, via the pattern of planes flying overhead and a number of other ways. Sometimes Illuminati Masters astrally project themselves into the victim's room.

The battle in the picture is an intense one. The Illuminati want to shut the light side alters down. The poppy field indicates the fate that some alters experience. The cemetery shows that this is a fight for life or death. Some of the Christian alters may end up thrown in prison. Except the prison they serve in is within their own System's mind. Christian alters who got trapped for months inside unable to get out, found solace by praying and trusting in their Savior. Short of miracles and outside intervention, there is no way for a Monarch Mind-controlled slave to free him or herself. There is a lack of serious understanding people to pull these victims out of their mind-control. A System under mind-control can not free itself.

The light side can not simply go get itself delivered of demons, or simply attend church every week to free its System. Dark side alters can not hear many of the Christian terminology or they have been programmed to understand the terminology in negative ways. Our System's dark side understood the following terms in the following ways:

- "God" was Satan, a victorious God who gave us everything. Christians had a god who had turned his back on us in time of pain and hated us while our Master had saved us. We had no heart anyway to give to any Christian god. Some of our alters were hypnotically trained to trance out at the word "God".
- "Creator" was our Programmer. He was obviously the one who made us, gave us life, and controlled us.
- Lots of Bible was programming for us. The point is that listening to sermons while under mind-control was not even remotely helpful. Until our mind was free, to force Christianity was counterproductive.

CODE RED

This picture was done by deeper alters trying to warn the System. Watch out! Code Red. Don't touch those books in the library. The Raven stands for the flocks of ravens that would appear and would take over the System. When the ravens got the body they would start tearing at the flesh of the body. Without someone to take care of us, the ravens would have bitten our flesh off.

This picture was done when our System was turning. After the System turned, the kitten alters were able for the first time to see the castle lights. Everything was red. There were also golds and blues. There were thunderstorms at this time in the System. The System was doing a lot of spinning too.

This picture also hints of the oaths, the double worlds, and other things involved in our System.

EVIL SPIRITS

This picture shows the evil side of the spiritual warfare that took place in our System. In our writing we refer to this spiritual side of the programming as Gamma Programming. It seems that everything that was done to us ties in with their dark spiritual beliefs. Some people observe Druidism and then describe it as ancient religious forms. However, a closer examination will reveal that Druidism takes a person into demonology. It is not a benign worship of nature.

When our Master spoke, he often talked about Druidism. In Druidism they teach a child equally about reality and the fantasy worlds. We were taught that life is "nothing but a dream." We were taught life was not real and we could change the ending to what we wanted. When we came across the book The 21 Lessons of Merlyn it reminded us of the kinds of things Dad would tell our deeper alters. There is a great deal in that book The 21 Lessons of Merlyn that have undertones that the person who wrote it knew about the Illuminati's mind control. Further, because our programmers were skilled Druids, our System reflects Druidism. Also it can added that some of the Druidic symbology has been placed into different Systems created by the Illuminati.

Halloween has come to us from the Druids. Halloween is Satan's birthday, and the Jack-o-lanterns are for his birthday. The Jack-o-lanterns are in the picture because they represent Satan's birthday.

The black widow in the picture represents the activation of our Delta-Beta alters. The Illuminati shut down our front alters and the alter (G 4) that normally was used as the System's runner to take us to them. They had to shut these strong alters down, because they were all Christians, and were trying to fight against the Illuminati's mind control. The System lost all its anti-cult alters, and the Illuminati gave instructions to the Delta-Betas to bring the System home. However, they did not anticipate that our System would have friends come to our rescue. Long story short, they had to put the Delta-Beta alters back into hiding so that our best friend couldn't compromise them. They left the System in the hands of the Kitten alters hoping that we would come home. We would have come home, but we were rescued by our friend, and deprogrammed. The Kitten alters were entertainment alters. We knew little about demonology and we didn't realize that we were demonized so much until we deprogrammed. Once the big daddy demons left the System, we were free to think for the first time in our life. When we deprogrammed we came out of trance. We had lived our lives in trances. When we came out of trance, colors became brighter, voices became more distinct, and sensations became clearer and bolder in general. It was an exciting adjustment to make. Some of us got to see the body's face for the first time. Before that, we had only seen what we had been hypnotised to see.

The adjustments demanded by deprogramming are great and there needs to be long term intensive help to help people learn to get back into the real world. Men who are captured by the enemy (POWs) will receive help to adjust back, but it sometimes gets overlooked that the survivors of programming need help to adjust to a new world too.

In the picture, we showed the man behind the wind whose voice was like thunder in our head. Therapists need to be careful, because the process of help may actually cause more trauma and more splits.

This drawing is one of the first where the Kittens were able to place the Mothers upon a pedestal. Most of our Gatekeeper alters are on pedestals too. However, the principal gatekeeper (designated as "a" by our programmers) is generally locked in place and fronts for the entire triad. The other two parts are "b" and "c". The deeper gatekeepers were spinning on their pedestal, and they had to be stopped and locked into place if the therapist wanted a conversation with them. Below these three would be 10 more. Generally the others were left young, and unexposed to the world. They help keep the few top ones who are exposed to the world in line. By only allowing a small fraction of our alters to interact with the real world, it was hard for us to break down the mind-control. Some of the mind-control broke down simply by allowing us to interact with the real world. This is why slaves like Loretta Lynn or Marilyn Monroe rarely read newspapers or watch much television. They are kept isolated externally and internally from the world. This control is summed up by the demonic hand which extends into the picture.

THE BEAST WILL MAKE OFF WITH YOUR CHILDREN! HE'LL COME AFTER THEM IN THE NIGHT!
TRESPASS

CHILD ALTERS

This collage is special because our child alters with some assistance from an adult or two put this picture together.

The nights that we have are filled with the horrible memories of our child alters. Grotesque memories are locked up in our child alters.

Most of the alters in our System were never hypnotically age-progressed. There are rooms full of child alters and boxes full of child alters and cemeteries and concentration camps in our System full of child alters. In fact, there are thousands of extra splits which were gathered up and never used in our formal structured System, but were discarded into dumps (cemeteries and concentration camps). When the mind is tortured it creates what it creates, the first splits being the best. The programmers found that they could get the child's mind to clean up the fragments and extra child alters and dispose of them in dumping areas so that they could keep the strong splits and keep a clean orderly System. That doesn't mean that the Multiple still isn't left with a mess. We have worked long hours to integrate thousands of child alters and fragments back into alters that are healthier. The programmers didn't care about these kinds of internal messes, as long as they were dumped somewhere and they could get what they wanted.

Some of our children were given robot suits like the divers of 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea. Those children were created in anger and their anger is directed toward attacking alters who are not in compliance with the programming. There are many armies of these single purpose child alters. Imagine being a baby sitter with a whole room full of hot headed little kids screaming their heads off. These child alters are too young and too angry and scared to reason with. The head gear of these clones can be unscrewed. Each of them in our System had a serial no. on the base of the neck such as 147.00 and 158.00. Sometimes we have had to drop cloth woven of light (a light net) to see if we can detect the clones. The lumps will reveal mirrors, and the mirrors when they are removed will reveal clones. Clones have switches to activate them (or to shut them off too.) Water, magnets, and microwaves have been used at different times to stop these child alters when they attack. Atlantis has armies of children in robot suits waiting to attack if the front alters step out of line. They are ruled by a Queen of the Clones, who works along with 3 Adept alters.

Older alters were assigned child alters to help protect the System from exposing itself in public. On our light side we have a nursery where wee ones were taken care of. Child alters do not normally take the body, because the older alters are to take charge of the body.

Some child alters were left as children intentionally so that the abusers could have a pedophile experience. For instance, in a family of 13 kittens, generally only about 3 in the family will have been hypnotically age-progressed, and the rest are still children.

When events happen, the adult alters have to manage the varied reactions of the multitudes of child alters. In other words they have to babysit. The adult alters may be able to handle something emotionally that simply terrifies the children. A system of multiplicity like ours is never having a single emotion. It is a whole party of people having all the different emotions of the picture all at once. Someone may be puzzled, another angry, another scared, and another curious. However, emotions can run through like waves through a System too. If one alter is angry or sad others may pick up on it.

The children portrayed things they had experienced in the picture. They show the carousel, which scares some of them. They show being driven in a car, and a train, and a horse, and a raven. The ravens in our System have been scary. Clear in the background in the ever present tree of programs which runs through our body, our mind and our system. The fact that our System was not an accident, but was intentionally structured angers us.

When a multiple is first getting in touch with themself, it is a good practice for the older front alters to make friends with the little ones. This can be done by giving them a safe environment and buying them a stuffed animal or toy. When front alters are first finding out they are a multiple, a child alter may be their first clue. This is because different adult alters will appear to outsiders simply a radical mood swings, but the child alters will be so startling and real that the MPD will have to be recognized. Integrating alters of the System together means trying to fight the programming.

Integration of child fragments that aren't part of the System can go on before deprogramming. But it is suggested that authority/control over the programming be taken before attempting any integration of regular System parts. Unless the programming is done away with, the parts will not likely succeed in fighting against the programming to integrate.

THE CORE SLEEPS

When a person's mind creates Multiple Personality the original person is called the core. When a person is split young like we were, the programmers have many years in which to create havoc with a person's core, so that it becomes dangerous and difficult to work with the core.

When the internal programmers began to anticipate the deprogramming they began activity around the core. In the picture the core is sound asleep under the carousel. The core of a System is usually greatly manipulated by Satanic programmers in order to insure the success of their plans and programming. They split our core into 13 parts and these core parts were named Silence 1 through Silence 13. Our SILENCE 1 was hidden deep in the mountain when the world shifted in 1994. When she was on the light side, the light side would hover over her. She was the guardian angel, over the Garden of Eden who protects the core's love for Daddy (Papa). Silence has spiders in her casket who bite her to keep her sleeping. Only the Prince can come and wake her up. She is loyal to the Prince (Daddy) who sang music to her as a little girl. For anyone else to wake her up meant that the mirrors would break and the broken heart will result in heart failure for the System.

Giving this Silence (the Princess) the kiss of death by the Wizard (who is the toad or prince) wakes her up. Who is this silent Princess--could it be Snow White who the dwarfs are protecting and care for? The Prince (aka Father of Time or Kronos or Ahab) can access and wake her up. He will kiss the 18 month old Silence. This 18 month old Silence is referred to by the System as Queen. When she wakes up she will be integrated with the Mothers of Darkness when the Illuminati want to use the Mothers of Darkness. Silence holds the key programming for why the Core acts like she does. Silence is guarded by Elizabeth and other light side care providers.

Our Silence was a Sleeping Beauty. Systems like ours have a back up program called the Princess Program. The Princess programming involves the core, waking her up, and moving her to a dark castle where she gives her energy to the dark side. The Princess Programming is a powerful back up program when it kicks in.

Our SILENCE 2 lives in a different place. The Ribbons lived with her, so it sounds like she lived in Petra which is a city within a mountain before we deprogrammed. The second angel (actually an evil spirit) guards the gate to the Garden of Eden also known as Petra. Silence 2 is the key to the dungeon which is hidden below in a deeper level. This has been protected by an army which may be the equivalent of the Nome army of the Wizard of Oz story. The story of Snow White and the Seven dwarfs also plays a major role in Silence 2's programming.

The other Silences of our System were hidden from the core, to use as a subtle form of black mail to the core. She of course wanted to be joined with those very young parts because they carried the little child's pure love for their father (who after bonding with the child programmed it.) When a child loves its father, and then that father abuses the child a very clean split in the mind occurs. The child cannot deal with two contradictory images of one person. How can a wonderful loving parent also be a terrible abuser?

Also in the picture is the yellow brick road. The Yellow Brick Road is the runway in which alters were trained to fly off from to exit their internal world and take the body.

The Yellow Brick Road also pertains to the assignment that an alter is given. To follow the Yellow Brick Road is to go down the road that has been assigned by command. The Yellow Brick Road programming is placed into the child's mind via the Yellow Brick Road of the Wizard of Oz story. Remember the key words, "Follow the Yellow Brick Road."

To get someone onto the Yellow Brick Road you must know the access code to get them through the poppy field. The color blue was important in our programming to the process.

Fiddler is important to the yellow brick road and then the people eat what is variously called music or a script or a letter which are words meaning "instructions". Notice that the picture has a great deal of scripts in the lower left.

Notice all the activity as the slippers and shoes are very busy while the core sleeps.

The Clockmaker (a.k.a. Clockkeeper) has the knowledge of the clocks. The primary clock is often disguised, but it is always gold. That is why the clock in this picture is gold. The clockmaker makes the clocks. The Clockholder positions the clocks in the System. The gold item changes form according to what is needed but it always carries its own [level's] abbreviation.

The clocks control the programmers. The clocks have the ability to be invisible.

The clock can be disguised as a bomb.

There is a Grandfather clock near the castle, when it strikes 1 it is time for a new system era. The clocks control several things. It is important for people to begin to be in a spiritual position to correctly deal in a positive way with both demons and alters. Our clockmaker turned out to be a demon, but his helper the clock holder turned out to be an alter.

BETA ALTERS

Alters can be created which do the total bidding of the Master. Some people are fragmented for a specific purpose. Within our System, different levels were created for different purposes. One of our System's levels is shown in the picture, this is the level which contained Beta and Delta alters.

The slipper, the flowers (orchids) and the jewels (a blood crown jewel) are all very important in regards to our System's Beta programming.

The Beta alters were designed for sexual blackmail. Some of the Beta alters can feign (simulate) death. We were warned that if the mirrors were broken, the Betas and Deltas might take over our System. The Betas are teamed with the Deltas. There may be a Satanic Bridegroom within the Betas.

How did they make our Beta alters? The Spin Kittens were created out of the later splits. The first splits are the strongest and the later splits are use for specific purposes. The Spin Kittens are examples of alters created from later splits for specific purposes.

What was the purpose of our Betas? These sexual alters are designed to blackmail men in positions of power. They also have a spin cycle in which specific types of sex are available to whoever is wanting a specific activity or perversion. The last spin (which is no. ten) wants to be hung from a wall and tortured, during which she will beg for more torture. There are several front Beta alters that have oversight over the other Beta's. These serve as a Madam in a Cat-house might in that they supervise and mother other alters. They were groomed to be quite social, and spent more time out than the spin kittens. Authorized users would say the correct sentences and in such a way select what alter and activity they desired.

The picture shows that the Betas are tied to the programming tree which protrudes into the upper right corner. The programming drove the System. The Betas were given sexual programming, and on the job training, but they served the master because of the total control exercised by the programming over the mind, not because they chose to do it. The chain that extends from the hat to the high heeled shoe is a symbol of the total bondage the Beta alters were placed under.

As is so often the case, what you see is not what you get from occult world. These Beta alters were very skilled at what they did. It is not likely that those who might have become their victims would have had their guard up.

This area of the System was desensitized to bloodshed. They had lost their hearts and their consciences. They simply obeyed. They had a script to follow that would take alters over the rainbow into the magical land of the Wizard of Oz and the land of Alice In Wonderland through the looking glass.

Precious stones such as rubies and pearls have a much significance to our System. Within our System we also had pearls. Bad memories were stored as black or grey pearls. White pearls were kept locked up. Another way that precious stones had importance was that they served as access cues.

DELTA-BETA

This picture is an expression of the explosive nature of certain alters who are trained deadly killers. The process to get alters who will blindly kill any other human being includes the following:

1. deeper and deeper dehumanization as alters are split off by torture trauma
2. desensitization toward brutality by brutal films and actual sacrifices
3. extreme torture to instill perfect blind obedience
4. blood rituals to attach powerful demons whose purpose is to enhance bloodlust, fear of disobedience, and to focus all thinking into a narrow road.
5. the handlers' ability to make alters think that their victim was an life-threatening enemy.

This is one area of the System one doesn't want to mess with.

The CIA creates killing monsters and calls them Delta models. These are physically strong men and women. The Illuminati creates systems with more versatility. Delta alters are placed into Systems which look benign on the surface.

The alters depicted are Delta alters which were enclosed in a Genie bottle so that they would be very solidly contained.

The Delta alters are masked because they have no sense of identity of their selves. Their checkered costume shows that these alters are strictly the lines of programming which make them up.

Their seductive appearance is because these Delta alters work hand in hand with special trained alters skilled in seduction for purposes of blackmail and assassination.

Why would the Illuminati create such versatility in a system? If a system which is created to operate at the Mothers-of-Darkness level should fail to live up to the standards or guidelines that are given it, then this System can be used for the practical purposes of anarchy, suicide missions, or assassination. The presence of such trained killers in a system also serves as a way to blackmail the System itself. If the System fails to comply, the trained killers will be released and they will kill innocent grandchildren or suicide the System.

Eyes are the light of a person's soul. These alters have no light in their eyes.

The figures are very active and tight showing how intensely the demonic programming drives them. The light of the internal life force (the internal all-seeing-eye) is shown as a background light in the picture, and behind this is the red from the blood sacrifices associated with this level of programming.

The programming leaves no room for love or tenderness. The Delta alters' programming is strictly hate and vengeance.

The umbrellas represent how the programming shields them. Note, an umbrella must be dismantled from the inside out, and so must Delta programming. There is no room for error with these deadly alters.

The lines are programming and so are the dots on the world between the figures. These deadly programs must be viewed in the light of Lucifer. These alters' arms are suspended in a stiff-arm position to show the inflexible nature of the programming to bend to the outside world.

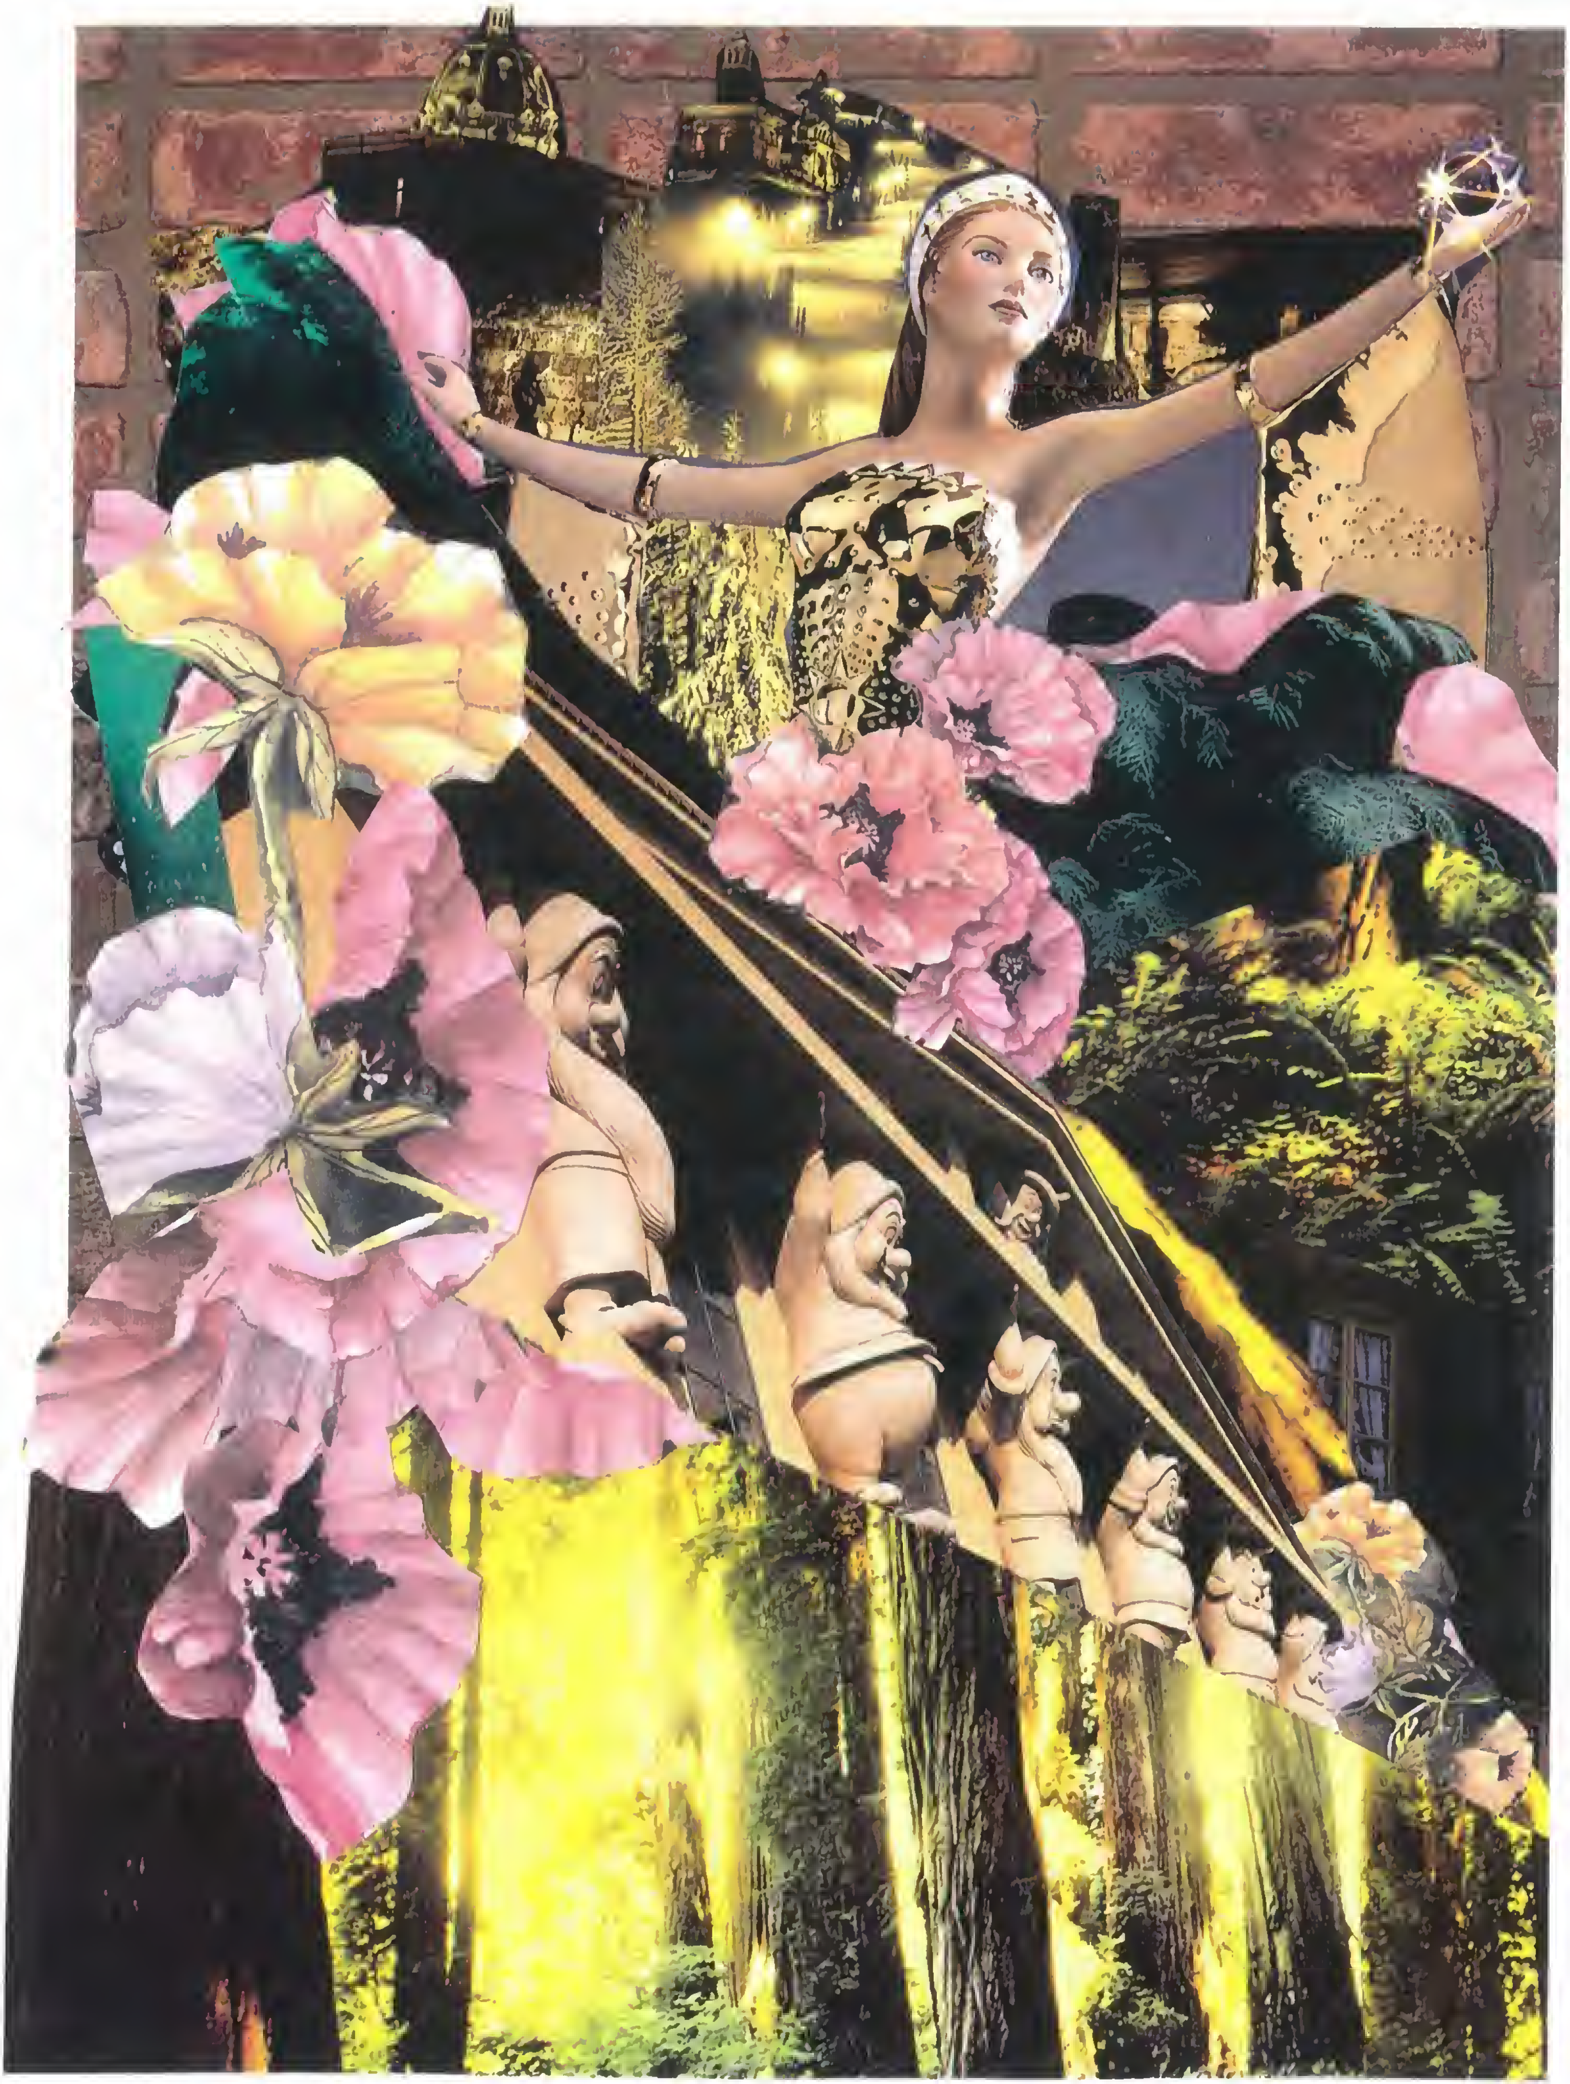
The system of demons, including those blood demons attached to this area of the System, hold the programming in place. They must be correctly dealt with to dismantle the programming.

The outside world for these Delta alters is represented by the front dash of a limosene which characterizes the elite who lurk behind them ready to trigger them with cue words and signals.

A cat lunges in the middle background, because the dehumanization given them was to have them become fierce cats. When the System's body was only a child, these alters were given only the choice to become fierce cats. They were given blood to drink.

The world is shown in the top right because the Deltas are not playthings, but part of a plan for the Illuminati domination of the world through death.

These alters can continue to aid Satan's plan after the planned upon reign of the Anti-Christ begins, because they can be used to kill.



DWARFS

A recent movie version of Snow White has some strange names for the Dwarfs, one of them is named Kitty, and the rest have names that rhyme with Kitty. The dwarfs are a common item placed into Monarch's minds, and since Hollywood uses a great number of Monarch slaves, it's no surprise that their version of Snow White has a great deal of programming garbage in it.

The picture shows what our programming had. The dwarfs lived in a forest. Deep in the forest was a Temple - the House of David which they protected. They protected the princess, and the princess was to be woken up by Dad and taken to the castle. This happened when our programming was touched. The plans were already in place to integrate our Mothers of Darkness alters with the Core and the Silences (which were the first splits from the core) whenever the Anti-Christ began his reign. This would have given our Satanic alters all the energy they needed to have the body full time. The Core was strongly bonded to its father, and the love for Dad was carried by the Silences. The dark princess would integrate with the alters associated with the Core, because of the way the Dad issues were set up. To sum it up, they manipulated the child's natural love for its father to create drives in the early splits that would eventually be used to energize the dark side.

The flowers represent the poppy fields. Behind everything is a wall, showing that behind everything are walls and more of our entire System--which was a double System. We had a pyramid with an all seeing eye, and when this was taken out another System lay behind it.

The House of David is very significant. The Temple or the House of David represents that some of the Illuminati believe they are descendants of Solomon. Solomon was a great man of God who became the leading occult leader of his day. Solomon is credited with writing a long list of important secret Satanic books. Our father told us that we were jewish, but if we had jewish blood it certainly was kept very secret. There is a strong jewish flavor to the conspiracy, and some people blame the world-wide conspiracy on the Jews, but a far more accurate and more comprehensive label would be to say that it is a Satanic conspiracy. The various groups network together. Our friend wrote how the various elements or pieces of the conspiracy go together in his book Be Wise As Serpents. The House of David, the Anti-Christ, the Holy Blood line, and the 13th Illuminati bloodline all are important things in these days. These items are not important to understand programming per se, but understanding them will help people understand our role in the bigger picture.

Our System has been on a time-table that even our Masters can't tamper with. That time-table was set up so that we could serve the Anti-Christ we he came into power. So ultimately our System wasn't designed for only our Master's use, but for their Master, who was and is Satan. Sometimes when our dark side alters would have enjoyed more power, they were not allowed to advance themselves because they were to wait until the time was right for our System to be used. The demons in our System not only held our genealogies but they held the time tables of our future assignments. Our family had a generational occult background that stretched for centuries back into antiquity.

GATEKEEPERS

This is a collection of pictures of Gatekeeper 1 through Gatekeeper 13. All of these alters rotated together. Let's clarify how alters can be linked together, and how the portals of a system work.

Gatekeeper alters are just that, they protect the gates or portals. Because in demonology portals are used to introduce demons into a body, the gatekeeper alters are kept in depression and pain in order to enhance their ability to be used as portals for demons. If a therapist identifies a Gatekeeper alter, he or she should figure that the information that the Gatekeeper alter gives will be full of disinformation. This does not hold true only for my System, but across the board for all gatekeeper alters. They are very heavily programmed. No. 1 knew 3 who knew 5 who knew 7 who knew 9, etc. In this fashion the Gatekeepers were kept separate but linked. This type of linking is also done to keep rituals secret. Ritual alters will be linked in a chain so that each month a different alter goes to rituals. That way no single alter has all the secrets. When they do revolving switching, they switch very quickly in the hopscotch fashion that they know each other. If the multiple you know begins revolving switching try to slow it down. Stress can cause such switching. The switching takes a great deal of energy out of a System. The alters will switch in a prearranged order. On rare occassions they might switch so rapidly the System goes comatose. It becomes hard to have rational conversations when alters don't stay in the body long enough to "ground."

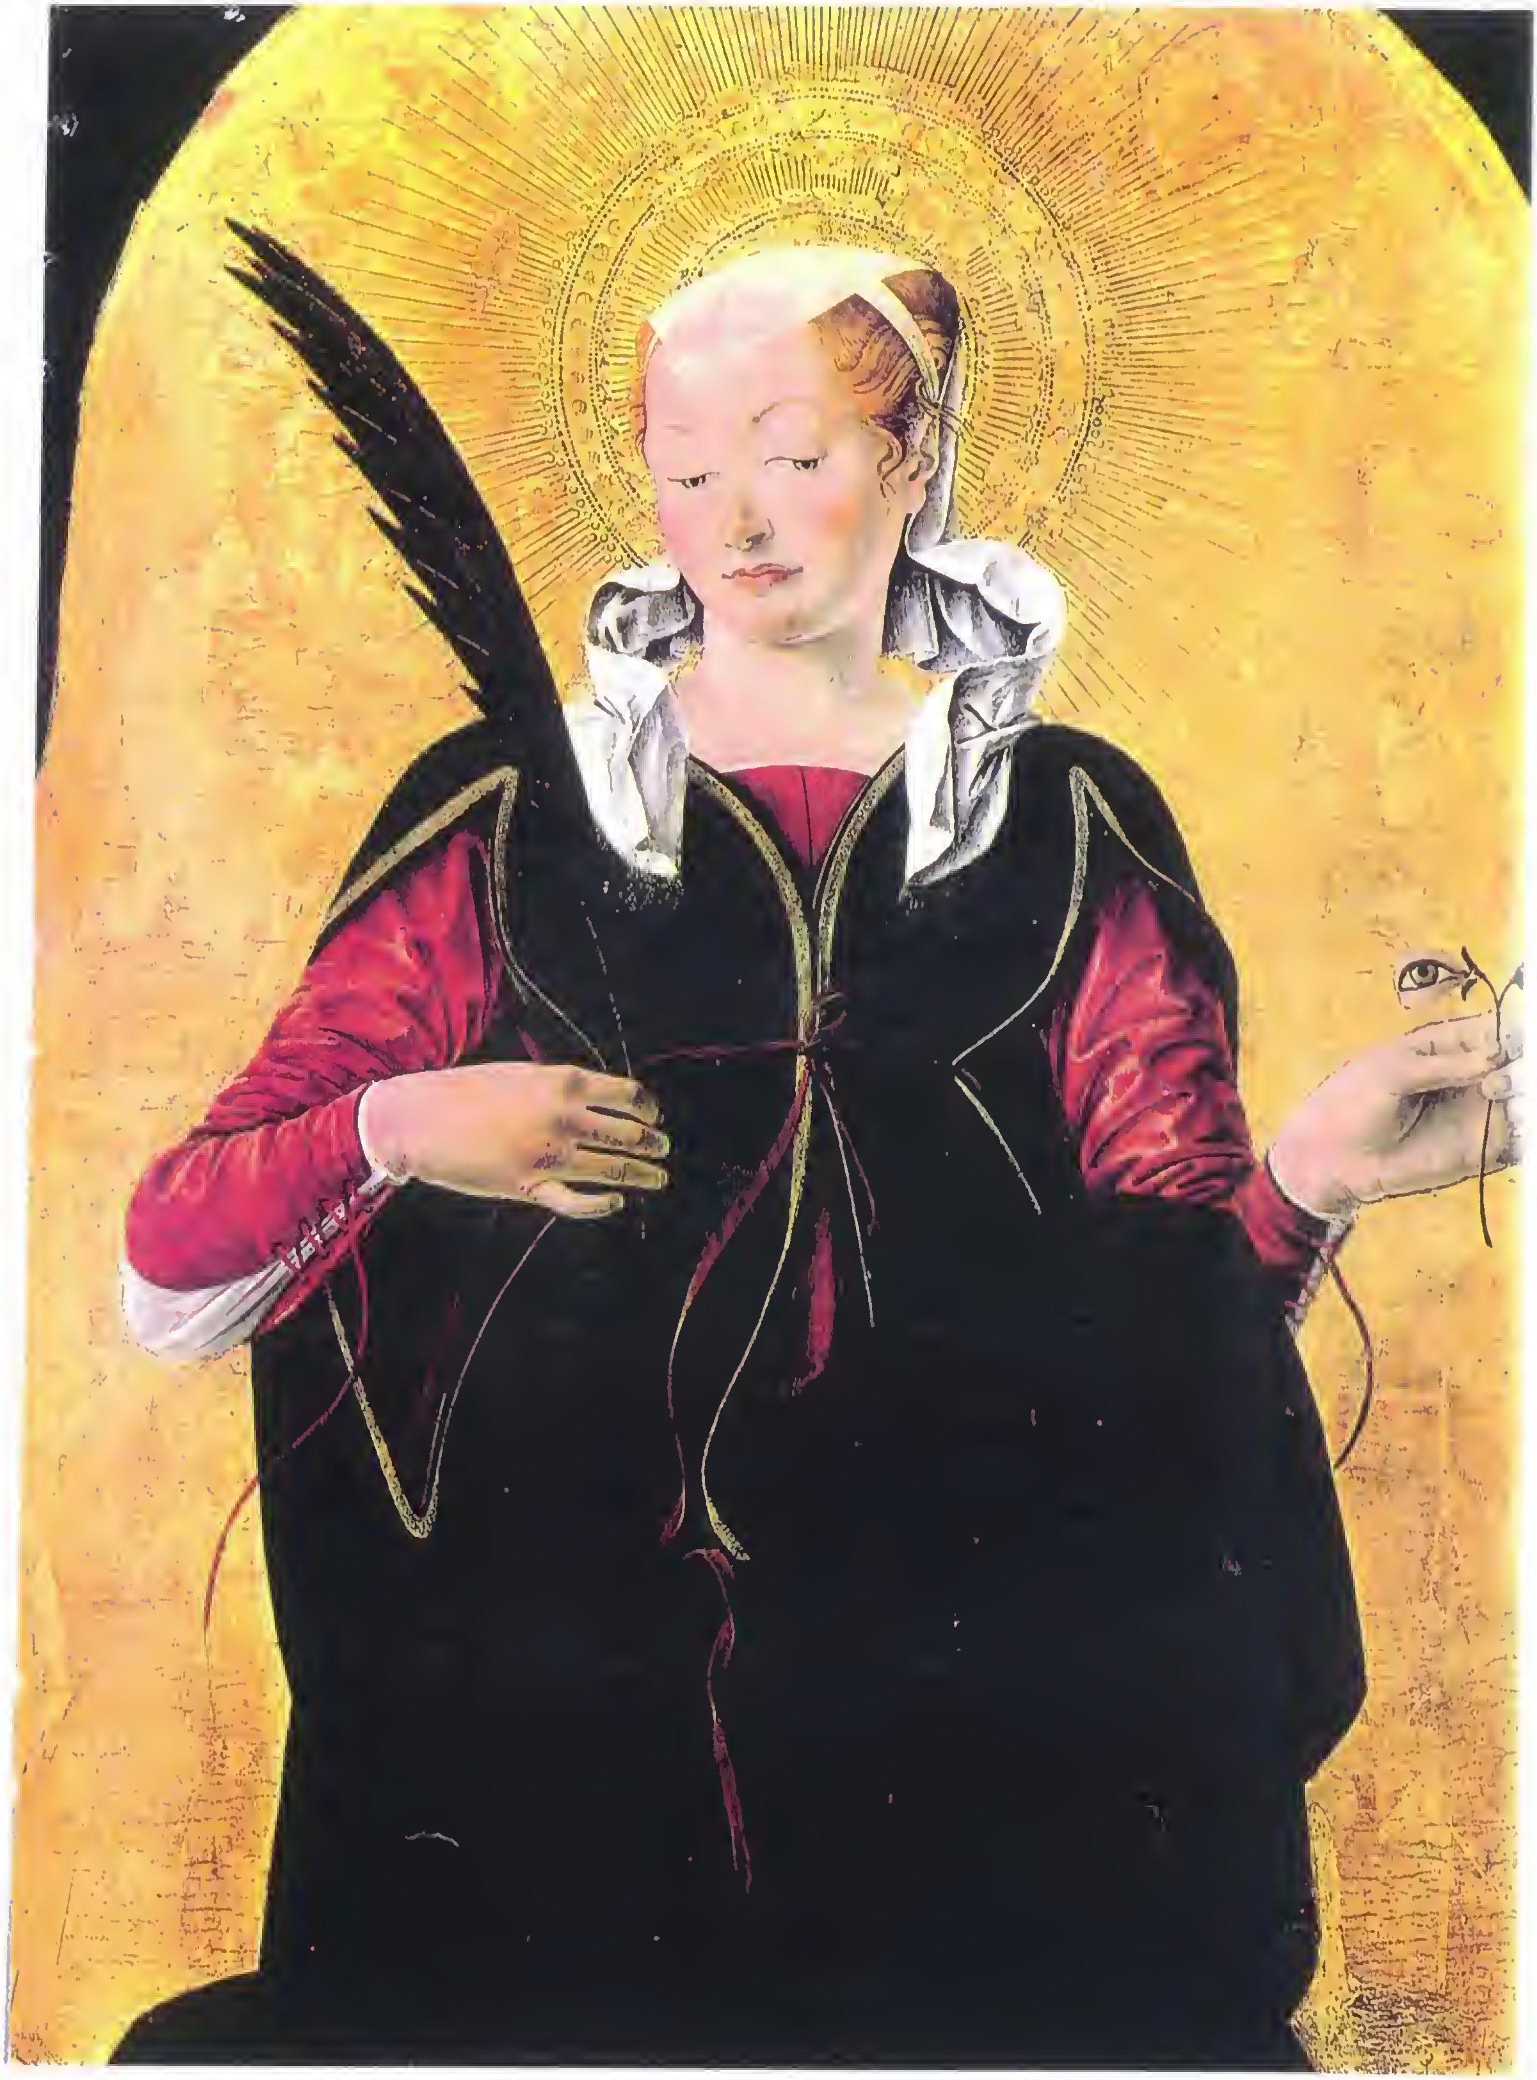
Our gatekeepers also were natural portals to lower sections. The following setup is our System, but the tactics used apply to many others. Gatekeeper 1 (G 1) was a portal to Section 1 (the Ace=1 & the Diamond=1st sign zodiac & wisdom). G 2 was silent partly because the Gatekeepers didn't need a portal to themselves. She wore lips on her bracelet as a message to her connection to the Silences. She has been a loner on the outside looking in at everything. G 3 has a white background because she ties to Atlantis. Her Q=Queens of Atlantis & the Queen of Hearts. The Queen of Hearts is a coded signal to Atlantis that everything is not O.K. Atlantis holds the Armageddon programming to protect things. G 4 is a portal to the 4th section. Used as a runner, so that the Master could then access Section 4 alters. Section 4 alters could push G 4 out of the way when they wanted to by using her codes. G 6 opens up to the programming Section 6. She knew certain parts of the programming because of where she lays. G 9 connected to the programming music. Much of the programming is in the form of songs, and the "angelic harps" kept sending out their internal music. G 10 is animal-like and is a portal to animal enforcers in the castle/castle dungeon. G 11 is on a pedestal similar to the Mothers of Darkness. She is a portal for their Section. G 13 is linked to the internal root programs put in at the mind's deepest level. A bird on her face portrays the programs (the birds) that roost in the tree limbs.

That quick overview of the Gatekeepers shows that each guarded an important portal, and that the System is interconnected. The Gatekeeper alters also show the techniques that the programmers used to hid things in the System. All types of programming tricks were used on the Gatekeepers to insure that they would stay in place and not reveal the alters they link to. For instance, a non-sexual Gatekeeper would guard the portal to the sexual alters. In this fashion, the mind is used against itself. The non-sexual alter's identity is tied up in its horror toward sex. The non-sexual alter can't bear to see the sexual alters she connects to. A whole series of tactics are used to hide things behind alters, and these are important if someone is trying to figure out a System, because when you see these tactics they are a tip off (a good clue) as to what is behind the alter with the tactic.One example of their tactics is G 3. G 3 is the portal to the 3 Adepts of Atantis (3 alters who are made in the image of the programmers). The 3 programmers know the entire System. Apparently G 3 was shown and taught the whole System. Then splits were made to get the programmers, and to cover their tracks they came back and taught G 3 that she is stupid. Under an alter who is thinks she stupid like the tinman is information on the entire System's layout. (Atlantis is a place like the sub Nautilus which can sink & hide underwater, this important section is hidden up front in the System. An old intelligence trick is to hide secrets right up front.)

Most alters constructed by the programmers are not meant to take the body and function in the real world. Most alters are protectors, or function as components to make the programming function. When a therapist meets a System, they should realize that most of the alters of a System are not made to be seen. Take the alters that are seen and multiply that no. many fold to guess at how many alters a System has. The programmers don't need lots of alters to front a System; they need alters to keep the mind control intact.

Gatekeeper alters play an important part in a System. They often are used to access a System. A tap-tap-tap is a standard code to access Gatekeepers. If you witness a tap-tap-tap by a watress with a cup, or a stranger at the window, or a repairman in the building, you may have just likely witnessed the Monarch slave being accessed with a standard code.

As the pictures show, our Gatekeepers had Porcelain face programming. That programming is seen in victims connected to the Charismatic movement. Our System almost went to a charismatic college.



MOTHERS OF DARKNESS & The QUEEN MOTHER

This picture is of the Queen Mother. We were brought before her and the Grand Druid Council at age 4 for an physical examination in the nude to decide our worthiness. We vividly remember this Illuminati ceremony. Who or what are the Mothers of Darkness?

The Mothers of Darkness are a high level within the Illuminati for women. Some of the sites of Mother rituals include a building near Presidio's cemetery, the Rothschild's Pyramid winery in Calif., and the important Mother Castle in Belgium. It is believed that each of the 13 families are allowed to have 13 mothers each which would mean that there are 2,197 mothers in the world. All Mothers are married to the Anti-Christ and are to be used as an imperial guard for the Anti-Christ. The Mothers of Darkness are very tough because they had to go through discipline to gain their position. They are very elitist. The Mothers wear a platinum ring with the eight pointed star of Ishtar within a circle. They must work their magic in very precise prescribed methods.

Our System has many Mother of Darkness alters. Our Mothers got to know the Mothers of other Systems too. Most of the Mothers have goddess names and have been taught they are eternal goddesses.

Our Mothers were organized on a 13x13 grid on level 11 of our System. They have been placed in groups of 3 alters spinning together on a pedestal--the Threefold Goddess, which can be found clear back in the ancient Egyptian/Babylonian Mystery religions and the old Druid story of King Arthur with the 3 women at the lake. The Virgin Goddess is the New Moon, the Mother is the full moon & the Old Wise Crone is the waning moon.

In witchcraft, the pulling down the moon ceremony is done. The Mothers would be found saying ritual words like, "I am that which was with you from the beginning, and I am that which is attained at the end of desire." When our Mothers speak the front ones are very learned and philosophical about religious matters.

Note, that an Illuminati System like ours is set up so that different alters are assigned different rituals during the year so that no alter has all the information. This is done in line with the Illuminati's intense desire for secrecy.

They live in our System's Shangri-La, and have been programmed to believe that if they leave their world for any length of time they will revert back to their true age--which is an ancient woman and then they will be ancient and almost dead if not dead. Their fear of wrinkles seems to filter down to the lower levels. Within the System, they are in a blue room in the castle. They have a throne. They like blue topaz and black onyx. They wear black onyx. They put the seal on the House of Israel with the death, burial, and resurrection ceremony they endured, which includes being electroshocked in water. One of the front Mothers wanted to be fixed in the plane between the astral and physical, which the Mothers see as a point of balance. White light surrounds the internal ruling demons and makes it invisible. The internal demons took the form of our programmers and were on the next level above the Mothers. The System has talked about a Grande Mother and a Grande Dame.

The full access involves a special ring which must be turned while on the proper finger. A partial clue to the access code is that the backward spelling of Bethel (that is "LEHTEB") brought out Mother. This would be in line with the type of Satanism they practice. However, the Mothers hold Constellation and Demonology material. When demonology subjects are talked about by the System, sometimes this pulls the Mothers out, and they will talk. The Mothers of Darkness are silver coded and the Grande Mothers are gold coded.

The Mothers were only been out for short periods of time during the life of our System and have always been surrounded by Satanic opulence, such as silver, china, luxury, gold and castles. They were taught the occult belief about being = becoming and the wheel of life. However, they have been able to observe things by staying hidden and watching internally. They received heavy programming/& big Daddy demons so the outside world would not intrude on their programmed reality.

The Mothers of Darkness are important to the Hierarchy. The System was to be used as a Grande Mother to teach other younger Satanic hierarchy women. This is an important reason the System is being retained rather than being discarded at 30 like Presidential Models. The Grande Mothers help with the programming. The Illuminati does not discard its people in "the Hierarchy" just because they age.

For those who are free of programming, we will give a few details of one of our Mother of Darkness rituals. At a special 1,000 points of light ceremony where they have a "Pool of Age", the Mothers try to magically get visions of their future. They sit around a pool and meditate to pull down the moon. If they like the vision they can add blood to the pool or they can fight the vision by throwing a feather into the pool.

Perhaps the darkest Satanic ritual involves the Grail--a drinking blood/sex ritual related to the goddess Cerridwen. Systems which have achieved the Mothers level will have some Mother alters which resemble Kali.

PROTECTORS

When a Monarch System of Alters is created many of the alters serve roles as guards of this or that. It seems that everything is guarded and everything has someone assigned to guard it and keep it secret. In our System, we found that we had both a combination of alters and demons put in place to protect the programming and its secrecy. Two of the prominent groups of protectors were the clowns and the jokers.

Clowns were both alters and demons.

The clowns are orange coded. They were very protective. If anything wrong about our Papa (our Master) was said to the System, they would try to kill the body. The clowns helped keep the Gatekeepers in line. The Gatekeepers were very heavily programmed, and then they were constantly watched and kept in line by the clowns. Each Gatekeeper may have had clowns, but we never pushed things to find out.

Clowns can be sad behind a happy face. This deception makes their suicide plans harder to detect. The gatekeepers have numerous clowns which carry out several functions. The clowns cut or carry out acts of self-mutilation and suicide. The clowns are also protective of dad. The clowns have been given the anger of the Gatekeepers to hold. A few of the clowns actually seem happy all the time. The clowns are immediately accessed and come up if certain things are said while the Gatekeepers have the body. An attack on dad usually brings them up. G 4's clowns have wanted to cut the body due to sexual shame, in other words they protect the Glorias from ever remembering anything sexual. The clowns have prevented G 4 from recognizing her role in the sexual exploitation process.

The natural process which seems to have been used, is that one alter holds the anger, another the pain, and one holds the memories.

SEA-MONSTERS

This picture depicts the protection given to Heliopolis (the City of the Sun). Heliopolis is a world in which Section 11 alters were placed. Heliopolis is also known as the Emerald City Castle. It is guarded by the River Nile, which has a fast current, and crocodiles in it. Not only crocodiles, but sea monsters are in the River Nile too as can be seen in the picture. Our deadly River Nile has dark, murky waters.

During the programming, the programmers not only torture the child to get alters, but they torture the child to build internal structures in your mind. (And who wouldn't build a structure into their mind to save their life?) These structures were put in by the child's mind, but they are guided by the scripts such as the Wizard of Oz series of books. In fact, the map in the front of the Wizard of Oz series of books had many of the internal structures that our System had.

Many Systems never get to the point of seeing their internal world(s). Further, most alters have only a small spot in which they are to reside, and they don't get to see but a tiny fraction of the entire System. After these structures are built into the mind they continue to work and carry out their function on a subconscious level. Sometimes it takes years of work for a System to begin seeing their internal world. They can begin doing this by turning lights on inside of their worlds. To make a comparison, when a person looks at a clock they see the finished result, the time it shows, but they don't see all the mechanisms. The structures in the mind are part of the mechanism to keep the System of Alters structured in a way that is useful to the abusers, but often all that observers will see is the finished result, the mechanisms stay hidden. But we are exposing those mechanisms in this picture and on this page. A therapist's client may be responding in a way that makes no sense until one realizes the internal structures that they are responding to.

An alter generally must maintain the spot in the mind which it is assigned. To leave that location in the mind, means travelling through a System which is filled with dangers and traps of all kinds. Only a few of our alters ever ventured where they were not to go, and they always encountered many obstacles. However, if an alter gets trapped behind mirrors, the alter should not break the mirrors. If the alter is a Christian they can use the blood of Jesus Christ of Nazareth to bind and cast out the demons which are in the mirrors. The danger of the mirrors is the demonology involved. Somethings work and somethings don't. We are speaking from our years of experience. The mirrors are deadly and they were everywhere in our System, but they are deadly only if one can't deal with the demonology. The therapist should at least be aware that these images can be worked with just as if they were real to manipulate situations involving them. But if the structures are going to be worked or toyed with, the therapist and survivor need to have an understanding about the structures. If you don't understand the mirrors, or the River Nile, or whatever then be careful what you have the survivor do to them.

The structures (the images) that are built into the mind of the Monarch slave are not trivial. An overview of the structures that are in our System alone will show that they went to a great deal of effort to build all kinds of internal worlds to house our thousands of alters. A list of the internal structures that were contained in our System follows: Ant pits, Bee Traps w/ swarms, Black Glass Wall, Black Holes (vortexes), Boxes (Dr. Green's under J.J., boxes have buttons which access certain parts), Candyland, Carpet (Magic), Castles, Castle dungeon (torture chambers), Caves, Clocks (there are several incl. computer clocks), Concentration camp, Cords, Desert, Doll House, numbered Doors by the thousands w/ red hot nobs, Elevators, Emerald City (connected to the castle), Eucalyptus Trees, Fields of "forget me" & island of "forget me not" (JJ's Prgrmg), Firewall, 2 Forests (singing forest with Cedars of Lebanon and Oaks, and a dwarfs forest which has 3 kinds of trees), Fruit Tree (programming tree), Glass, Glass coffin, Golden Keys, Graveyards, Hallways with red doors, Hell Pit or Hell Fire (7 levels--pepperbox. There is a glassy wall before the hell pit.), Hour Glass (matrix), House of David, Icetown, Invisible Countries, Keys (clock key), Libraries, Light side City, Marshlands, Mazes, Mirrors (constructed via access permissions) (One-way), Moat, Mountains, Nursery (glass), Ocean, Paper Trees, Petra Secret City, Playground, Poppy field, Portals (for altars and demons, like the third eye), Rubicon (outer space beyond the stars), Rivers (Nile, Rio Grande, Shenandoah, etc.), Room behind a closet (existence not confirmed), Seeds, Serpent tree, Shafts, Shells, Shifting sands, Shoes (gold, silver, and ruby slippers), Snake pits (traps), Spider chambers, Stairway, Torpedo Town, Tin Woodsman's Castle, Tree with square paper boxes containing Dad's music programming, Trojan Horse w/ armies, Tunnels, Valley of the Dry Bones, Volcano (to destroy & remake the system), Vortices (see Black Holes), Wasteland, Water (Moats), Waterfalls, Wind, Wires, Worms, and a Yellow Brick Road.

Did they toy with our mind? Did they put a great deal of energy into making our System? When one considers the power and wealth of the men who are Illuminati kingpins, then it becomes obvious that Systems like ours are not built for sensible legitimate purposes. These men could hire people for those purposes.

SESHAT

This picture is our alter Seshat. Alters each have their own internal appearance. The Mothers of Darkness had their robes, and other alters had their own particular garb, masks, or animal appearances. One of the things that happens when they dehumanize alters with the mind-control is that they can make those alters believe they are a particular animal. Some alters don't want to be human, because bad things happen to humans.

Most of our cult alters believe they are cats of some kind. The sexual/porn alters are white kittens to play with. Guard alters of the palace of the House of David are fierce lions & tigers. Two big fierce cats guard every palace step. Our Bast alter is a very tall & frightening cat goddess who likes obsedian & cat-eye.

We had animal alters throughout our System. For birds we had owls, doves, swans, eagles, ravens, and orks. We had monkeys, and wheeler-shaped (from the Oz story) critters, and butterflies. Some alters were so dehumanized they became elements. Of course since our programmers were into high level magic they fashioned alters into the four magical elements (the four watchtowers) wind (air), fire, water, and earth. We remember the cages with the monkeys and the cages with the cats. Other Systems have horses and other animals, but we don't have any horses as far as we know. The kind of cats that many of the abusers liked were the kittens for all types of sex and perversity.

Mysterious Egypt was the mother of much of Satanism. Egypt was an occult center for centuries, actually millennia. The occult world believes that the Atlanteans gave their knowledge to Egypt. The men who made our System believed in Atlantis, so it stands to reason that they would look to Egypt for their occultism. Our System may even have been transported to Egypt for a ritual. We know our master visited Egypt. Many Illuminati leaders have made pilgrimages to the Great Pyramid. The year 2000 (the new Millennium) is to be initiated in by rituals at the Great Pyramid.

Our Master was also involved in Freemasonry. Just one example of how Freemasons look to Egypt for their occult knowledge is C.W. Leadbeater's book Ancient Mystic Rites which tells the importance of the ancient Egyptian mystery religions to Freemasonry today. David Carrico wrote an excellent book recently that does a survey of Satanic rituals today and shows that there is a one-to-one correspondence between SRA (Satanic Ritual Abuse) and the Egyptian Book of the Dead (Pert Em Hru). Note also that one of the groups practicing Monarch Mind-control was the Temple of Set (Set was an Egyptian form of Satan). Because Egyptian occultism plays such an important role in Hermetic magic, Freemasonry, and Satanism it should not be any surprise that Egypt plays a role in our System. We had a Queen of the Nile alter. We had a Nile river. We had a number of goddess alters in our System named after Egyptian cat gods, such Bast, Hathor, and Sekhmet. The cat goddess Bast in Egypt was the benevolent side of Hathor. The dark side of Hathor was Sekhmet. (Sekhmet was a lion headed goddess.) Sekhmet was the destroying power of sunlight and could direct (throw) fire. Mut is another sacred cat in our System. Nothing is hidden from our Mother-of-D. alter Nebet. At least a dozen deep alters have Egyptian names.

Seshat (also spelled Sesheta by some) was the alter who was placed in charge of our library. In Egyptian magic, Seshat was a goddess & a wife of Thoth. Her name means 7 pointed flower. She wore a star on her head & a reversed crescent. Our Seshat doesn't wear a star on her head, but our Stella Matutina does. Sometimes the story line will help one understand a System, and sometimes a System doesn't follow the story line. Seshat was the record keeper of the gods. She was the goddess of writing, letters, books, hieroglyphics, history & inventions. How appropriate that they gave our librarian the name Seshat.

Cats play an important role in the occult. Cats were considered gods in Egypt. The Illuminati has practiced the magic of Egypt for many centuries. The worship & importance of cats has always been part of the belief for the governing bodies of the Illuminati. Anyone who killed a cat in Egypt was sentenced to death. This law lasted for centuries. The Persians beat the Egyptians in battle by carrying cats in their arms, because the Egyptians wouldn't fight them. The Egyptian word for cat was an imitation of the sound they make "Mau". The Egyptians thought the cat had 9 lives, and the cat alters in our System were taught this. That is why some of our alters are fearless. They sincerely believe that they have 9 lives. Cats have long been associated with witches. Pussywillows got their name because witches used them. Cats have represented the moon (female) side of magic since Egypt. Diana was sometimes a cat, a foreign equivalent to Bast. Freya's chariot was drawn by cats. If a System has strong likes or dislikes towards objects, then the explanation is most likely that it relates to programming or the System's past history. We are in love with feathers. The alters in our System like feather pillows, feather ties, etc. When we learned that one of our deeper alters is Maat, we began to see why we might be infatuated with feathers. Maat's symbol is a red ostrich feather, and there is a ritual vow "by the feather of Maat". Maat in legend is the one who "will find a way to weave us back into our proper places in the tapestry." Maat serves as an example of a common phenomena.

SYSTEM

There are numerous geometric configurations that can be used for the structure of a structured multiple. In our experience, we have come upon several which seem to be favorites. Remember that Satanists want power, and they believe in the spirit world, so they are going to create Systems which give them spiritual power. This is why you will find the Kabala (also spelled Qabala or Caballa etc.) in Monarch survivors. The pyramid is another favorite structure. A double pyramid is also used by Satan a lot. A spider web is often used as a communication network within a survivor. A rubix cube is often used as a basis of the a system's structure. Our System is a 3-D system. However, in the books that the CIA/Illuminati keep where they write down all that they do, and keep track of our access codes etc. they represent our 3-D system with charts on paper. Sometimes double helixes will be run up the middle of cube alters. We have the infinity sign in our System which is simply a segment of a double helix.

Some survivors will have Systems structured around a pentegram or a sphere.

After the programmers decide what structure they want as the organizational basis, then they have to decide the basic scripts to give to the victim. With enough torture the victim accepts the scripts, and inversions in reality occur, i.e. pain is love.

The programmers must decide what methodology they want for codes. The codes must be simple enough but still successful. There are some standard codes for Monarch slaves, and then there are System specific codes. Cards and dominos were used in our System. The ace could be high or low. Using cards was very handy and fit well with a 13 x 13 x 13 grid. The jokers of the deck were wild. They could take on the appearance of anything in the System.

Aleister Crowley's book 777 is a good book for understanding the occult relationship between various lists of things. Such as the planets relationship to specific gems etc. This is one book that may help some survivors understand the code system used in their MPD System.

For us a Blue Topaz Ring control some programs. A black onyx ring and a diamond can activate other programs. Rings are used in hypnosis by the programmers.

When the System is touched, the Armageddon suicide programming comes alive. Note, that the top of this picture shows the Armageddon programming kicking in. Our System had rings of the tree. The tree was the root or structure that managed to organize our programs. The programming had different seasons. Winter was when there was no fruit.

They would add new branches onto our tree, by raping us with what they called "a growing tree." In this fashion they added on new programming. The sexual act was also a demonic sealing of the programming. When they wanted us to suicide ourselves, we were to "prune" our internal tree, i.e. cut off a limb. They associated numbers with this tree and ran it roots into our toes and feet.

The HIERARCHY

One of the least known facts is that Saturn has been the center of human worship worldwide for thousands of years. The book The Saturn Myth is a detailed investigation of the secret but extensive worldwide worship of Saturn. Both Sun worship and Saturn worship are linked to Satan worship. Upon close examination Saturn and Sun worship are but fronts for Satan worship. The occult world knows this, but outside of the occult world it remains a secret to many. Rome was the City of Saturn. Rome has been an important center for satanism and its mystery religions for many centuries. Our picture placed Saturn (Satan) at the top of the world. His goat head can be seen inside the rings of Saturn. However, the alter who made this picture refused to crown Satan, so she turned his crown upside down.

In addition to Satan, the satanic Hierarchy is pictured. The human leadership consists of the Council of Nine, the Grand Druid Council of 13, and many other lesser groups. The Illuminati kings have transcended good and evil and are living selfish gods. They practice blood sacrifices on a regular basis.

Satan also has a hierarchy of demons, with Beelzebub as his right hand spirit. It is hard to understand Satanism without giving into learning about spiritual things. A perfectly logical person will not understand many of the decisions that Satanists make, because the Satanists make decisions based upon their religious outlook, and upon sometimes obscure occult ideas that have no basis in logic, except the "logic of demonic insanity".

Generational Satanism is based upon oligarchies which control the world. The British royal family, as well as their relatives who make up the rest of European royalty are from a satanic bloodline. The King of Denmark will sneak away to rituals.

The backdrop to all this power which dominates the world in our picture are the fires of hell. Our programmer wanted to be powerful in hell. To understand our System better, people need to understand that some of our alters were concerned that they had ruined their master eternally by leaving Satanism. Our Master's chances to succeed in hell depended upon how well we did as Satanists. Of course outsiders may think that this is very ludicrous, but when that is your world view, it is not easy to want to leave your status in Satanism for the outside world which is very confused, unloving, and sick. Satanism can be best understood by those who have spiritual understanding.

Inside the clock is a little girl who represents us. In front of her is a daisy. When we were tortured in the cages, Dr. Green would pull off daisy petals and say, "I love you, I love you not." Children were killed if he ended by saying "I love you not." We developed quite a guilty complex that we survived when so many other innocent children were put to death. At the time we did not realize that these were cult children who were raised, adopted or bought solely for the purpose of being killed. Even if their fate was predetermined, that doesn't mean the whole process is not a tragedy. The whole satanic mess is sometimes so overwhelming to us that we just raise our hands like in the picture and say to ourselves mentally, "No more, we've learned enough."

But often the mind is simply impotent when it is controlled by the programming. Demons wrap themselves around the internal world like a covering, and the mind walks around in a satanic fog, never really alert to the outside world, and never able to get in touch with the true self. The spirit of the victim is robbed of peace and joy and feels sentenced to eternal damnation and eternal estrangement from a God she has been convinced by her abusers hates her.

Today, just as the title of Alice Bailey's book The Externalization of the Hierarchy suggests, the hierarchy is getting more and more public. Satanism is creeping into all facets of life. Today's popular music bands, today's popular movies, cartoons, and shows, today's art work are all showing signs of Satanism. Things that used to be done in occult lodges are being done increasingly in the public's eye.

However, the Illuminati rituals are still done in extreme secrecy. Special ritual languages such as Enochian are used. Latin is also used in ritual. The demons assist Satanists in speaking in these obscure languages. Some families pass down the Enochian language like an heirloom. Most Monarch systems of the Illuminati have secret multi-lingual abilities. Remember, that Systems like ours were created to function in both the world and in the secret world of generational Satanism.

THE CORE SLEEPS

When a person's mind creates Multiple Personality the original person is called the core. When a person is split young like we were, the programmers have many years in which to create havoc with a person's core, so that it becomes dangerous and difficult to work with the core.

When the internal programmers began to anticipate the deprogramming they began activity around the core. In the picture the core is sound asleep under the carousel. The core of a System is usually greatly manipulated by Satanic programmers in order to insure the success of their plans and programming. They split our core into 13 parts and these core parts were named Silence 1 through Silence 13. Our SILENCE 1 was hidden deep in the mountain when the world shifted in 1994. When she was on the light side, the light side would hover over her. She was the guardian angel, over the Garden of Eden who protects the core's love for Daddy (Papa). Silence has spiders in her casket who bite her to keep her sleeping. Only the Prince can come and wake her up. She is loyal to the Prince (Daddy) who sang music to her as a little girl. For anyone else to wake her up meant that the mirrors would break and the broken heart will result in heart failure for the System.

Giving this Silence (the Princess) the kiss of death by the Wizard (who is the toad or prince) wakes her up. Who is this silent Princess--could it be Snow White who the dwarfs are protecting and care for? The Prince (aka Father of Time or Kronos or Ahab) can access and wake her up. He will kiss the 18 month old Silence. This 18 month old Silence is referred to by the System as Queen. When she wakes up she will be integrated with the Mothers of Darkness when the Illuminati want to use the Mothers of Darkness. Silence holds the key programming for why the Core acts like she does. Silence is guarded by Elizabeth and other light side care providers.

Our Silence was a Sleeping Beauty. Systems like ours have a back up program called the Princess Program. The Princess programming involves the core, waking her up, and moving her to a dark castle where she gives her energy to the dark side. The Princess Programming is a powerful back up program when it kicks in.

Our SILENCE 2 lives in a different place. The Ribbons lived with her, so it sounds like she lived in Petra which is a city within a mountain before we deprogrammed. The second angel (actually an evil spirit) guards the gate to the Garden of Eden also known as Petra. Silence 2 is the key to the dungeon which is hidden below in a deeper level. This has been protected by an army which may be the equivalent of the Nome army of the Wizard of Oz story. The story of Snow White and the Seven dwarfs also plays a major role in Silence 2's programming.

The other Silences of our System were hidden from the core, to use as a subtle form of black mail to the core. She of course wanted to be joined with those very young parts because they carried the little child's pure love for their father (who after bonding with the child programmed it.) When a child loves its father, and then that father abuses the child a very clean split in the mind occurs. The child cannot deal with two contradictory images of one person. How can a wonderful loving parent also be a terrible abuser?

Also in the picture is the yellow brick road. The Yellow Brick Road is the runway in which alters were trained to fly off from to exit their internal world and take the body.

The Yellow Brick Road also pertains to the assignment that an alter is given. To follow the Yellow Brick Road is to go down the road that has been assigned by command. The Yellow Brick Road programming is placed into the child's mind via the Yellow Brick Road of the Wizard of Oz story. Remember the key words, "Follow the Yellow Brick Road."

To get someone onto the Yellow Brick Road you must know the access code to get them through the poppy field. The color blue was important in our programming to the process.

Fiddler is important to the yellow brick road and then the people eat what is variously called music or a script or a letter which are words meaning "instructions". Notice that the picture has a great deal of scripts in the lower left.

Notice all the activity as the slippers and shoes are very busy while the core sleeps.

The Clockmaker (a.k.a. Clockkeeper) has the knowledge of the clocks. The primary clock is often disguised, but it is always gold. That is why the clock in this picture is gold. The clockmaker makes the clocks. The Clockholder positions the clocks in the System. The gold item changes form according to what is needed but it always carries its own [level's] abbreviation.

The clocks control the programmers. The clocks have the ability to be invisible.

The clock can be disguised as a bomb.

There is a Grandfather clock near the castle, when it strikes 1 it is time for a new system era. The clocks control several things. It is important for people to begin to be in a spiritual position to correctly deal in a positive way with both demons and alters. Our clockmaker turned out to be a demon, but his helper the clock holder turned out to be an alter.

SISTERS

In the picture we see two "twinned" sisters. Central to the picture is the clock pendalum which continues keeping time. Just like time continues to tick away whether we are conscious of it or not, the twinning programming continues to tick away inside Systems which have been twinned together.

It is common procedure in the Illuminati to adopt children out to other occult families in order to hide lineages and parenthood. Satanists will secretly impregnate women of the Illuminati in order to create secret siblings. From our experience it looks like actual half sisters are used for creating programmed twins. Perhaps there are exceptions, but that is what we saw growing up in the Illuminati. Even if there was an exception and the "twins" are not half sisters, after they have been programmed to believe so, then they function with that understanding. Many of the survivors of the type of mind control we experienced have been adopted or raised by people other than their actual parents.

Our dark side alters were not allowed to realize that they had a family in the world. The only family they knew was the cult family. Aunts who were already in the Illuminati as Mothers of Darkness helped program and groom us. One of these aunts required us to thank her when she electo-shocked us. We thanked her for having disciplined us to make us good. From what we know, the generational Satanic families have been creating MPD for generations. Our father and aunts had MPD.

Our Monarch twin sister was trauma-bonded to us. In other words, some of the same type of programming that bonded us to our abusers was used to bond us to our "twin". Therapists would do twinned sisters a favor if they make a effort to console and counsel with their clients' twins. At times, the therapist has no idea that his client is bonded very closely with someone else. If one twin goes into the hospital the other one feels it. If one dies, the other twin may very well die.

Monarch twins will have alters in each others Systems who look like the other person, and who have the same names. Male twins and female twins may well have parts of their Systems which relate to each other sexually. Parts of our System were placed in competition with parts of our twin for the affection of our programmer. I say this so that people understand how the bonding between two Systems can be on many different levels, and is complex. Just because two front alters of two Systems don't have a close relation, doesn't mean that deeper parts don't feel very close. The trauma bonding will produce a love-hate relationship between 2 Systems too.

When two Systems meet, a wild party takes place as dozens of alters pop in and out and communication takes place on many different levels.

Besides having alters which are images of our twins, we had mirror images of all our alters. Understanding a Monarch multiple's System is not easy.

For more on twinning programming see the previous page on Twinning.

PREFACE

Just as this book was being completed, the scandal that has come to be associated with Penn State took a definitive turn. Gerald "Jerry" Sandusky, the football team's defensive coordinator for many years, was convicted of forty-five counts of sexual crimes against children. Soon thereafter, the Freeh Report concluded that "four of the most powerful people" at the university, including Coach Joe Paterno, had covered up the situation and "exhibited a striking lack of empathy for Sandusky's victims."[1] The NCAA quickly imposed severe sanctions, which included a penalty that would provide millions of dollars for child abuse prevention programs. It is, no doubt, the most important child sexual abuse story in recent years. One particular aspect of the story shocked the sensibilities of many: Mike McQueary testified that when he was a graduate assistant at Penn State he saw Jerry Sandusky in the shower with a boy who Sandusky appeared to be subjecting to a sexual assault. McQueary reported the incident to Coach Paterno. Although there are differing accounts about precisely what McQueary said, there is no disagreement about the fact that nobody higher up in the university contacted law enforcement. The criminal trial established that Sandusky sexually abused several more boys after top officials at the university had more than sufficient reason to report him.

What surprised me most about the Penn State story—after spending fifteen years researching and writing this book—was that so many people were flabbergasted that a cover-up like this could occur. Everyone knows, of course, about the massive cover-up of similar events in the Roman Catholic Church. Indeed, a few commentators were quick to draw parallels between the cases by casting football as religion and coach Paterno as the pope. But while we have overcome our collective denial about the possibility that a priest could abuse a child, we have also managed to compartmentalize the lessons from the Catholic Church cases, an issue to which I will return at the end of the book.

Meanwhile, how could child sexual abuse be covered up for as long as it was at Penn State? There are two important answers. First, as Suzanne Sgroi said decades ago, we abhor child sexual abuse in the abstract but we tolerate it in reality.[2] The abhorrence gets all the publicity. This is how we talk about child sexual abuse—with the language of disgust and disapproval. But that is not how we, as a society, tend to act in specific cases. Instead, we often minimize and deny so as to allow us to avoid seeing things we would rather not see. Turning a blind eye to the sexual abuse of children has a long history in this country. So does protecting "upstanding citizens" against such claims. Communities have been known to rally around people convicted of this crime, making arguments to mitigate the punishment because of their "good deeds." There was a particularly egregious version of this response in my home state, Rhode Island, in 1997, when a superior court judge overturned his own verdict convicting Father Louis Dunn of rape after receiving an outpouring of letters orchestrated from churchgoers who attested to the ex-priest's character. Though the judge's actions were unprecedented—and eventually overturned by the state Supreme Court[3]—rallying around a convicted child rapist is not at all unusual.

The second reason the events at Penn State did not surprise me stems directly from the argument of this book. We have, over the last twenty years, discounted the word of children who might testify about sexual abuse. We have become more worried about overreacting to child sexual abuse than we are about underreacting to it. The Penn State case is filled with concern on the part of administrators about whether Sandusky was being treated "humanely," with little or no apparent regard for his possible victims. We are far too quick to dismiss the word of a child these days in the name of worrying about "child suggestibility." This development—unlike our contradictory views about sex offenses in general versus sex offenders in particular—is recent. Ironically, an overly dismissive view of children is a function of the very cases that opened the doors to allowing younger children to testify in the first place. Those cases occurred in the 1980s; many of them became infamous, and many were later overturned on appeal. All of those cases have since been cast as wrongful accusations or wrongful convictions, thanks in large part to claims about child suggestibility. Notably, the successful case against Sandusky was built on the testimony of people who were children at the time of the incidents. All were male and at least eighteen at the time they testified. The case might well have come out differently had the facts been the same but the witnesses all adolescents or younger at the time of their testimony.

This book challenges the argument that our society overreacted to the sexual abuse of children and, in the process, engaged in a series of "witch-hunts" in the 1980s. Based on the first comprehensive examination of trial court records from those cases, this book argues that the witch-hunt narrative does not do justice to the facts of these cases. The very cases that have been used to justify the claim that children are "highly suggestible" demonstrate how easy it is to make the claim regardless of the evidence. This book does not, however, claim that every controversial conviction from the 1980s was rightly decided, or that every reversal on appeal was misplaced. Rather, it questions the much more extreme claim that there were hundreds or thousands of injustices during this time that were akin to the Salem witch trials. In my view, there were some injustices during this period that merit serious concern. Several are detailed in this book. But to claim that those cases define a whole period is to adopt a view not borne out by the evidence.

The research for this book began with the investigation of a single case. At the time, I thought I was writing a book review of Satan's Silence: Ritual Abuse and the Making of an American Witchhunt, by Debbie Nathan and Michael Snedeker. The book argues that scores of injustices, akin to the Salem witch trials, were perpetrated around the country in the 1980s through prosecutions for child sexual abuse. The book was dedicated to "the men and women still incarcerated, including those whose names we know," followed by a two-column list of proper names, along with place names in parentheses. Surprisingly, many of those identified on the dedication page were not mentioned in the book; several others were referenced in the book but in no more than a sentence or two. It struck me as strange that the very cases allegedly constituting the strongest and most concrete evidence of a nationwide series of witch-hunts would receive so little attention in a book on the very subject. On closer examination, it appeared that only a few of the cases on the dedication page had been the subject of original research.[4] Although the witch-hunt narrative often refers to "hundreds" of these cases, the same handful of cases are at the core of most publications. Three of them, beginning with McMartin and including Kelly Michaels and Frank Fuster, are the subject of detailed chapters ahead. Before getting to the merits of those cases, however, one might wonder why an allegedly national wave of witch-hunts is routinely illustrated by stories about the same handful of cases.

I decided to look into Robert Halsey's case from nearby Massachusetts. Halsey's name was on the dedication page of Satan's Silence but never actually appeared in the book. After reviewing the trial transcript, with the assistance of an excellent research assistant who went to the Berkshires more than once, I found it difficult to imagine why anyone would think that Halsey was anything but guilty, as he was found by jury and by all appellate judicial panels since then. The transcript was filled with cross-corroborating evidence of guilt. The idea of a book review had turned into an article. I called it "The Legend of Robert Halsey."[5]

I then expanded my research horizons to other cases on Nathan and Snedeker's dedication page. I continued to find significant evidence contradicting the conventional wisdom about these cases. This was not my only finding—the wrongful conviction of Bernard Baran is elaborated in Chapter Three—but it was the predominant one. The more this happened, the more important it was that my research should encompass an expansive number of cases in order to be sure I was doing justice to the witch-hunt narrative. The idea was inspired by Darwin's fabled practice of posting for himself notes with any evidence contrary to his own theories or expectations; in this way, "the arguments most easily forgotten" would have to be confronted and explained.[6] I was inclined to doubt the witch-hunt narrative in part from personal experience. I had experienced the preference of many organizations to protect their reputation rather than confront evidence of sexual abuse when I sued the San Francisco Boys Chorus in 1994 for failing to act decades earlier on multiple forms of evidence indicating there was rampant sexual abuse of boys, including me, at their summer camp. I was open about the matter during the pendency of the case, fighting successfully to keep from having the entire matter sealed and insisting on a public apology to settle the suit.[7] But the personal experience that has been far more important, I think, in shaping some of the content of this book is my weekly involvement with the Sex Offender Treatment Program at the Rhode Island Department of Corrections in Cranston. I have been volunteering there since 1998. I teach ethics-related courses designed to help develop cognitive and social skills among men (and two women once, for ten weeks) who tend to see the world in extremely black-and-white terms. I also sit in on core treatment groups from time to time. Through this experience, I have encountered hundreds of sex offenders over the years. I sought the experience largely to help myself understand why anyone commits these crimes. I stayed because the understanding I have gained in answering the question tells me that treatment programs are meaningful and important to public safety.

Meanwhile, the research project expanded to include the list of thirty-six cases that had been made famous in a 1988 series in a Tennessee newspaper. This is when I committed myself to writing at least one book. My focus was on primary documents, not on what people might have to say years after the fact about these cases; I was interested in records of what happened then, at the time of the cases. First and foremost, this meant trial transcripts. Almost all of the cases involved trials. Finding the transcripts was often challenging, particularly for cases that had ended in acquittal or mistrial. Other challenges included protective orders and statutory protections making it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain some transcripts. Almost nothing from the era was computerized, and there were limits to how much assistance even the most cooperative court clerk could provide. Some inquiries had to be made in person; some things had to be viewed in person. Those problems were all solvable, but quite challenging nevertheless. Also, long trials fill lots of boxes. Rarely was there an inventory of any sort, and inevitably there were things missing. These could be significant problems where a trial lasted for many months.

Several years of research demonstrated there were three significant research challenges to this project that I had not fully appreciated: (1) the sheer scale and complexity of the cases, (2) the difficulties locating and copying or inspecting transcripts and related documents, and (3) the limits of written transcripts, particularly of interviews with young children. The scale and complexity problem is apparent in the three major case studies in this book. It also inspired an article about these research challenges.[8] I came to call this work Extreme Research, and I did it for almost fifteen years. During that time, I worked with more than eighty research assistants at Brown University, and I spent a small fortune on photocopying and the transcribing services of court stenographers. It was a massive effort that is still in progress for a few cases. Nevertheless, I am struck by the limitations of what I was able to cover in detail after employing a vast array of resources and research assistants over so many years. I simply did not have the space to cover all the cases I have researched; nor have I finished exhaustively researching every case in the project. Several that merit detailed treatments will be covered in future publications, particularly the Jordan, Minnesota cases and the Snowden case from Dade County, Florida. Some of the cases where I reached a dead-end could undoubtedly still be researched further. Indeed, it was clear that I could probably follow leads for another fifteen years. But there were also basic realities, from research funding to expected mortality, to be considered.

What I set out to do in this research was to assess the actual record in cases and make some independent assessments about the nature and quality of the evidence. Most of the cases analyzed in this book have been held out as modern-day witch-hunts, as cases in which there was no credible evidence of abuse. This view, as described in Chapter One, has been disseminated and accepted so widely that I refer to it as the witch-hunt narrative. This narrative appears in newspapers, magazines, and a range of academic publications from psychology and law to history and cultural studies. Some of those publications are now more than twenty years old, but many are much more recent, as the prominent cases in this book continue to be discussed by journalists and academics. This book adds to the vast array of publications that already express an opinion about these cases. The book challenges the witch-hunt narrative in a variety of ways. Those familiar with the narrative know where to find an enormous supply of countervailing views to challenge almost all of the views expressed in this book. Readers not familiar with the witch-hunt narrative are encouraged to examine the sources cited in Chapter One.

All readers are cautioned about the limits of even the most comprehensive archival research. These limitations cut against the degree of certainty that should be attributed to some of my conclusions. First, there are inherent obstacles to assessing cases on the basis of a cold transcript and other similarly limited documentary evidence. For the same reason videotapes of interviews with children (or adults) convey far more information than transcripts of the same interviews, viewing the presentation of evidence in a courtroom provides a stronger basis for drawing conclusions about certain evidence than does reviewing the trial transcripts alone. Fortunately, videotapes of interviews were at the heart of some cases, and I had the advantage of viewing such videotapes in two of the three chapter-length cases studies in this book; I heard audiotapes in the other. Still, I did not observe any of the extensive court testimony and therefore have the disadvantage of not observing body language or the intonation of witnesses. A second limitation of transcripts, especially when studied years later, is that they rarely include the exhibits. Transcripts are saved as archival documents in many jurisdictions, but the exhibits are ultimately property of the parties and generally returned to the parties or destroyed once the case (including any possible appeals) is complete. This limitation has particular relevance for medical testimony, where the exhibits (usually photographic slides in child sexual abuse cases) must be available in order to assess the evidence discussed in the transcript. I located slides and medical reports in some instances and consulted more than one expert about those matters, but in many cases the exhibits were not available, which limits the ability to make independent assessments about the evidence. As a reminder, these limitations are pointed out in several places in the text. Finally, there are limitations imposed by the realities of book publishing, dictating that a book covering dozens of cases cannot go into comprehensive detail for every case. Doing so would result in an unfeasibly long book, reading more like a series of books with dozens of case-based narratives than a single book with an overall argument. Accordingly, I have analyzed three cases in chapter-length (or long-form) detail and dozens more in short form, usually a few pages.

The nature of the analysis varies significantly, from chapter-length case studies to short-form treatments, even though many of the cases treated in short form involved extensive research efforts. The primary analytical question in the short-form cases was a threshold question: Was there credible evidence of abuse sufficient to have justified the state in bringing the case to trial? In answering this question, I examined the record as comprehensively as I could. I wanted to know what evidence was put forth and what arguments were made by the defense. But the analysis was not a full-blown weighing of the evidence; nor was the evidence held against the criminal court standard of proof—beyond a reasonable doubt. Instead, I looked to see whether there was evidence that appeared credible to me, and if so, I described its nature. My having concluded that there was credible evidence in a case does not mean the defendant was necessarily guilty. But it does mean that in my opinion, as documented by evidence I reviewed, there was sufficient reason for authorities to have investigated and brought charges. This means, by definition, that the case was not a witch-hunt. To the contrary, it is the state's duty to take action when there is credible evidence of child sexual abuse, as with any crime. Evidence that supports my opinions about these cases is described and documented in the text. In no instance are my opinions based on evidence not presented to the reader. But some of the evidence that supports my opinions goes beyond the trial transcripts to include police reports and other administrative records. Such evidence has not been subjected to the rigors of cross-examination, which might well diminish its credibility. Indeed, reasonable people will undoubtedly disagree about whether such evidence should be considered, and if so, how much weight it should be afforded.

The chapter-length cases involve a more detailed engagement of the evidence. This provides a basis for conclusions beyond the low-threshold question explored in the short-form case chapters. As for the long-form case chapters, I sought to ask a higher threshold question: whether there was substantial evidence supporting the state's case. A case with substantial evidence involves much more than the showing necessary to justify investigation or even arrest and indictment. It is more than enough evidence to support carrying the charges forward and withstanding a motion to dismiss the case for lack of sufficient evidence. In the course of making these assessments, I employ the terms credible evidence, corroborating evidence, and solid medical evidence; all of these assessments are my opinion and my opinion alone. The basis for these opinions is explained in the text, and the foundations of these opinions are documented in full. But this evidence could strike others differently. Indeed, some of the jurors in one of these cases, the McMartin trial, and in the retrial reached conclusions that differed from my view elaborated in this book.

My opinion that there was substantial evidence is not the same as drawing a conclusion about guilt. I make no pretense of being a prosecutor, judge, or jury. A child sexual abuse case with substantial evidence could leave some reasonable people with sufficient doubt that they would not vote to convict under a standard requiring evidence of guilt "beyond a reasonable doubt." This might even be true in cases where there was medical evidence. Although medical evidence can be diagnostic evidence of sexual abuse, it generally speaks to the injury and not to the perpetrator. This issue was particularly relevant in the McMartin case. For all of these reasons, I have tempered my evaluation to stop short of conclusions about the ultimate outcome in two of the three chapter-length cases. (The third case, Frank Fuster, is more definitive for several reasons as described further in that chapter, including a positive STD test involving the throat of his son, who was under his custody and control.)

There is an important difference between scholarly arguments about cases and legal judgments about the same cases. The former do not carry any legal weight, and the latter merit respect for their authority. Reconsidering evidence as done in this book is purely an academic exercise. And no matter how complicated a case may be, the ultimate legal outcome is generally quite clear. Contrast the clear outcome with the mixed messages contained in the procedural history of the first two chapter-length cases. In both cases, some or all jurors voted for guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, but this was not the ultimate legal disposition. In the first case (McMartin), two consecutive juries were divided on some charges, but all of the charges were eventually dismissed; in the second case (Michaels), the jury voted unanimously to convict on almost all of the charges, but a court of appeals reversed the verdict and all charges were later dismissed. In both of those cases, the legal disposition is clear: in the eyes of the law, the defendants are not guilty. In legal terms, those judgments are final and I respect them. That said, it is also true that having charges dropped after a hung jury or having charges dismissed after an appeals court overturns a conviction is not the same thing as being factually innocent. There are rare cases in the criminal justice system where an appellate court or a trial judge directs a finding that a defendant is innocent. Much more commonly, however, reversals on appeal are not based on decisions about the facts, and they often allow the possibility of retrial. And acquittals are open to interpretation. In addition to the possibility of a defendant being innocent, there are many pragmatic reasons for a prosecutor choosing not to retry a case that already ended in conviction once. There is a similar range of possible explanations for a not-guilty verdict, which can mean anything from the jury having a very small but reasonable doubt about guilt to the jury concluding the defendant was factually innocent. The defendant is entitled to the presumption of innocence under the law; academics are entitled to consider the range of possible explanations that could lead to legal determinations of not guilty.

The burden of proof in criminal cases is designed to promote the kind of results expressed in Blackstone's formulation that it is better that ten guilty persons escape than that one innocent suffer.[9] This is why the state must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. The high burden of proof is related to the fact that one's liberty is at stake. But the same facts that might not dispel all reasonable doubts might nevertheless be more than legally sufficient for, say, a school board to dismiss a coach.[10] Similarly, a victim (or the family) might well be able to win a civil verdict against a defendant who was found not guilty in criminal court for the same actions. This is precisely what happened in the O. J. Simpson case. There was a "preponderance of evidence"—a common standard of proof in civil cases—to support the conclusion that Simpson was responsible for civil damages, but the jury in the criminal case decided the case had not been proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Of course, many people disagreed with the jury's not-guilty verdict. And even though we can and should be able to debate about the evidence in the case, we should also respect the fact that, in the eyes of the law, Simpson was found not guilty.

The cases in this book are foundational cases in the public discourse about child sexual abuse and about children as witnesses. They have also become an integral part of academic discourse about the suggestibility of children. Much of the discourse is premised on the assumption that these cases did not involve any credible evidence of sexual abuse. I hope this book contributes to a lively debate about the facts of those cases; but whether it does or not, there is plenty of published work to provide any interested reader with a strong dose of opinions other than those advanced in this book. Putting the conventional wisdom to the test of the actual record is, nevertheless, a matter of considerable importance. The extent to which the findings in this book contradict the witch-hunt narrative matters far beyond the historical record. It also matters for how children are viewed as witnesses.

Chapter Seven considers the legacy of the witch-hunt narrative in light of recent developments. The chapter begins with an examination of recent events that have dominated the framing of child sexual abuse in the media: the cases against the Catholic Church and the recent Penn State case. The chapter also examines the worrisome politics of sex offender punishment that have emerged in the last twenty years. The chapter concludes by considering the legacy of the witch-hunt narrative: how it has undermined the credibility of children as witnesses and is taking aim at the institutions and professionals who respond to child sexual abuse complaints.

I close with the hope that anyone who approaches my work with skepticism—and a certain amount of skepticism is always healthy—will hold the witch-hunt narrative to the same standards of evidence and proof that are applied to the arguments in this book. I could not ask for anything more, and I hope that critics of my work will do nothing less.

The Witch-Hunt Narrative

PART I

THE RISE OF THE WITCH-HUNT NARRATIVE

Introduction

The Infamous Child Sexual Abuse Cases of the 1980s

Child sexual abuse emerged into public discourse in the United States in the early 1980s. A public opinion poll in 1983 indicated that almost all parents were aware of the problem and had seen a story about it in the media. This is a remarkable change from two decades earlier, when the physical abuse of children was just being recognized by physicians and sexual abuse was still largely invisible. The only kind of sex crime that was readily acknowledged before then was "stranger danger," which is actually quite rare but seems much more common because of all the attention it receives. Incest, the most prevalent form of child sexual abuse, was the subject of a groundbreaking television movie, Something About Amelia, that drew sixty million viewers in the first week of January 1984. Jeffrey Masson's expose about Freud's suppression of the seduction theory was the February 1984 cover story in The Atlantic. Masson argued that archival documents proved that Freud had renounced his views about the prevalence of incest in order to curry the professional approval of those who could not accept his initial position. As that story captivated many intellectuals, Wayne Satz, a television reporter in Los Angeles, started a series of graphic stories about an ongoing child sexual abuse investigation concerning the McMartin Preschool in Manhattan Beach, California. An avalanche of media coverage followed and seven people connected to the school—six women and one man—were eventually arrested in what would soon be described as the largest child molestation case in history. The case would come to define an era of prosecutions involving child sexual abuse. It would give rise to competing narratives and competing advocacy organizations. And it would raise important questions about how children disclose sexual abuse, how they should be interviewed, and the role of children as witnesses in court.

The McMartin Case and Others

The allegations in the McMartin case began with claims against Ray Buckey, a twenty-two-year-old college dropout who worked at the preschool founded by his grandmother, Virginia McMartin. Several months later, other teachers at the school were also named as alleged perpetrators, and the claims about the abuse became stranger and more difficult to believe. There were allegations of children being "swapped" between preschools near McMartin. There were allegations of their being transported to other places, including a farm, where children allegedly saw a horse beaten to death in order to keep them quiet. A Sheriff's Task Force was created specifically to investigate "ritual abuse" claims. The term ritual abuse carries many different definitions. The most extreme definitions often include a component related to satanism, along with the idea that organized, even intergenerational, groups of people are involved. That view took hold among some parents, therapists, and investigators in the McMartin case. It is encapsulated in the claim that there were tunnels underneath the preschool where children were sexually abused.

After an extended preliminary hearing, the district attorney dropped charges against five of the seven defendants. The case went forward against Ray Buckey and his mother, Peggy Buckey. The decision pleased almost no one. Two polar views of the case had taken hold by then. Those allied with the organization Believe the Children thought that more defendants should have been pursued and that none should have been dismissed. Those allied with the defense thought that all of the charges should have been dropped, including those against Peggy and Ray Buckey. Those deeply divided perspectives reflected larger differences about how children are viewed. Those allied with Believe the Children took the view that children "do not lie" about sexual abuse. Those allied with the defendants seemed to think that nothing any child said could be believed.

The McMartin case became the defining case of the era. It began in 1983 and ended in 1990. A detailed timeline of the case is presented in Chapter Two, which is devoted to the McMartin case. In some respects, there was no other like it in intensity, duration, or scope. On the other hand, the McMartin case was one of a larger group across the country that seemed related. A list of fifteen appears in Table 1.1. A list of thirty-six cases emerged from an investigative series in a Tennessee newspaper in 1988; the first nine found in Table 1.1 are also in that list of thirty-six, which is examined in detail in Chapter Three.

These cases were difficult for law enforcement to investigate and difficult for prosecutors to prosecute because the children were young and the cases were new to the system. When they were filed, the cases were generally seen as evidence that society was taking the protection of children against sexual abuse seriously. But many became the longest trial in the history of their respective county or state. As they dragged on, the cases became more confounding. In the McMartin instance, it became impossible to believe that all of the allegations were true, but it also seemed unlikely that all of them were baseless. Many jurors voted to convict Buckey on some counts in each of two separate trials. Although he was acquitted of most charges in the first case, Buckey was retried on charges involving three girls. All of those charges ended in a hung jury, with eight voting for conviction on one charge, and fewer than that on all others; a mistrial was declared. All pending charges were dismissed soon thereafter. A trial originally hailed as "the largest child molestation case ever" fizzled entirely.

The Rise of the Witch-Hunt Narrative

The idea that any of the day-care sexual abuse cases that first arose in the 1980s might actually be wrongful prosecutions was never given serious consideration during the earliest phase of the McMartin case. Though news stories during the first few months of the McMartin case included such requisite words as "alleged," it was clear from the initial coverage that the charges were basically accepted as true by those reporting them. When Satz reported the earliest McMartin stories on KABC television, the news anchors weighed in with editorial statements of sympathy and horror after various stories, indicating an endorsement of allegations that had not even become legal charges yet.[1] Writing about the case in April 1984, People magazine called the McMartin preschool "a sexual house of horrors."[2] There were isolated voices to the contrary, but they were few and far between.[3] The mainstream media, as media critic David Shaw put it years later, "didn't light a match within three miles of the D.A.'s feet during the first year or two of the case."[4]

The idea that the McMartin case might be a "witch hunt" was first promoted by the "Friends of McMartin" in the summer of 1985. The group, affiliated with the defense in the McMartin case, placed ads in a local newspaper that compared the case to the Salem Witch Trials. The witch-hunt narrative—a view that cases across the country were akin to the Salem witch trials nearly three hundred years earlier—was forged and disseminated over the next few years by a handful of writers. The San Francisco Examiner published a series of stories by A. S. Ross under the banner "A Presumption of Guilt" in September 1986, giving voice to the argument that authorities had created "a climate reminiscent of the 17th century Salem witch trials" in these cases.[5] The series included a map with capsule summaries of thirteen "sensational cases across the country." Six of those cases involved day-care settings: the Georgian Hills case in Memphis, Tennessee; the Country Walk case in Dade County, Florida; the Kelly Michaels case in Maplewood, New Jersey; the Fells Acres Day Care case in Malden, Massachusetts; the Small World Preschool case in Niles Township, Michigan; and the West Point Child Development Center from West Point, New York.[6] Several of these, along with the McMartin case, became the core content of the witch-hunt narrative. This narrative argues that coercive and suggestive interviews, conducted by biased interviewers, combined with hysterical parents, overzealous prosecutors, and an unduly credulous media to generate false accusations in cases that had no actual basis in fact.

The next writer to cast these cases as "witch hunts" was Debbie Nathan, who wrote an article called "The Making of a Modern Witch Hunt" in the Village Voice in September 1987. Nathan wrote four more articles in the Village Voice in 1988, contributing significantly to the nascent witch-hunt narrative.[7] Another early contributor to this narrative was Mary Fischer, a freelance writer who wrote three critical articles about the McMartin case in 1988. The one for Los Angeles Magazine, entitled "Media Flip-Flop: Why, Four Years Later the Press Is Taking a Strikingly Different Approach to the McMartin-Preschool Scandal," made the strongest indictment in print of the McMartin case. 60 Minutes had cast doubt on the McMartin case two years earlier, but "Flip-Flop" was a much more sustained argument.[8]

There were other early voices in the witch-hunt narrative. Mary Pride employed the phrase "child abuse hysteria" in her 1986 book The Child Abuse Industry, an attack on child protective service agencies. Pride criticized a national study of family violence by Gelles, Strauss, and Steinmetz as the work of "point men for a whole corps of 'child advocates' who have found a way to impose their elitist, white, upper-class, post-Christian parenting philosophies on the rest of us under the guise of 'fighting child abuse.'"[9] Paul and Shirley Eberle wrote two books that added to the witch-hunt canon, The Politics of Child Abuse (1986) and Abuse of Innocence (1993). The first was quite similar to The Child Abuse Industry; the second blasted the prosecution in the McMartin case on the basis of the Eberles' observations of the trial. None of these early works became influential in the witch-hunt narrative. Pride's writings are best known in the small but avid home-schooling world, where her arguments against intruding on families through child protective services are taken as fundamental beliefs.[10] The Eberles never became a major voice in the witch-hunt narrative either, possibly because of their own dubious history in publication, which included child pornography.[11] Then again, their book about the McMartin case was brought back into print in 2003 by Prometheus Press and is the only book-length treatment of the case in general.[12] Nathan's early witch-hunt writings were undoubtedly convincing to the audience of the Village Voice, and Fischer's work had significant influence in Los Angeles, but there was no national voice for the witch-hunt narrative in those years. It remained largely a marginalized view while these highly contested cases moved forward through the legal system.

The turning point in the evolution of the witch-hunt narrative came with the verdict in the McMartin Preschool case. The defendants were acquitted on most charges, and the jury was hung on the rest. A variety of viewpoints about the case were expressed the next day in the Los Angeles Times. There was an op-ed maintaining that the system worked, there was one supporting the children, there was an editorial cartoon asking ominously what kind of shadow the case would cast, and, on the front page, there was the beginning of a four-part series by media critic Shaw asking Where Was Media Skepticism?[13] This was the last day that such a range of opinions would be expressed on the topic.

Shaw's series proved to be the pivotal piece, scolding the media and his own newspaper for the fiasco that was the McMartin case. He blasted reporters for bias in favor of the prosecution and for giving short shrift to the defense. He chastised Satz, the television reporter who broke the McMartin story, for sensationalism. He criticized Kee MacFarlane, who interviewed many of the children in the case and was later blamed for "implanting" false memories. And he condemned the "pack journalism" that followed. Indeed, Shaw cast the media as a major culprit in the McMartin case, arguing that the five McMartin defendants against whom charges were later dropped might never have been indicted were it not for Satz's intensive and inflammatory coverage before anyone was even charged in the case. The point was well taken, and Shaw's series won a Pulitzer Prize.

Virtually every account written since then has painted the McMartin case as a "witch hunt." The view was memorialized in the award-winning HBO movie Indictment. The same perspective was presented in a chapter about the case in Nathan's 1995 book with defense lawyer Michael Snedeker, Satan's Silence: Ritual Abuse and the Making of an American Witch-Hunt.[14] This has become the conventional wisdom about a case that was once seen as the biggest child sexual abuse case on record. Steven Mintz's Harvard University Press book Huck's Raft: A History of American Childhood enshrines the witch-hunt narrative as the conventional wisdom about the McMartin case.[15]

The 1990s were filled with works that contributed to the witch-hunt narrative. A few reflected original research, most were derivative. There were at least a half-dozen major works in the first half of the 1990s that made significant contributions to this narrative. Together, these works solidified the witch-hunt narrative by providing so many examples, in such a persuasive fashion, that it seemed difficult to imagine how anyone could ever have taken the charges in these cases seriously. By the mid-1990s it was apparent to most casual media observers that the day-care sex abuse cases of the 1980s were something akin to the McCarthyism of the 1950s. They were, as Nathan had put it in 1987, "a modern American witch hunt."

One of the most important contributions to this body of work was an article by Dorothy Rabinowitz in Harper's magazine in May 1990 about the Kelly Michaels case, a day-care case from Maplewood, New Jersey. Rabinowitz was the first writer to craft a convincing story of innocence about someone who had been convicted of child sexual abuse.[16] (The conviction was eventually overturned on appeal.) She also championed the cause of Grant Snowden, a police officer who was convicted of abusing children in a home day-care case in South Miami, and the Amiraults from Malden, Massachusetts, through a series of opinion columns on the editorial page of the Wall Street Journal. (Snowden was eventually released from prison after a federal appellate court overturned his conviction and the state attorney declined to retry the case, which was by then fourteen years old.[17] The Amiraults lost all of their efforts to overturn their convictions.) In part on the basis of her commentary about these cases, Rabinowitz won a Pulitzer Prize for Commentary in 2001.

Another important contribution to the witch-hunt narrative was made by the PBS program Frontline. Producer Ofra Bikel was the first and most prominent critic of the Little Rascals day-care case in Edenton, North Carolina, which also came to be known by the lead defendant's name, Robert Kelly. The first Frontline program about the case was in 1991, before Kelly's conviction. (It was later overturned on appeal.) Bikel followed up with two more programs, giving the Edenton case an extraordinary seven hours of national television coverage. It was enough to leave almost any viewer convinced that the defendants were innocent. Bikel produced several additional hours of programming on related topics in the 1990s, adding to the witch-hunt narrative. Peter Boyer, writing in the New Yorker and producing programs for Frontline, added two more contributions to this narrative with programs that focused on contested child sexual abuse cases linked to Janet Reno when she was state attorney for Dade County, Florida.[18] Those programs live on through program-specific websites created by Frontline.

A third major contribution to the witch-hunt narrative came from Lawrence Wright, who wrote a two-part article in the New Yorker in 1994 on the conviction of Paul Ingram from Olympia, Washington. The article chronicled how the prosecution of an incest case devolved into an elaborate investigation of a fictional satanic cult. Wright made a convincing case that Ingram was innocent of "everything but suggestibility."[19] The article was later published in expanded form as a book and then made into a movie. Another book, Making Monsters, by Richard Ofshe and Ethan Watters, also gave the case significant treatment from the same perspective. But the New Yorker version seemed to captivate people the most. It became an iconic article that impressed many people with the dangers of false convictions for sexual abuse.

In 1995, there were several significant contributions to the witch-hunt narrative that solidified it as the dominant discourse on the day-care sexual abuse cases of the 1980s. The major works were (1) Nathan and Snedeker's Satan's Silence: Ritual Abuse and the Making of an American Witch Hunt, (2) Ceci and Bruck's book Jeopardy in the Courtroom: A Scientific Analysis of Children's Testimony, and (3) Abby Mann's made-for-TV movie Indictment, about the McMartin case.

Debbie Nathan, one of the earliest and most frequent contributors to the witch-hunt narrative, teamed up with defense lawyer Michael Snedeker to write a book that is generally considered to be the most authoritative investigation of the day-care sexual abuse cases of the 1980s. There are full chapters about two significant cases (including McMartin), a detailed chapter about cases across the country, and an impressive amount of original source material covering a wide range of topics related to these cases. The book also contains an ominous and powerful dedication page, to fifty-one named individuals who were in prison when the book was first published, all allegedly falsely convicted on charges that included some kind of ritual abuse element. Satan's Silence has become a major source for most others writing about these cases.

The other major book published in 1995 covered some of the same cases but from the perspective of academic psychology. Stephen Ceci and Maggie Bruck's

Jeopardy in the Courtroom wove together recent laboratory experiments on child suggestibility with case studies from criminal court. The cases that were relied on most extensively were all day-care sex-abuse cases in the 1980s. The four cases discussed the most were Edenton (the one introduced by Bikel on Frontline), Finje (a case in Dade County, Florida, that ended in an acquittal and was also highlighted by Frontline), and two that were in the A. S. Ross story in the San Francisco Examiner in 1986: the Country Walk babysitting case from Dade County, Florida, also known as the Fuster case, and the Kelly Michaels day-care case from Maplewood, New Jersey. Jeopardy in the Courtroom has become highly influential in the field of psychology, representing the mainstream view of "child suggestibility" and children's testimony that was shaped by these cases.

Ceci and Bruck brought to the criticism of these cases the imprimatur of science that had been lacking in the late 1980s. Various mental health professionals had been available for hire as experts by the defense, but these "experts" did not have scientific research to back up their opinions. They criticized interview questions as leading, and they argued that children were highly suggestible; but their expert opinion seemed more a matter of opinion than expertise since there was not a scientific body of literature on the suggestibility of children. (The concept of child suggestibility is essentially that suggestive or coercive questions can cause a child to say and believe things that are not true.) Ceci and Bruck started filling this void in 1993 with an important review article that made suggestibility claims based on recent research.[20] The research was also the basis for a well-known "friend of the court" brief Ceci and Bruck organized in 1993 in the Kelly Michaels case. Their brief sided with Michaels and argued that a combination of suggestive interviewing and interviewer bias made the children's statements unreliable.

Another major contribution to the witch-hunt narrative was Indictment, the made-for-TV movie about the McMartin case. Written by Abby Mann and produced by Oliver Stone, the movie adopted the witch-hunt narrative framework and, in the process, made a strong and explicit claim to authenticity.[21] The film barely raised controversy. The only group inclined to raise objections was the organization Believe the Children, which developed serious credibility problems for having endorsed the view that there were tunnels underneath the school in which children were abused in satanic rituals. Their objection to the movie hardly registered.[22] It is one measure of how mainstream the witch-hunt narrative had become. If the underlying dispute was ever a "war," the side that supported the prosecution in these cases had diminished into an isolated group of parents with little credibility or voice. The war was over. The movie won three Emmys, including Outstanding Made for Television Movie. The Village Voice gave the movie high praise for two consecutive weeks. "Believe the Movie," Gary Indiana's review proclaimed in a play on Believe the Children. The following week, Ellen Willis wrote that the power of the movie, "enhanced by its meticulous fidelity to the facts, leaves no doubt that the case against the proprietors of the McMartin Preschool was a product of mass hysteria."[23]

There were many other contributions to the witch-hunt narrative in the 1990s. Sauer and Okerblom wrote a series in the San Diego Union-Tribune in 1993 that updated a 1988 series in the Memphis Commercial Appeal by Tom Charlier and Shirley Downing. Discussing the same group of cases already mentioned, the authors reported there had been "more than 100" of these cases.[24] There were also a host of columnists who found their own "witch hunt" case to tout. Martin Gardner, who had a column in the Skeptical Inquirer and in Scientific American, wrote about a case near his home in Hendersonville, North Carolina.[25] Thomas Sowell found one through a dissent in which Judge John T. Noonan adopted the witch-hunt narrative.[26] Trevor Armbrister of Reader's Digest did original research into the Bobby Finje case in Dade County.[27] There have been important contributions to the witch-hunt canon since 1995, but they are fewer and farther between. There were some acclaimed critiques of the prosecutions in Wenatchee, Washington, particularly a series by the Seattle Post-Intelligencer.[28] More recently, Andrew Jarecki's documentary Capturing the Friedmans promoted the view that the Friedman case, from 1988 in Great Neck, New York, was a witch-hunt. And in 2009, Sean Penn produced a documentary called Witch Hunt about some of the defendants from the Kern County, California, cases in the mid-1980s.

There were also several online sources promoting the idea of a national wave of "witch hunts" involving child sexual abuse claims. These had a significant effect in spreading the witch-hunt narrative. The most important website in the evolution of the witch-hunt narrative does not exist anymore. It was called the Witch Hunt Information Center and was created in 1993. It carried a prestigious mit.edu address because the webmaster, Jonathan Harris, was teaching in the physics department at the time. Under the main title of the site was the following subtitle or statement of purpose: "Information about the modern version of the witch hunts: ritual (and pseudo ritual) sexual abuse trials and those who have been wrongfully imprisoned by them."[29]

There were various links immediately below the statement, six of them about specific criminal cases. Three were well known from the mainstream media: Kelly Michaels, Frank Fuster, and Robert Kelly. The other three were Harris's contribution. Two were cases from Massachusetts: the Amiraults and Bernard Baran. As Harris later explained it, his interest began with the Frontline program about Edenton, which prompted him to look into the Amirault case in nearby Malden, Massachusetts. The third case Harris contributed to the witch-hunt narrative involved defendants Patrick Figured and Sonja Hill from Smithfield, North Carolina. Harris labeled their case "outrageous" multiple times. His website provided a very brief description of the facts and links to two legal documents: the appellate decision and the defense brief. He also posted a list of "dubious convictions" that was prepared by Debbie Nathan.[30]

It is difficult to appreciate the power of an early website like the Witch Hunt Information Center. Given an MIT web address, it had authoritative status; dozens of other sites linked to it. It was an early, enterprising use of the web for advocacy purposes, and it had obvious influence. Harris's work has been credited with interesting Rabinowitz in the Amirault case. The site became an authoritative source for some. For example, it contained a brief description of the Robert Halsey case in western Massachusetts. Frederick Crews, writing in the New York Review of Books, later claimed that the justice system had "failed" Halsey, a school bus driver whose case had not been written about anywhere as a victim of the child sex abuse "witch-hunts" except the Witch Hunt Information Center.[31] Similarly, after the site provided a description of a case in North Carolina that had not been written about anywhere else, the defendants, Figured and Hill, appeared on Nathan's list of "dubious convictions."

Harris also set up an electronic discussion list called Witchhunt. The idea of such a list was still quite novel in 1993. The internet was just gaining widespread use and engagement by academics. Moreover, the topic was in the news. In its early days, the membership of this list had a remarkable combination of activists and academics. Among the academics were psychology professor Daniel Schacter at Harvard and English professor Frederick Crews at Berkeley, best known for his writings against Freud. Activists included Peter Freyd, a moving force behind the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, and Carol Hopkins, founder of the San Diego–based Justice Committee. The purpose of the electronic list was stated in the form of a question: Is there a child sex abuse witch-hunt?[32] The tag line was contained in the subject heading of every posting to the list. In its earliest days, Harris posted a few genuinely skeptical questions about the witch-hunt narrative itself. For example, he asked whether anyone knew of any criticisms of Ofra Bikel's recent television program on Edenton. No responses were forthcoming, although criticisms had been broadcast by the local PBS station.[33] An undergraduate researching the "witch hunt" cases asked for evidence that there had been more than one hundred cases, noting that the major lists of such cases added up to about fifty. There was no reply that provided documentation to support the claim.[34] The members of the list were generally strong proponents of the witch-hunt narrative. They knew the answer to the question "Is there a child sex abuse witch hunt?" These "witch hunters," as those on this list soon came to describe themselves, were increasingly activists who used the internet to exchange information and ideas. Jonathan Harris may have done more than anyone else to disseminate the witch-hunt narrative in the mid-1990s and beyond.[35]

Another unlikely website that played an important role in promoting the witch-hunt narrative was created as a hobby by some professionals in Canada who call themselves the Ontario Consultants for Religious Tolerance. Their site, which is mainly about religion, is large and receives a significant amount of internet traffic. It is not obvious why a site on "religious tolerance" would have anything to do with contested claims of child sexual abuse. One might hypothesize that the connection involved allegations of satanic ritual abuse made against members of the Wicca religion and even the Church of Satan. But rather than confine the coverage on the Religious Tolerance site to such cases, a section of the site is devoted to "43 M.V.M.O. court cases with allegations of sexual abuse and physical abuse of multiple children." (M.V.M.O. means multi-victim and multi-offender.) Eighteen of the forty-three cases are from the United States. The best known in the witch-hunt narrative are all there: Kern County, California; the McMartin Preschool; Kelly Michaels; Country Walk; Edenton, North Carolina; and Amirault. The site explains that because "It seemed obvious to us that grave injustices had been done," the author, Bruce Robinson, eschewed the position that motivates the rest of the site: reporting both or all sides of each issue to "let our readers make up their mind."[36] Harvard psychology professor Daniel Schacter relied on this site in his academic book about memory. So did history professor Philip Jenkins in his Yale University Press book Moral Panic: Changing Conceptions of the Child Molester in Modern America.[37]

The witch-hunt narrative is now the conventional wisdom about these cases. That view is so widely endorsed and firmly entrenched that there would seem to be nothing left to say about these cases. But a close examination of the witch-hunt canon leads to some unsettling questions: Why is there so little in the way of academic scholarship about these cases? Almost all of the major witch-hunt writings have been in magazines, often without any footnotes to verify or assess the claims made. Why hasn't anyone writing about these cases said anything about how difficult they are to research? There are so many roadblocks and limitations to researching these cases that it would seem incumbent on any serious writer to address the limitations of data sources. Many of these cases seem to have been researched in a manner of days or weeks. Nevertheless, the cases are described in a definitive way that belies their length and complexity, along with the inherent difficulty in researching original trial court documents.

An Overview of the Book

This book is based on the first systematic examination of court records in these cases. The book argues that even though many cases have been held up as classic examples of modern American "witch hunts," none of them truly fits that description. McMartin certainly comes close. But a careful examination of the evidence presented at trial demonstrates why, in my view, a reasonable juror could vote for conviction, as many did in this case. Other cases that have been painted as witch-hunts turn out to involve significant, even overwhelming, evidence of guilt. There are a few cases to the contrary, but even those are more complicated than the witch-hunt narrative allows. In short, there was not, by any reasonable measure, an epidemic of "witch hunts" in the 1980s. There were big mistakes made in how some cases were handled, particularly in the earliest years. But even in those years there were cases such as those of Frank Fuster and Kelly Michaels that, I believe, were based on substantial evidence but later unfairly maligned as having no evidentiary support.

The argument of the book begins with the McMartin case, the subject of Chapter Two. This is the foundational case in the witch-hunt narrative. Whether or not the narrative applies to other cases, it appears to offer the definitive account of the McMartin case, which ended without a single conviction after once being described as the largest child abuse case in history. The only competing account is a narrative about ritual abuse that was created near the beginning of the case, an account so thoroughly discredited that the witch-hunt narrative became all the more credible. Chapter Two argues that there is a third way to see the case—as it evolved, in stages. By this account, the case began with credible evidence of sexual abuse. Significant evidence was developed in the earliest stages of the case, before it was even referred to the agency that ultimately did hundreds of interviews later blamed for ruining the case. The McMartin case became six parts of overreaction to one part reality, sweeping up six women in criminal charges that never should have been brought. But the strongest evidence—the evidence that started the case—has been lost to history. Recognizing this evidence challenges the witch-hunt narrative in several ways. The McMartin case nevertheless stands largely as a monument to injustice to five, possibly six, of the seven defendants. The uncertainty about whether it is five or six reflects the kind of complexity that is not captured by the witch-hunt narrative. Chapter Two portrays that complexity.

The basic claim of the witch-hunt narrative is that there were at least a hundred, maybe several hundred, cases "just like McMartin." The narrative is a claim about a social phenomenon that swept the country during the McMartin era. The claim has been widely accepted as fact. The best evidence consists of studies of a handful of cases, along with lists of additional case names without any elaboration about the facts. Those sources, even taken at face value, do not add up to one hundred cases. More surprisingly, a substantial number of the cases held up as "witch hunts" actually included credible evidence of abuse, or even something stronger than that. But that is only apparent after doing extensive original research on a substantial number of cases. Chapter Three scrutinizes the claim that there were hundreds of these cases across the country.

The witch-hunt narrative began an account of child sexual abuse over the span of eight or nine years, starting in the early 1980s. It is offered as the sole account of sexual abuse in day-care centers then. There is scant recognition that there were true cases of sexual abuse in day-care centers during the time period—and before, for that matter. The witch-hunt narrative is also a story of overreaction; it often employs such terms as "hysteria" and "panic" to describe the social reactions surrounding these cases. Since child sexual abuse came to be identified with this narrative, there was a sense that our social reactions to the problem were largely panic-ridden. But this account overlooks the social forces that existed before child sexual abuse "emerged" into public discourse. Those phenomena, including silence and denial, continued during the McMartin era. This is part of the unacknowledged history of child sexual abuse, which is the subject of Chapter Four.

Chapters Five and Six take up two other foundational cases in the witch-hunt narrative. They provide an arc from the McMartin case. Seen in this light, the Kelly Michaels case in New Jersey is the turning point. It marked a major shift in the press, in academia, and in the courts. It was the most prominent reversal of a conviction from the 1980s. The shift was precipitated in part by dramatic change in the position among academic psychologists about the issue of child suggestibility. It was also precipitated by the rise of the witch-hunt narrative in the popular media that began immediately after the demise of the McMartin case. Chapter Five is a systematic analysis of the case. It argues that there was substantial credible evidence of abuse that has been almost entirely ignored, and that there are significant exaggerations and other errors in the widely accepted view of this case.

Chapter Six takes up the Fuster case from Dade County, Florida, also known as Country Walk, after the name of the babysitting service that fostered the complaints in this case. The Fuster case plays a prominent role in Ceci and Bruck's Jeopardy in the Courtroom, second only to the Michaels case. The acclaimed television program Frontline applied the witch-hunt lens to the Fuster case in two separate episodes. The case is considered by many to be one of the last convictions still standing from the misguided era of the 1980s. Chapter Six takes the opposite view, arguing that there was extremely strong evidence to support this conviction. Indeed, it takes a special kind of bias to minimize or ignore all of the evidence.

Chapter Seven considers how the rise of the witch-hunt narrative has affected how we view child sexual abuse and children as witnesses. It begins with a consideration of two important developments since the end of the McMartin era, the successful civil and criminal cases against Catholic Church priests over child sexual abuse and the increase in punitive policies aimed at convicted sex offenders. The chapter concludes with an examination of how child-suggestibility claims have evolved since the Michaels case. Although it has become impolitic to ask whether children are being unduly discredited in court, there are several reasons to think they are. The arguments about child suggestibility have evolved into a much more expansive effort to label children as tainted even in cases with strong corroborative evidence. There has also been an effort to discredit disclosures simply because they were "delayed." That worrisome development appears to be part of a larger movement to dismiss the expertise and knowledge of child-abuse professionals.

The McMartin Preschool Case (1983–1990)

The McMartin Preschool trial is often described as the longest and most expensive criminal trial in American history. There are no official record books for trial costs or trial length, but the McMartin case was a massive criminal trial by any standard. From initial arrest to final disposition of all charges, the case took more than seven years. There was an eighteen-month-long preliminary hearing, and the trial itself lasted more than two years. The case received enormous media attention and became the subject of several books and a made-for-TV movie.[1] It is featured on the Famous Trials website of law professor Douglas Linder and the Crime Library website originally created by CourtTV. In its early stages, the McMartin Preschool case was described as "the largest child molestation case" on record—with multiple perpetrators and hundreds of likely victims. After the case ended without any convictions, it became widely viewed as a witch-hunt.

The case began in August 1983 when a mother named Judy Johnson contacted her son's pediatrician because she thought that the boy, Matthew,[2] had been anally penetrated by "Mr. Ray" at the McMartin Preschool. The name "Mr. Ray" came from her son; Mrs. Johnson did not know Raymond Buckey. Her son had been attending the preschool since June. The investigation that followed eventually included videotaped interviews with hundreds of children who had attended the preschool in the previous decade. Those interviews were conducted almost entirely by a nonprofit agency called Children's Institute International (CII). See Figure 2.1 for an overall case timeline.

On February 2, 1984, a local television station broadcast a detailed story about allegations that were emerging from the supposedly confidential interviews at CII. Although the investigation had been going on for months, there had been no stories in the media. The story immediately became national news even though nobody had yet been indicted and the Grand Jury had not been convened. The interviewers at CII had apparently come to believe that most of the children they had interviewed between November 1983 and January 1984 had been sexually abused by various teachers at the preschool in Manhattan Beach, California. The "exclusive" story on KABC-TV reported that sixty children had already been identified as victims. The CII interviews became the primary basis for the criminal charges in the case. They later became the primary focus of the defense.

The case was taken to the grand jury in March 1984. The grand jury indicted seven defendants for sex crimes against children. The primary defendant was Raymond Buckey, the only male who worked at the preschool. Three other members of his family, who also worked at the preschool, were also indicted: his sister, Peggy Ann Buckey; his mother, Peggy Buckey; and his grandmother, Virginia McMartin. Three other teachers at the preschool were also indicted: Betty Raidor, Babette Spitler, and Mary Ann Jackson. Charges would eventually be dropped against five of the seven defendants, with only Ray and Peggy Buckey going to trial. But in 1985, when the case had seven defendants, it was widely held that there were many more defendants yet to be identified. The county sheriff's McMartin Task Force was formed to investigate the case further. At one point, there were more than fifty additional suspects in the case and allegations that children had been taken to a host of locations beyond the preschool. But no further charges were ever brought.

At its height, there were forty-one actual complainants in the McMartin case. Fourteen of those children later participated in the preliminary hearing.[3] The rest of the complainants dropped out of the case for various reasons: some parents decided to pull their children from the increasingly long and highly publicized ordeal, and the DA made the decision to drop other complainants The preliminary hearing lasted eighteen months—far longer than almost all criminal trials in the country. At the conclusion of the hearing, Municipal Court Judge Aviva Bobb ruled there was sufficient evidence to hold all seven of the defendants over for trial. The evidentiary standard required to reach that judgment was low, and the preliminary hearing exposed serious problems with the prosecution's case.

Ira Reiner, the Los Angeles district attorney who inherited the McMartin case when he defeated Robert Philibosian in June 1984, criticized the way in which the case had been investigated and charged. Shortly after Judge Bobb's decision to hold all seven defendants over for trial, Reiner dropped all charges against five of them, famously describing the evidence against them as "incredibly weak." Only Ray Buckey and his mother, Peggy Buckey, would actually go to trial. The case would involve eleven children.

The trial was preceded by a significant sideshow involving a series of tape-recorded interviews between Glenn Stevens, a disaffected prosecutor who quit his job over the case, and Abby Mann, a screenwriter who was developing movie and book ideas that cast the entire case as a witch-hunt. Stevens was one of the three assistant DAs who were assigned the McMartin case during its most critical stages in the spring of 1984. He left the DA's office in January 1986 after coming to the conclusion that most, but not all, of the defendants in the case were innocent. Stevens entered into an agreement to help Abby and Myra Mann (his wife) write a movie script about the case. Some of the material that he provided to them, including comments made during the tape-recorded conversations, eventually became the focus of a lengthy pre-trial hearing over a motion to dismiss the case. That hearing occasioned a rare window into what Stevens actually said about the evidence in office memoranda written in late 1985 and early 1986. Contrary to how events were later portrayed in the movie Indictment, Stevens wrote that he found the evidence against Ray Buckey to be quite strong.[4] But he also concluded that the children's statements about all of the other defendants, including Peggy Buckey, were unconvincing. Charges against five of the female defendants were dropped long before this hearing, but the case went ahead against Ray Buckey and Peggy Buckey. The motion to dismiss charges against them, based on tape-recorded conversations between Stevens and the Manns, was rejected, and Ray Buckey and his mother were then tried for child molestation.

The trial lasted almost two years, and it ended inconclusively. The defendants were found "not guilty" on most charges, while others, almost entirely against Ray, resulted in a hung jury. (The jury also could not reach a verdict on a conspiracy charge against Peggy, but the judge dismissed that charge.) The unresolved charges against Ray involved three girls. Those charges were retried in an abbreviated trial that began in April 1990 and lasted less than three months. It ended with a hung jury on all counts. A mistrial was then declared and all remaining charges against Ray Buckey were dismissed, rendering the case a colossal failure by any measure.

The case was filled with strange twists. The lead defense attorney, Danny Davis, became a witness in the case. The defense filed a motion to disqualify the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office. Both sides in the case were sanctioned over various behaviors. Most dramatically, several key actors in the case died an untimely death: Judy Johnson, mother of the initial child in the case, apparently died from alcoholism, and two others with connections to the case took their own lives.[5] An unsolved 1976 murder case was even linked to the McMartin case at one point.[6]

Several of the McMartin defendants sought unsuccessfully to sue the prosecutors and CII, the organization that interviewed the children in the case, for monetary damages. A case against Los Angeles County was dismissed because of sovereign immunity rules that protect government entities against various kinds of lawsuits.[7] One teacher also tried, without success, to sue CII for defamation. Relying on theories of sovereign immunity, the superior court dismissed the action on its face, and that result was upheld on appeal.[8] Virginia McMartin, Peggy Buckey, and Peggy Ann Buckey prevailed in a postverdict libel suit against Robert Currie, a parent who made accusations against all three women on various television programs that were aired immediately after the verdicts were announced.[9] Note that charges had long since been dropped against two of these women, and the jury did not return any convictions against Peggy Buckey. Nevertheless, reflecting the deep contradictions surrounding the case, the plaintiffs were awarded one dollar in damages.[10]

The Evolution of the Witch-Hunt Narrative

In 1984, when the case emerged in the media, the coverage was decidedly pro-prosecution. The following year, when the preliminary hearing began, serious criticisms of the case started to emerge in the press. Years later, when the trial was finally winding down, journalists paid homage to the complexity and the confusion of the case. Writing for the American Lawyer magazine, Robert Safian authored "McMartin Madness: Ten Days in the Life of the Longest, Most Gruesomely Difficult Criminal Trial Ever." He concluded:

> There are too many inconsistencies in the prosecution's case not to provoke lingering doubts. Yet there is too much conviction and horror in the children's stories of abuse not to look askance at Ray Buckey.[11]

Similarly, after months of observation, Cynthia Gorney wrote a two-part story for the Washington Post entitled "The Terrible Puzzle of McMartin Preschool." Spinning a number of alternative views of the case, each with its own plausibility, she suggested:

> . . . that some children were molested in Manhattan Beach . . . and that the disclosing and spreading of those children's reports took place in an atmosphere of such uncontainable and self-feeding alarm that both children and adults lost the capacity to sort the imagined from the real. . . .[12]

That sense of complexity was reflected on the editorial page of the Los Angeles Times the day after the original verdicts. There were op-eds with several takes on the outcome of the case. The most popular view was that the DA's office had blown the case. Another view was, "We all wanted the truth but must settle for justice." That point of view was from a legal commentator who thought "the system" worked well.[13] Finally, psychologist and writer Carol Tavris weighed in with an editorial about child suggestibility and the credibility of children as witnesses. She argued, "Our best hope in sorting out these conflicting claims [about children as witnesses] is to try to set aside our prejudices and assess the research evidence for each side." She wrote favorably about research by psychology professor Gail Goodman supporting the view that "very young children do not volunteer information that they feel is embarrassing or shameful" and that they "do not agree with leading questions that are wrong." She ended the column by framing the challenge for the future as being sure that "legitimate concerns about falsely accusing an innocent adult do not cause us to falsely disbelieve an innocent child."

But the sense of complexity and confusion that permeated the end of the case did not linger, even with the inconclusive end to the first and second trials. The day after the verdicts were announced, the Los Angeles Times media critic, David Shaw, published the first part in a blistering critique that, ironically, won the Times a Pulitzer Prize for criticizing its own coverage. "Where Was Skepticism in the Media?" cried out the first headline. The next day it was "Reporter's Early Exclusives Triggered a Media Frenzy." By the end of the four-part series, Shaw had praised the writers who first adopted the witch-hunt narrative and skewered those who did not.

Positions hardened soon thereafter. "The only evidence against the Buckeys was the children's statements" and they were discredited, Douglas Besharov explained in the National Review a month later in February 1990.[14] A few months after that, Dorothy Rabinowitz published an article in Harper's about the Kelly Michaels case. She referred to the McMartin case as a modern-day Salem. In June 1990, Debbie Nathan sketched the larger witch-hunt narrative in the Village Voice with "What McMartin Started: The Ritual Abuse Hoax."[15]

Nathan's argument gained wider acceptance and eventually became the conventional wisdom. It became as unpopular in the 1990s to be associated with the children's side of the McMartin case as it was to be associated with the defendants in the mid-1980s. Tavris has, in her own words, been "atoning" for her column written the day after the McMartin verdicts expressing concern that children's testimony not be unduly discredited as a result of the case.[16] Writing in Redbook in 1992, she warned of the new "witch hunts" against child sexual abuse. "Beware the Incest Survivor Machine," she intoned the following year in the New York Times Book Review, arguing that a nefarious network of therapists profited from the child sexual-abuse "industry."[17] In 1997, she explained in an interview how guilty she felt about her 1990 article endorsing psychology professor Gail Goodman's academic research.[18]

Two prominent academic psychologists, Stephen Ceci from Cornell University and Maggie Bruck from Johns Hopkins University, reached very different conclusions from Goodman's about children as witnesses. Goodman's message was essentially positive: children are better witnesses than many people think. Ceci and Bruck's message was much more cautionary: children are highly suggestible. They published an important article about children's testimony in 1993 and a major book in 1995, called Jeopardy in the Courtroom: A Scientific Analysis of Children's Testimony. In both of these works, they adopted the view that the McMartin case was a modern-day witch-hunt and drew specific analogies to the Salem Witch Trials.[19] Nathan and Snedeker's book Satan's Silence was also published in 1995. It has a chapter on the McMartin case that fits the book's subtitle: The Making of a Modern American Witch-Hunt. The third major treatment of the McMartin case in 1995 undoubtedly reached the largest audience—that is, the HBO movie Indictment, written by Abby Mann and produced by Oliver Stone. The movie won an Emmy, and reviewers such as Ellen Willis of the Village Voice argued that the movie's power "is enhanced by its meticulous fidelity to the facts."[20] "It's rare these days to find, on TV or the larger screen, a work in which fury is a clarifying force," wrote Rabinowitz, who credited the movie with being "a factual account, taken from the record."[21] The complexity and uncertainty that were so prevalent when the case ended were entirely gone. The movie "leaves no doubt," Rabinowitz noted with approval, that the case had no factual basis. In sum, in the years since the McMartin case ended the popular narrative that has risen to prominence is that the case lacked any factual basis. Instead, it has become the foundational case in the witch-hunt narrative. This narrative is applied so completely to the McMartin case that it may be difficult to imagine there is anything left to say about it. The McMartin case has, quite simply, come to be seen as baseless. Under this view, all of the child molestation charges were "trumped up"; they were a "hoax."

Although the view is widely promoted and accepted, it is contradicted by court transcripts and various other records in the case. Extensive original research reveals that there was considerable evidence against Ray Buckey, and there was also credible evidence to suggest his mother was aware of the situation and helped cover it up. This chapter elaborates the evidence in detail. Five arguments are advanced and documented. First, the evidence involving Judy Johnson's son (the first child in the case) is more compelling than typically portrayed. Second, the early investigation—before CII started interviewing children—uncovered significant evidence of abuse. Third, there were compelling circumstances involving two families who initially supported the defendants and then switched sides. Fourth, the medical evidence, although mixed in quality, was stronger than often portrayed. Fifth, there was considerable evidence that counters the witch-hunt narrative about Ray Buckey's character and about whether he had the opportunity to molest children at the preschool. Taken together, these arguments help explain why seven jurors said in a post-verdict press conference that they thought children in the case had been abused.

Case Origins: Judy Johnson and Her Son

The McMartin case began in August 1983, when Judy Johnson first suspected that her son, Matthew, had been sodomized at the McMartin Preschool. The evidence supporting her suspicion is largely medical since Matthew was three years old and not very communicative. He apparently told his mother, on August 11, 1983, something about "Mr. Ray" playing with a thermometer. This was in a conversation that began after Matthew's mother noticed some blood on his anus. The boy was examined in short succession by three doctors, first a family physician, then an emergency room doctor, and ultimately a pediatrician with child-abuse experience.

This evidence is ignored in the witch-hunt narrative, which places the focus entirely on Matthew's mother, Judy. Under this view, she was delusional when she made the original complaint about her son, so there is no reason to consider what the doctors who examined the boy actually observed. This story seems plausible because she died of alcohol-related causes in December 1986, and before her demise she lived in a paranoid, reclusive manner. But whether those ills came about during the case or actually predated the original complaint is an important question that has not received serious consideration in the witch-hunt narrative. What is taken as an article of faith—that Judy Johnson was delusional from day one—is flatly contradicted by all of the available evidence.

The evidence concerning Matthew Johnson consisted of more than statements conveyed by his mother. There was medical evidence from several doctors, though virtually all of the medical evidence in the McMartin case would later be dismissed as baseless in the witch-hunt narrative. But that stark position was not even endorsed by Dr. David Paul, the expert the defense brought from London to counter the medical evidence in the case.

The McMartin case began with a mother's concern about something very tangible: her son's bleeding anus. This is why Judy Johnson contacted Dr. Richard Segal, Matthew's pediatrician at Kaiser Permanente on August 12, 1983. She reported that Matthew had complained of "rectal discomfort" several times that summer and that she had observed his anus to have "significant redness and occasionally some bleeding." Mrs. Johnson had discussed the matter with Dr. Segal earlier in the summer. That is particularly notable since she would later be characterized as so intent on finding sexual abuse that she had been looking for signs of it all summer.[22] In fact, she did not raise the idea in her discussions with Dr. Segal earlier in the summer. Instead, they discussed the possibility of pinworms.[23] It was only after observing blood again, and then being told by her son something about "having his temperature taken" at school, that Johnson expressed strong suspicions about sexual abuse. Dr. Segal suggested she bring her son to the emergency room.

Dr. Scott McGeary examined Matthew that evening and observed a "band of redness" that "encircled his anus." He described the area as "red and roughened" and concluded that there "appeared to be some friction like trauma to the rectal area."[24] As he later testified, Dr. McGeary "was concerned that there was possible sodomization or at least passage of some object into the child's rectum."[25] The doctor was not a child abuse specialist, so he arranged to have Matthew seen at UCLA. Debbie Nathan, one of the most prominent proponents of the witch-hunt narrative, has suggested that Judy Johnson was unreasonable for taking her son to a special clinic "instead of abandoning her complaint."[26] But Dr. McGeary did not advise abandoning the complaint; quite the contrary, he expressed concern about sexual abuse and referred Johnson to a specialist.

Matthew Johnson was examined at the Marion Davies Children's Clinic at UCLA on August 17. Nathan and Snedeker dismissed the findings from this exam with the claim that "the young intern who examined [the boy] was completely inexperienced at doing sexual-abuse exams."[27] But the "young intern"—actually a resident pediatrician, Dr. Linda Gordon—did not conduct the examination alone. She was joined by the attending physician, Dr. Jean H. Simpson-Savary, a pediatrician who graduated from one of the top medical schools in the country (Johns Hopkins) and had almost five years of experience in pediatrics. Dr. Simpson-Savary described discolored bruising patterns and concluded that the injury was recent, "within the last week, but not recent in sense of hours."[28] She notified the Manhattan Beach Police Department (MBPD) that "the victim's anus was forcibly entered several days ago."[29] Even the doctor hired by the defense years later to challenge the medical evidence in the case agreed that these were "fairly significant findings" of sexual abuse.[30] The significance of those findings might be diminished with more recent knowledge about "normal" anal and genital exams; it depends on precisely what Dr. Simpson saw.[31] Unfortunately, there are no photographs to provide for an independent examination. Nevertheless, the constellation of evidence described on August 12, 1983, would still support a report for suspected child abuse today.

Those facts have not prevented Judy Johnson from becoming the primary scapegoat for the entire McMartin case. Her name is in the title of Nathan and Snedeker's twenty-five-page chapter about the case—the most detailed and documented critique of the case ever published. They claim Judy Johnson had "obvious" mental problems and that her "delusionary statements" launched the case.[32] Abby Mann, who wrote the screenplay for Indictment, framed his view of the case around Johnson's "suspect personality."[33] Ellen Willis asserted that the case was "launched by a schizophrenic alcoholic's complaint."[34] But Judy Johnson was never as important to the case as has been claimed; moreover, the chronology of her mental health issues has been inaccurately represented.

Johnson is an obvious candidate for scapegoat given the cause of her death in December 1986 and the nature of her behavior before that. In the summer of 1986, she thought the whole world was out to get her. The McMartin case had been a national news story for well over two years by that point. Johnson asked the DA's office to place her in protective custody because of threats she claimed were verified on her telephone-answering machine. The DA investigator who looked into the matter noted simply, "I made determination her fears were groundless."[35] So there is little question that Johnson's grip on reality was weak in 1986. However, this does not answer the question of whether her mental instability came after the McMartin case emerged and evolved or whether it actually fashioned the case. That question became the focus of media stories, particularly after her death.

Reporting on the life and death of Judy Johnson in a long story titled "Driven to Her Death," the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner indicated that in the first half of 1983 she "was strong and healthy" and that she "jogged constantly, ate health food and reportedly was so averse to alcohol that she brought sparkling apple juice to neighborhood parties. . . ."[36] There is no evidence in the record of the McMartin case that Johnson was mentally unstable when she took her son to the emergency room on August 12, 1983. Indeed, the notes from when prosecutor Stevens first met Judy Johnson confirm she did not present the obvious mental instability that later consumed her. "I found her pleasant and very lucid," Stevens noted at the time.[37] Stevens eventually criticized most aspects of the state's case but not Johnson's mental health in August 1983 or her son's medically confirmed injuries.

After leaving the DA's office in January 1986 over doubts about the guilt of most of the defendants, Stevens told screenwriter Abby Mann that the McMartin case pushed Johnson over the edge; the case did not originate in the mind of a mentally ill woman. The transcripts of their conversations over several months demonstrate that the Manns had formed a view of Johnson that went against what Stevens told them on the subject. In one conversation, Stevens pushed Mann to explain why he kept coming back to Johnson. Mann's answer: because she had "a suspect personality." Stevens did not agree; nor did he waiver, in these conversations, in the view that nothing in Johnson's life tainted the origins of the case in August 1983. Stevens even told Mann that Johnson's performance at the preliminary hearing in July 1984 was "Great. She was terrific."[38] Stevens's observation runs so contrary to the witch-hunt narrative that the Manns pointedly asked him at a later date whether there was "anything unusual in her testimony." "No. She did a very good job," Stevens reaffirmed.[39] But that is not how Johnson was portrayed in the movie, or in the witch-hunt narrative at large, where she is routinely described as mentally ill from the start.

There is no doubt that Johnson started drinking after the McMartin case began. She became reclusive and paranoid. There is also no doubt that a case like McMartin could potentially break a person. Paul Bynum, a former MBPD officer who was working as an investigator for the defense in the McMartin case, committed suicide the day before he was supposed to testify in the McMartin case. There were reports of secondary trauma among hardened reporters who covered the case. "The case poisoned anyone who had any contact with it," Judge Pounders, who presided over the first trial, said at one point.[40] Peggy Buckey became paranoid, apparently as a result of the case, and was eventually afraid to leave her house. But none of those effects should be confused with the actual origins of the case. The claim that the McMartin case was started by the delusions of a crazy woman is simply not in line with the facts. Instead, several doctors agreed that Matthew Johnson had apparently been sodomized—recently.

The Early Investigation (Pre-CII)

Judy Johnson's report and the related medical evidence prompted the Manhattan Beach Police Department to take the matter seriously. Ray Buckey was arrested on September 7, 1983. He was released the same day, however, because Matthew had not made any direct statements to the police and he was clearly too young to testify. The medical evidence alone was insufficient to sustain charges. It is not clear whether the police knew this when they arrested Ray Buckey; this was one of the first sexual abuse cases the department had ever faced involving preschool children. Perhaps they arrested Buckey in the hopes he might make an incriminating statement, or maybe they just did not realize that prosecutors could not carry charges forward on the basis of the medical evidence alone.

Whatever the explanation, the police chief, apparently frustrated by the inability to move forward, sent a letter the next day to all of the parents whose names appeared in enrollment records from the preschool. That letter was to become the subject of intense criticism because it named Ray Buckey, described some of the allegations conveyed by Johnson, and requested that parents question their children.[41] The letter was not the first indication to the community that police were investigating the matter, however; a number of families were contacted in late August. Although those families were apparently told not to discuss the matter with anyone, it was later established that Virginia McMartin learned about the investigation before her grandson was arrested.[42]

Precisely how the investigation played out in the immediate aftermath of the now-infamous letter is critical to assessing the evidence in the McMartin case. Most accounts of the McMartin case collapse the time period between when the letter was sent and the first media coverage five months later.[43] There is no question that the dynamics of the investigation changed dramatically with the advent of intense media coverage in February 1984. What is surprising is how little attention has been paid to developments immediately following the September 1983 letter.

The witch-hunt narrative maintains that the letter resulted in no significant disclosures. "Not one child disclosed anything suspicious," according to one account.[44] Mary Fischer put it more starkly in a magazine article still heralded for "debunking" the McMartin case: "What's not commonly known is that with the exception of one child, all of the former preschoolers denied being molested at the school until after they were interviewed at CII."[45] This claim has grown into the widely repeated assertion that the entire McMartin case was "created" months later at CII, where children were first interviewed beginning on November 1.[46] But the initial responses to the September letter were much more significant than is ever acknowledged in the witch-hunt narrative.

A five-page log maintained by the MBPD recorded the telephone responses they received to the letter with short notations of the date and substance of the response. At least eight families are listed as furnishing "positive" responses, usually with an annotation referring to the relevant section of the California Penal Code for child molestation (i.e., "288 PC victim," or "positive 288."). The most specific notation says: "288 victim, touched penis." The remaining "positive" responses are otherwise unelaborated on the log. Several other responses are listed as "possible." A few of those contain a phrase or two of elaboration. The most detailed entry states: "strange behavior—pulls down pants and fondles self. Kisses father in a way not like three-year-old." A few other notations, not labeled as "possible" or "positive," were nevertheless suspicious enough to warrant further investigation. The entry for the Delco family, for example, states, "older daughter says [Ray Buckey] wore no underwear, saw genitals."[47]

There are police reports and, in some cases, other documents for almost all of the families who were recorded as "positive" or "possible" responders in September (see Figure 2.2). Only four of those children became complainants in the criminal case. A fifth September responder was included on the prosecution's witness list in February, but she did not become a complainant in the case. A few other children, who were first identified in September 1983, were listed as likely complainants, when an investigator for the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office started considering specific charges. Those children did not became part of the formal case, but what they said in September and October 1983 merits attention because any disclosures made during that time directly contradict the notion of the case being "created" at CII months later. Statements made during this time cannot be attributed to media frenzy either, since it would be months until there was any media coverage. Here is a synopsis of the five children who provided significant responses to the MBPD in September 1983 and later became part of the criminal case.

Positive and possible responses as designated by MBPD log and information forms

Tanya Mergili

The first family to provide a "positive" report called the MBPD on Friday, September 9. The MBPD was short-staffed that day because it was a state holiday, California's Admission Day. The Mergilis were told to bring their daughter Tanya in for questioning on Monday, September 12.

The Mergilis were unaware of the investigation that a handful of families learned about in August. Mrs. Mergili learned about the MBPD letter on Friday, September 9, because her daughter was playing with another child from McMartin whose mother received the letter that day. (The Mergilis received their letter the next day.) Mrs. Mergili asked her daughter about the matter, and police notes indicate that Tanya "willingly responded with details of her abuse." The police report indicates that Tanya "mentioned being tied up by Ray Buckey, shut in closets, and playing something called the horsey game."[48] The report also contains the mother's statement that "her daughter related that Raymond Buckey had tickled her in the area of her vagina beneath her clothing."[49]

Tanya Mergili was scheduled to begin a new term at the McMartin Preschool on Monday, September 12. Instead, her parents brought her to the Manhattan Beach Police Department that day. Not surprisingly, the Mergilis decided their daughter would not return to the preschool.[50] Tanya was evaluated at UCLA Medical Center a week later by Dr. Mary Wilson. The interview was videotaped, and the tape received considerable attention in the pre-trial phase of the McMartin case because Tanya was the first child to support the claims made by Matthew Johnson. There are two separate transcriptions of the videotape, one stipulated to by both parties and one prepared specifically by the defense.[51] These documents demonstrate the severe limitations of capturing interactions with a young child in a written transcript. By extension, they also demonstrate the difficulties in interviewing children of this age.

The thirty-page transcript that was agreed to by both sides contains a considerable amount of preliminaries—playing and talking about nothing in particular for the child to become more comfortable with the setting and the interviewer. The first significant passage for the criminal case appears on page 15. That passage, which consumes about half a page, appears to represent several minutes of interaction between Dr. Wilson and the child. But the transcribed statements are all attributed to Dr. Wilson. It is clear from the doctor's words that Tanya was providing relevant demonstrative responses, but those actions are not described in the transcription.[52]

> So why don't you show—why don't you show me how—how—how Ray played with you, okay, Tanya, because I really need to talk to you about that.
> Is that what he would do?
> Huh?
> Show me again.
> Well, let's pull the dress up so I can really see.
> What would he do?[53]

The paragraph breaks contained in this passage suggest there were various pauses. It is not clear, however, what the child was actually demonstrating during this time. Two handwritten annotations, likely made later by Dr. Wilson, add important details that could be verified only by examining the videotape.

> So why don't you show—why don't you show me how—how—how Ray played with you, okay, Tanya, because I really need to talk to you about that. [Handwritten note: Tanya demonstrating on dolls—hand under dress and rubbing.]
> Is that what he would do?
> Huh?
> Show me again.
> Well, let's pull the dress up so I can really see.
> What would he do? [Handwritten note: Tanya's hand rubbing.][54]

A similar interaction occurs a few pages later. The transcription suggests that the child offered further evidence of sexual abuse, although again the specifics remain unclear.

> Why don't you show me with the other doll what he would do.
> Can you show me with the other doll?
> I can help you.
> Oh, that's what he would do. Okay.
>
> And would he do anything else?
> He'd go like that, huh?[55]

The handwritten notations on this document indicate that the videotape contains important behavioral evidence. In the first sentence above, the notation "hand in pants" was placed above the phrase "what he would do." Moreover, the notation " + rub" was written below the phrase "anything else" in the next to last sentence in the passage above.

There is no doubt how Dr. Wilson at UCLA viewed the substance of the examination. According to the medical report that she wrote: "Tanya described Ray touching penis to rectum, vagina, mouth. Also masturbating himself and touching her."[56] Since the Mergilis were the earliest to respond to the police department, Tanya was clearly one of the most important children in the investigation.

The interviews at CII did not begin, however, until almost six weeks after Tanya's interview with Dr. Wilson. By that time, Mrs. Mergili described recent and extremely sexualized behavior by her daughter. One of the behaviors described by one of the parents: "Bending over, spreading her cheeks and saying 'is my hole cute?' Ray-Ray used to like me to do this."[57]

Sara Barton

The second important child from the earliest stages of the case is Sara Barton, who attended the McMartin Preschool from September 1981 until August 11, 1983. She was in Ray Buckey's class in 1982 and she occasionally stayed in the afternoon through 1983, when he was often the only adult at the facility. Sara was recorded as a "positive" response by the MBPD on September 13, 1983. Her parents responded to the MBPD letter by saying their daughter told them she "had seen Ray Buckey's penis and touched same." Mrs. Barton, who would later be criticized as having a "fanatical belief that enveloped their children and demanded their participation,"[58] informed the police that she felt a formal interview was not warranted. Even though she was positive there had been some kind of sexual contact between Ray Buckey and her daughter, she was "concerned about stressing her daughter."

Gloria Barton testified to the grand jury in March 1984 that her daughter had vaginitis in the spring of 1983.[59] She applied over-the-counter medications on Sara repeatedly during that time; they gave relief but then the redness and discomfort would return. Barton testified that the problem continued until Sara started at her new kindergarten in September 1983. During the spring of 1983, Sara also asked her parents to apply medication to her anus. She was apparently unresponsive when asked why she would need medicine on her anus. Her mother testified that Sara replied in the negative when asked if she was constipated. Her parents acceded to applying ointment every time and otherwise let these incidents pass.

In October 1983, Gloria Barton wrote in her diary that she had casually raised questions about Ray Buckey or the McMartin Preschool a few times and that Sara "did not want to talk about him at all."[60] Her mother's conclusion: "We felt we should respect her feelings and dropped the matter." This is apparently how the situation remained until a parent's meeting in mid-November 1983. Leaving the discussion of developments after that date until later, we see clearly that the earliest responses from this child provided relevant evidence for the investigation. The significance of the evidence is unclear, and her parents, though concerned, certainly did not overreact at the time. All of those facts are omitted entirely from Nathan and Snedeker's detailed critique of this child, which relies entirely on later events to discredit the child. Gloria Barton became an outspoken, activist parent who saw a widespread conspiracy behind the McMartin case. Her daughter was listed on some early documents in the case, but she was never one of the named complainants in the case.

Sally Gregg

A third important child who was identified early in the investigation was Sally Gregg, who attended the McMartin Preschool from September 1981 until June 1983. She stayed from 9:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. "many days," and Ray Buckey was regularly the only adult in charge of children who stayed after noon. Sally was recorded as a "possible" victim on the MBPD original log on the case. Her parents wrote on the information form they mailed back to the police:

> We are leaving town on 9/14/83 + will not return till 9/22/83. In a preliminary discussion with Sally, she said 'Ray Ray does not wear underpants.' Sally has been overly interested in touching my genital area. This could well be a result of this case. We would like more time to talk to Sally without a heavy cross-examination.[61]

There is no indication in surviving records that the Greggs brought their child into the police station in the weeks after returning to Manhattan Beach. The MBPD eventually wrote a police report about Sally on January 24, 1984. The earliest date detailed in the report is November 28, when Kathy Wilcox, whose child had attended the McMartin Preschool, reported to the police that her daughter said "that Ray would take girls into the bathroom at school and put his finger in their vagina."[62] Karen Wilcox apparently mentioned Sally Gregg, and it appears that the interaction prompted the Greggs to contact CII and schedule an interview.

Sally Gregg was interviewed at CII on January 16, 1984; she was interviewed again at the MBPD on January 24. She became the third of the September responders to become a formal complainant in the criminal trial. She was also one of only nine children who eventually testified at the trial in this case, and one of only three children who participated in the retrial.

Mary Gordon

The fourth response from September 1983 that involved a child who later became a complainant in the criminal case was from the Gordon family, whose five-year-old daughter Mary had attended the McMartin Preschool from 1981 through May 1983. The family's attorney, Robert Hamrick, contacted the MBPD on September 23. He reported that, in response to the MBPD letter, Mrs. Gordon had asked her daughter whether anything bad had happened to her at school. As he reported further, Mary told her mother that Ray Buckey "put his finger down her throat and asked her to pretend that her mouth was a house" and that he put his fingers inside her vagina.[63] Mrs. Gordon later informed MBPD Detective Dye that "upon learning of the finger penetration, she [the mother] didn't pursue further questioning." Mrs. Gregg indicated she "was desirous of avoiding duplication in interviews" and of the emotional impact on the child.[64] The family then went on a trip to England until mid-October.

Mary was interviewed at the MBPD on October 19, a few days after they returned. Her mother advised the reporting officer that Mary was afraid when she came to the station because "she thought she was going to jail." Included in the police report, however, are several incriminating statements Mary apparently made about Ray Buckey: "Mary says the suspect has not fondled her genitals but put his finger inside her pussy." "Mary told [Reporting Officer] further that the suspect called her a bad name, i.e. fucking ass and then spit down her throat."[65] (Mary had been treated with antibiotics in the spring of 1983 for a throat infection.) But the police report also captured the equivocal nature of her statements:

> The victim was very anxious when asked if she had told her mother that Ray had put his fingers here, while pointing to her vaginal area. Mary responded yes, then no, and yes again. Mary then stated that Ray smelled her pussy with his finger and that he put his head down there, referring to her genital area.[66]

Mary was interviewed at CII on November 16; it was one of the earliest of the interviews. In fact, it was the earliest CII interview with a child who became a complainant in the case. There are two accounts of the interview, one prepared by the prosecution and one by the defense. In an account by the defense, the tape is summarized as follows: "This child is wild; she runs around the room, screams and yells her answers, hits Kee [MacFarlane, of CII] and is the most vulgar child I've ever seen."[67] Unlike the defense critique of many other interviews, there is no claim that the child was badgered or coerced, just that she was "vulgar." Why the compelling statements made by Mary Gordon would not appropriately raise concerns about possible abuse is never explained.

Sixteen minutes into the interview, while the child is still drawing, she says, without any prompting, "We're going to talk about him, aren't we?" The transcription of the interview indicates that this is what followed:

I : Yea, why not? Want to draw a picture of Ray Ray or what did you say you want to draw a picture of his dick?
C: This is what his dick is.
I : That's what his dick looks like?
C: No. It's a very long one. Know what it has? See that's him and there is his long dick.
I : Did anything come out of his long dick?
C: Yea.
I : What comes out?
C: Poo.[68]

This exchange has been read in two entirely different ways. Under one view, the child's most spontaneous and detailed answer ("It's a very long one") demonstrates the girl had seen Ray Buckey's penis. Under a competing view, the "poo" answer casts doubt on the credibility of the statements that came before it. When the interviewer pursued the issue, every question about "poo" resulted in an answer about "his butt." A few minutes later, however, in a conversation about pubic hair on some dolls in the interview room, Mary denied that she had seen Ray Buckey naked.

I : Did Ray Ray have fur on his dick?
C: No, I haven't ever seen it.
I : You haven't seen it? I thought you said you saw it?
C: No, I haven't yet but I can draw it.
I : How can you draw it if you haven't seen it?
C: I could just draw it.[69]

Later in the interview, when MacFarlane was using puppets, the transcript becomes harder to follow because the puppets are role-playing. There is also AM radio interference with the audio portion of the videotape at various times. Regardless, this exchange seems to support the idea that Ray Buckey did something inappropriate.

I : What happened? Did anybody ever touch you?
C: No response.
I : You can tell me. [Radio starts up in background]
C: Ray Ray being mean to me.

I: Show us. Has Ray Ray ever taken his clothes off at school?
C: Yes he has and you know what, they're been bad to me (whispers).[70]

This final response is followed by a series of three statements, all screamed into the microphone: "We had been bad ladies and gentlemen!" "He has been mean to this little girl!" "He touched her in the pussy!" Soon thereafter, the child makes the puzzling statement, "I don't want to play with these shiny guys anymore." While it is unclear why she said "shiny guys," it is quite clear that she wants the questioning ended. "You're almost done," MacFarlane says—but the interview was only about half over. Mary becomes more distracted and uncooperative. "Sorry I have to leave now," she announced as the interviewer tried in vain to figure out what Mary meant by a statement about "a Chinese hair up her butt." One more interaction further captures the ambiguity of this session:

I: Anyone ever put a temperature in there?
C: Tell her to be quiet.
I: Why? You can tell me.
C: (Leaves.)
I: Your mom told you had temperature taken at school. Show me.
C: No way.
I: Someone ever take your temperature like that?
C: No.
I: Didn't you tell your mom that?
C: Someone is on the phone.[71]

The toy telephone was one of many distractions available if and when a child wanted to change the subject. Mary Gordon did this frequently during her interview; she was extremely avoidant at times, and her sporadic moments of screaming are unsettling. In the exchange below, which came near the end of the session, it appears as if she answered "no" automatically and then suddenly remembered an actual game. Her subsequent response about being a cowgirl is delivered in a much different tone from the earlier responses. She was enthusiastic and seems to be recalling the game.

I: I was wondering if anybody ever played games with these?
C: What are they, shoe laces?
I: No, using ropes.
C: No, yea.
I: Really?
C: I'll be this cow-girl and Ray [was an Indian and he] caught me and I was in jail.

I: Tied up?

C: No. I was in jail. Watch me jump this time (runs and jumps in bean bag chair). . . .[72]

It is not indicated, however, whether the game was in any way sexualized. Indeed, on the basis of the responses in this interview, there is no reason to conclude that it was.

This interview can be seen, alternatively, as incriminating and ambiguous. The most spontaneous and detailed answers were not about sexualized acts, and some of the statements about the alleged sexual acts were confusing in nature, particularly because of the role reversals that occurred with the puppet games. Though some responses could be read as evidence of sexual abuse, it would make sense to characterize this interview as raising the possibility of sexual abuse more than proving it. The statements from Mary that were obtained before November seem much stronger as evidence than the CII interview. Moreover, the CII interview was summarized in a one-page log that appears far more definitive than the actual interview. The defense summary does the opposite, however, making far too strong a claim that the interview contained nothing more than some "vulgar" words. In these varying interpretations, one can see two competing views of the case, neither loyal to its complicated facts.

The circumstances surrounding this family seem particularly compelling because (1) they were not in contact with other families, (2) in their first contact with the police they emphasized the desire to minimize the number of interviews, and (3) their daughter's first statements came early in the investigation. There was also medical evidence, discussed later, to support these claims.

Kathy Ingram

The fifth response in September 1983 involving a child who later became a formal complainant in the criminal case came from the Ingram family. Kathy Ingram started attending the McMartin Preschool in March 1982. She had continuous contact with Ray Buckey throughout that period; he was her teacher for a while and he was in charge of watching her after school the entire time. As her mother indicated in the information form submitted to the MBPD:

> Most of the time my daughter Kathy was left alone there without any other children from hours of approx. 2:30 to 4:00. I was one of the few mothers there that had to work until 4:00—when they closed. Kathy was Ray's student for last part of winter and throughout summer. To our knowledge all was completely innocent.[73]

A week later, however, the MBPD listed Kathy as "possible 288 victim" because she was implicated in statements by three-year-old Valerie Van Holden. The MBPD informed the Ingrams of these statements, and on September 27 they called back to report that their daughter had "seen Ray pull out his penis." An interview was scheduled for the following week. As stated in a document attached to a later search warrant:

> On 10-3-83 your affiant interviewed Kathy Kae Ingram. Kathy told your affiant that Raymond Buckey has touched her pee pee while she was nude and inserted his fingers inside which hurt. Kathy further stated that Ray put his pee pee in hers while facing one another and this act has occurred more than once. Kathy has played doctor and has been tied up by Ray Buckey. [74]

Three other families were recorded in the MBPD log as providing "positive" responses to the September letter. The first one occurred on September 12, the same day the Mergilis came to the MBPD. Roseanne Owen contacted Detective Dye and reported "that her daughter Nina had been tied up in a closet and played a horsey game at the school with Raymond Buckey." Detective Hoag of the MBPD called Owen back the next day, and in that conversation she stated that "additional information obtained from her daughter indicated that Ray tickled her genitals and chest." On September 21, Detective Hoag contacted the Owens to request an interview with Nina; Mrs. Owen "had been reluctant to have Nicolette interviewed." The reluctance to have her child interviewed, combined with the apparent disclosures of abuse that match other descriptions, make these early developments noteworthy even though this child did not become part of the criminal case. Another family, the Goldmans, also provided a positive response on September 13. This family had two girls who had attended McMartin. The Goldmans had taken the younger one out a few months before Ray was arrested; she said the reason involved complaints about Ray, but nothing that raised specific concerns about sexual abuse. She testified at the grand jury, but her daughters did not testify at the preliminary hearing.[75] Nicollete Owens was interviewed at CII and her name appeared on a tentative witness list in February 1984, but she was not ultimately among the forty-one complainants in the case.

The third family to make a positive response in September, but not move forward in the criminal case, was the Van Holdens. Their three-year-old daughter Valerie had been attending the McMartin Preschool since May 1982; their five-year-old son Bobby had attended earlier. Valerie regularly encountered Ray Buckey during afternoon sessions at McMartin. On Friday, September 16, Mrs. Van Holden came to the MBPD and requested that Detective Hoag interview her children. As the detective later reported, "Bobby and Valerie were both anxious at being separated even briefly from their mother." Conducting an actual interview with each child proved "virtually impossible to do." The detective spent only a few minutes with each child. She reported that Valerie was "totally non-responsive and refused to answer any questions." No information of value was obtained from Bobby. However, the police report indicates that, while at the police station, Valerie told her mother she had touched Ray Buckey's penis.[76] Her mother also reported that Valerie "had tried to kiss [her brother's] penis in the bath tub." These three families were not ultimately involved in the criminal complaint, but all are potentially worth considering in light of the claims that the entire case was created at CII months later.

In sum, at least eight families with children who attended the McMartin Preschool in 1982 or 1983 reported what they viewed as incriminating statements or highly suspicious behavior suggesting sexual abuse at the preschool in response to the MBPD's September letter. These families furnished positive reports or related suspicions at the earliest stages of the McMartin investigation, long before there was any media coverage or "hysteria." Only a few of those children were included in the eventual criminal complaint; four became formal complainants and one was listed as an intended complainant in February (see Figure 2.3). But only one of those children ended up in the actual trial. The police reports from the week immediately following the letter also reveal a phenomenon that has been overlooked in the rush to characterize this time in terms of "hysteria": there were clear signs of parental reluctance to address the issue or to get involved in any way.

The Evaluations at CII

The investigation, which was being handled by the MBPD, soon generated concern and complaints from parents. Detective Hoag questioned children in a fashion that some considered intimidating. These concerns reached the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office, which, through Assistant DA Jean Matusinka, formally requested in mid-October 1983 that CII offer "assistance in conducting and videotaping interviews" in connection with "allegations that several children have been sexually molested."[77] Matusinka made the request "in order to reduce the number of times a child is interviewed" and to ensure that the children were interviewed "in a non-traumatic therapeutic setting." CII had done similar work for at least two years, but never in a case with multiple victims in an institutional setting. Former prosecutor Glenn Stevens, who became disillusioned with the prosecution's case, told screenwriter Abby Mann that Kee MacFarlane had done excellent work in those cases.[78] The witch-hunt narrative never acknowledges this fact. Instead, it sometimes asserts, without any factual basis, that McMartin was CII's first case assessing children for sexual abuse.

What happened at CII formed the basis for the eventual criminal charges. It also became the focus of the defense in the case. It is a core tenet of the witch-hunt narrative that false memories were "implanted" in the children at CII. Actually, the word implanted came into use much later; in the early years, the claim was that children had been "brainwashed." Either way, the argument was that children went into CII and suddenly became convinced—or aware, as case supporters might put it—they had been sexually abused at the McMartin Preschool. But there are several reasons to reject the notion that all of the allegations in the case were created at CII, a common claim in the witch-hunt narrative. First, there were ten positive and nine probable responders in September who were reported as making statements about Ray Buckey long before CII entered the case. Those are arguably the most important children in the story. Their early disclosures contradict the idea that the entire case was created at CII. Second, there were children who attended McMartin but moved away before the infamous September 1983 letter, and without being interviewed at CII. The universe of those children has been ignored in the witch-hunt narrative, but there is reason to think that children from one or more of those families might have made statements against Ray Buckey.[79] Third, the interview transcripts of children involved in the trial contradict the claim that the entire case was created at CII. It has been claimed, for example, that "Kee MacFarlane was able to extract from these children a tale of satanic horror."[80] Yet a full-text search of the CII interviews with all the children who ended up in the criminal trial reveals that the following words do not appear even once in any of the interviews: Satan, devil, tunnel, candle, grave, chant, cemetery, robe. Several of those children eventually made claims that involved such words, but none of those statements originated with the CII interviews. These three arguments are reasons to reject as overly simplistic the view that the case was "created at CII."

What is a more accurate description of what happened at CII? The ability to answer this question is limited by the fact that court records focus on the children who went forward in the legal process. But those children constitute only a small portion of all of the CII interviews, and almost none of them were from the critical early months of the investigation. To understand what happened at CII, the interviews have to be analyzed in chronological order. The content and timing of the earliest interviews is critical to understanding the evidence in the case. How things evolved over time is also important, especially since the interviews went on for months. In the McMartin case, such analysis requires documentation from dozens of CII interviews involving children who were not among the fourteen who participated in the preliminary hearing. Ideally, the analysis would involve the CII videotapes and not just the transcriptions, since videotapes convey tone of voice and nonverbal cues not reflected in transcripts.

Unfortunately, the available records yield an incomplete picture. The analysis offered here is based on records pertaining to many, but not all, of the earliest children in the case. It also includes a thorough review of fifteen videotapes of interviews; the tapes have not been part of any previous examination of the case outside of the actual trial itself. The chapter about the McMartin case in Nathan and Snedeker's book contains descriptions of a few tapes, complete with claims about body language and tone of voice, but those claims were not based on independent analysis of the tapes. Rather, they came directly from the defense and on close examination can be seen to have significant inaccuracies.

A few writers have published specific details about individual children, although not necessarily with a full-fledged attempt to contextualize them. Nathan and Snedeker, for example, give a detailed description of the CII interview with Tanya Mergili that includes the longest excerpt of a CII interview in their book. They make two arguments about the interview: first, that Tanya was coaxed and led into saying "bad" things about Ray Buckey, and second, that it was unclear, at best, whether she understood what it meant to tell the truth. A footnote provides the date of the interview and the child's initials, but no specific page numbers.[81] An independent analysis of this interview, which ultimately included a review of the actual videotape, indicates that Nathan and Snedeker's description of this interview is inaccurate at best. Consider their account of how Kee MacFarlane allegedly suggested and coaxed the girl into saying Ray did something "bad." Here is their unedited account:

> "When Tanya still didn't respond, MacFarlane added that she had seen the little girl's friends from McMartin's, and they told her 'all the bad secrets.' 'We can have a good time with the dolls,' MacFarlane coaxed, 'and, you know, we can talk about some of those bad secrets, if you wanted to. And they could go away. Wouldn't that be a good idea?' Urging puppets on Tanya, she again asked if she knew any bad secrets. 'Uh-uh,' Tanya shook her head. Then maybe she could figure them out, MacFarlane said. She showed off her 'secret machine' and assured Tanya that she would feel better if she told bad things about Ray. 'I hate those secrets,' Tanya finally said, addressing a bird puppet on MacFarlane's hand. 'Ray-Ray did bad things, and I don't even like it.'"[82]

Arguing that the girl's use of the word bad was suggested by the interviewer, the authors claim that MacFarlane used the word before it was ever uttered by Tanya. But Nathan does not provide specific citations for any of the statements in quotes; rather, her single footnote cites the entire transcript without any specific page numbers. Nathan's account is offered as a chronological story; however, it ends with the girl "finally" saying that Ray Buckey "did bad things." The actual transcript reveals that this is not an accurate chronological account of what transpired. In fact, what is represented as the "final" comment—about Buckey doing "bad things"–came before MacFarlane ever uttered the word bad. MacFarlane used the word for the first time at the bottom of page 36. But before that statement, Tanya said that she didn't like Ray because "He did bad things."[83]

Nathan and Snedeker also inaccurately conveyed a later exchange, where MacFarlane is ascertaining whether the child understands the concept of truth telling. Beyond raising questions about the accuracy of Nathan and Snedeker's reporting, this example demonstrates a stunning insensitivity to the kinds of miscommunication that can occur with children. According to the authors:

> [MacFarlane] asked Tanya, 'Do you know the difference between the truth and a lie? What's a lie?' 'Umm, it has big teeth, and it—and it's kind of brownish,' answered the girl. At that, MacFarlane asked whether Tanya had 'told the truth to the secret machine.' The girl was mute. She only nodded, with her mouth wide open.[84]

After checking this description against the actual interview, the transcript leaves no doubt that Tanya understood the difference between the truth and a lie. The reader would never know this, however, because Nathan and Snedeker omitted nearly three pages of follow-up questions after the "big teeth and brownish" comment. The two pages following further reinforce that Tanya understands she gets punished if she lies. Nathan omits any description of these statements, implying instead that MacFarlane moved directly from the "big teeth and brownish" comment to her question about whether Tanya told the truth. Avoiding any acknowledgment of the intervening three-page exchange leaves the reader with a serious misimpression.[85]

There is a sensible and seemingly obvious explanation for the child's answer, which otherwise appears to be a non sequitur: what she heard MacFarlane say is "what's a lion?" instead of "what's a lie?" Accordingly, her answer is accurate and makes sense. It is unclear whether Nathan and Snedeker even considered this explanation. It is even less clear why they omitted the series of questions that followed, since those questions were obviously designed to clarify whether the child understood the concept of truth telling. Immediately after the "big teeth and brownish" comment, MacFarlane asked "If you tell a lie, what would you—what would be a lie?"[86] The girl replied: "If you didn't tell the truth." MacFarlane then asked: "If I told you that Mr. Bird was pink, would it be the truth or a lie?" "A lie," the girl answered, correctly.[87] But these details are not included in Nathan and Snedeker's account.

November 1983

A detailed, chronological analysis of the content and progression of interviews at CII reveals a period of limited disclosures and palpable frustration on the part of the interviewers, followed by an incredible expansion of the case beyond all reason, beginning before the case broke on television on February 2.

The CII interviews began on November 1, 1983. Fifteen children were interviewed that month. The interviews lasted between forty-five and ninety minutes each. Many of these interviews were exemplars of patience. MacFarlane spent a significant amount of time playing and making the child feel comfortable; eventually, she would draw a picture of a human body and establish what awareness and vocabulary the child had for sexual parts. She would then ask about games that had been played at the school. Did you play any games at school? What were they called? How do you play that? Did children have their clothes on?

There is no comprehensive account of the content of all fifteen interviews in November. By several measures, however, these interviews were surprisingly unproductive. None of the first seven children interviewed at CII became formally involved in the criminal proceedings. Only three children interviewed in November moved forward in the case: Mary Gordon, Kathy Ingram, and Trisha Walters. They were number eight, nine, and eleven in the interview sequence. The first two had been September responders, so they have already been discussed. The third attended McMartin the day before she was interviewed. She was arguably the most important child in the state's case at the eventual trial, the only one interviewed at CII in 1983; the rest were all first interviewed there in 1984—most well after the story became a major media event.

Trisha Walters made several statements that had a combination of relevant specificity and childlike authenticity. She said, for example, that Ray had "stuck fingernails in my back." Her back, as she later clarified, included her "bottom." She said as well that Ray stuck a "pencil" in her bottom. (It is not uncommon for children to describe anal penetration by an object or finger as being either a nail or a stick, since they produce the kind of pain a child would associate with those items.[88]) A MBPD police officer who later viewed the videotape of this CII interview wrote: "In substance, the victim related the following: Ray touched the victim's vagina with his finger, he penetrated the victim's anus with his penis, a finger, and an object."[89] Judging from the transcript of the interview, it would seem more accurate to use the word or than and at the end of the sentence just reported. That said, the interview contained many important statements included in the police report, such as "Trisha said Ray wore no underwear" and "Trisha was threatened by Ray that he would slug kids if they told." In conversations with screenwriter Mann, Glenn Stevens referred to this interview as the prosecution's "best tape."

One might question these statements, of course, particularly given that Trisha's parents had provided a negative response to inquiries about the matter a couple months earlier. This is why the medical evidence is so important; it could constitute a physical basis for allegations that might otherwise seem difficult to believe. When Trisha was examined by Dr. Astrid Heger at CII on January 7, 1984, the girl asked the doctor to check her eyes because she was concerned about the "gray stuff" that had gotten into them. Dr. Heger considered it one of the strongest spontaneous statements made to her by any of the approximately 150 children she examined. "The only thing I can think of is that somebody ejaculated on Trisha's face," Dr. Heger later testified.[90] The medical evidence from her physical examination caused even the defense expert, who later examined this evidence, to agree that the combination of findings on the girl would be "strongly suggestive of penetrative injury."[91]

The rest of the fifteen children interviewed at CII in November said little or nothing incriminatory, yet it is clear from the existing records that MacFarlane concluded that virtually all of these children had been sexually abused at the McMartin Preschool. Some of the November interviews were with children so young that their responses were minimal and difficult to understand; children so young were not likely to end up as witnesses in a criminal trial. Valerie Van Holden, for example, was interviewed on November 7. She wore roller skates through the entire interview, which was disjointed and confusing but contains fragmentary statements that raise obvious concern, including something about Ray Buckey "sticking his pee-pee."[92] Other children may have been reluctant to talk. The first girl interviewed in November, Ella Baldwin, denied that any of the games at school were sexualized. She made no clear incriminating statements, and many of her responses were soft and unintelligible. The interview ended when Ella said "I wanna go."[93] Shortly before that request, MacFarlane asked, "Didn't you tell your mommy some things?" Whatever she had told her mother, she did not repeat it in this interview.

Signs of frustration on the part of the interviewer are apparent in the November sessions. By the end of the month, there was an obvious sense, reflected in the questions, that MacFarlane had decided the children were holding back. On November 29, when interviewing Sonny Landell, she asked twice whether someone had told the child not to talk. Twice the girl said no, adding once "I just don't want to talk."[94] MacFarlane then employed a kind of peer pressure, telling Sonny that her older sister "told already." (This is not an accurate description of the transcript of the interview with the older sister, who was vague and equivocal.) Sonny used dolls shortly thereafter in a fashion that has been interpreted by some as demonstrating knowledge of sexual abuse. But standing alone, the "knowledge" proved very little; nor did these interviews contain significant disclosures. The next day, interviewing five-year-old Mark Janes, MacFarlane told the boy that "other kids told her" he was there because of some "naked games." When the boy maintained he did not remember any naked games, MacFarlane called him a "scaredy cat."[95] This inappropriate use of name calling and pressure foreshadows the worst of what would happen at CII over the next several months. Children were pressured and otherwise manipulated into "telling" things, often in language that, on reflection, seems to be mostly innuendo and adult interpretation more than anything child-based and specific.

In sum, a few children made incriminating statements in their interviews at CII in November; others reportedly made incriminating statements to their parents but were unwilling to repeat them at CII. But most children seemed to have nothing to say. Rather than conclude at the end of November that the McMartin case was small, the CII staff seems to have concluded the opposite: the case was much larger than anyone imagined, and many or most of the children were not disclosing, probably out of fear. The children must have been threatened into silence, they reasoned. This explanation made sense to the adults, but the concept definitely emerged in the questions posed in CII interviews long before it appeared in any answers.

December 1983

The quality of the interviews deteriorated in December. Many contained the kind of pressure tactics used at the end of November. In some instances, they contained unfounded assertions made by the interviewer that "all the other kids" had talked, sometimes allegedly about the specific child being interviewed. There were also repeated references in many of the December interviews to the idea that the children had been threatened not to talk. "Someone told you not to tell, didn't they?" MacFarlane asked Penny Bailey in the first interview of December. She denied it. The five-year-old girl eventually indicated that Ray Buckey's penis touched her. But this occurred immediately after the child indicated he had touched her with his foot. The child provided no details, and it is impossible to ascertain whether the statement is an actual memory or simply an assent to a leading question.[96]

Statements by the interviewer about alleged threats came to be paired with assurances that "telling yucky secrets" would "make them go away." The microphone on the table in the interview room became known as the "yucky secrets machine." MacFarlane was particularly relentless with Jenny Brown on December 7, badgering her repeatedly throughout this interview, and calling her "a scaredy cat" for not saying anything. Then she played on the child's sense of guilt: "Jenny won't help me," MacFarlane's puppet intoned. "Nobody's helping me."[97] But the child was not moved to say anything. Instead, she endured sustained pressure, including questions at the end of the session from her mother.

The girl whispered to her doubting mother that she was not touched, placing clear emphasis on the word "not." None of this seemed to affect the interviewer's conclusion that the child had been sexually abused at school.

A few of the interviews in December stood out as being much more open-ended and less coercive, but a small fraction of the sixteen children who were interviewed that month. Several of those children made statements that might have supported a criminal complaint, but most came after the child was pressured in ways that are now recognized as inappropriate. Only two of the children interviewed in December became complainants in the case: Tanya Mergili and Sara Barton. Notably, both of them had been identified almost three months earlier, during the week of September 12. It is unclear why these two early responders in September were interviewed at CII in December instead of November. But their not being interviewed in November demonstrates that the CII interview sequence was correlated only loosely with the sequence of responses in September, if at all.

The remarkable bottom line for the interviews at CII in December was that they did not generate a single new complainant in the case.[98] Indeed, most of these interviews were surprising for how little they actually contained in the way of clear incriminatory statements. Although the December interviews did not generate any new complainants for the criminal case, they were apparently vital in expanding the case to include five female teachers at the school and Virginia McMartin, the wheelchair-bound woman who founded the preschool. According to a handwritten list prepared by MacFarlane several months later, the interviews in early December contained the first statements that implicated any teachers beyond Ray Buckey. By her account, the case started to expand on December 5 and increased noticeably the following week:

> 12/5 Bobby Vickers: "Peggy didn't touch but watched Ray do it"
> 12/7 Tanya Mergili: "Miss Peggy saw things happen" (Ray molesting Tanya)
> 12/12 Sara Barton: Betty took pictures during NMS [Naked Movie Star] game
> 12/12 Barry Gregg: Betty touched his heiney, exposed herself, tied him up, took naked pictures, drove him to a house
> 12/13 Betsy Lawton: Peggy took nude photos; Peggy was naked
> 12/13 Otis Lawton: Babs [Babette Spitler] played NMS game—she was naked[99]

The phrases cited above came directly from the logs of the videotapes. Those logs were created contemporaneously by the person operating the video camera and were originally intended to serve as indices, not as synopses; combined with a number on the VCR counter, the entries would allow someone to find the place in an interview where a subject or phrase was discussed. But they came to be used for much more than that—all to the detriment of the case.

The children who first implicated the female teachers would seem to be pivotal in the case. Two of them, Tanya Mergili and Sara Barton, became complainants, but neither one actually went to trial. The available written records on the remaining children are more limited. Fortunately, the copies of videotaped interviews that I obtained in the course of this research contain four interviews from early December, including Bobby Vickers and Tanya Mergili.

A close examination of the interview with Vickers reveals that the claim that he incriminated Peggy Buckey is significantly overstated. What actually transpired was ambiguous. It was more than fifty minutes into an interview in which Bobby had said almost nothing about the school or any bad activities there when MacFarlane asked about "yucky secrets." The boy responded quite earnestly: "One time, [another boy at the preschool] took off his clothes before he went swimming and everyone saw him."[100] He also indicated that he knew what "bad touch" meant. "We saw a movie about that at McMartin," he said. He proceeded to say something about a boy whose father didn't want him to tell, but the interviewer cut off the story. After asking again whether Miss Peggy was ever naked—the boy answered "no"—this exchange occurred:

KEE: Did Miss Peggy ever touch anybody?
BOBBY: No.
KEE: Did she ever watch?
BOBBY: Yes.
KEE: Did she watch when the kids were being touched?
BOBBY: Yes.
KEE: Do you think that she ever took her clothes off?
BOBBY: No—only when she was going to go swimming.

The interviewer returned to the topic later and asked questions to clarify or verify this earlier response.

KEE: Did Miss Peggy do anything bad?
BOBBY: No.
KEE: Did she know what Mr. Ray did to you?
BOBBY: Yes.
KEE: How come she didn't do anything to help you?
BOBBY: Because she didn't know.
KEE: Did she ever see any of those touchings that happened to Bobby?
BOBBY: Nope.

This exchange certainly contradicts the idea that Bobby incriminated Peggy Buckey in any meaningful way. The most that can be said is that his statements on this topic were contradictory. It appears he was most adamant and persuasive in the second exchange. But however one interprets these contradictions, it is not reasonable to boil this exchange down to Peggy didn't touch but watched Ray do it. Yet this is how the video log reads for this section.

There was also a diversion near the end of this interview that bears mentioning. Bobby was asked about going to Ray's house. He said they had gone in a car. "And then they went off the cliff," he added. The remark did not cause the interviewer to pull back, change directions, or even pause. Over the next few minutes, Bobby poured out details about a "spooky, haunted house" with windows that opened by themselves. "There might be ghosts," he said. "Mr. Ray pushed the button and the trap door opened into the alligator pit," he continued. The notion that certain questions might encourage a child to spin a story, so to speak, did not seem to be considered in general. The interviewer clearly did not believe there was an alligator pit, but there is no indication that this interview gave pause to the CII staff to consider why a child might say such a thing and how this might affect the evaluation process. Instead of this interview marking the beginning of a period of increased caution in the CII evaluations, this was apparently when the idea took hold that the case involved multiple defendants and multiple crime scenes (both at and away from the preschool).

The same kind of problem exists with Tanya Mergil's statements about Peggy Buckey's involvement. The most important part of her interview, according to the CII staff, was reduced to Miss Peggy saw things happen. Here is the interaction from which the phrase emanated:

Q: Did Ray-Ray ever take you some place?
A: No, no, no, no, no.
Q: Did all those bad things just happen at school?
A: Yes.
Q: Oh. Where were all those other teachers when those bad things were happening?
A: I don't know, but—
Q: Did Miss Peggy ever see any? Did she see anything?
A: Yes.
Q: She did?
A: Uh-huh.
Q: Did she ever play any of those bad games, too?
A: Oh, no.
Q: No. Did she get mad at Ray-Ray?
A: Yes.

Q: Oh. She didn't—she didn't want him to play?

A: Right.

Q: Do you think she ever saw the kids naked?

A: No, no, no, no, no.

Q: She wasn't there?

A: Nope.[101]

Of course, in a literal sense, Peggy Buckey did "see things happen" every day. But the follow-up questions that were appropriately aimed at fleshing out the meaning of this vague statement seem to make it clear that Miss Peggy did not witness any alleged acts of abuse. According to the response above, she did not play any of the bad games or see any of the kids naked. She was not there. The most one could fairly say is that Tanya said something ambiguous about Peggy that was contradicted by follow-up questions.

None of this is to deny that Tanya made credible statements on videotape at UCLA in September and again in this CII session in November. Notably, none of those statements were about the involvement of Miss Peggy or any other teacher besides Ray Buckey. The notation on the log from this CII interview misrepresented the actual content. Accordingly, the log notes seem to reflect more about the biases of the CII staff than they do about the actual substance of the interviews. The biases account for so much of what eventually happened in the case, however, that this insight is useful in understanding CII's role.

In early to mid-December, the CII staff formed the view that the case involved most or all of the female teachers. They also came to believe that these women were involved in making child pornography. An economic motive might help explain actions that otherwise seemed incomprehensible. Three of the first six children alleged to have incriminated the female teachers also allegedly made statements about taking pictures. See the phrases emphasized by bold print from the log notes (previously presented in this chapter) below:

12/5 Bobby Vickers: "Peggy didn't touch but watched Ray do it"

12/7 Tanya Mergili: "Miss Peggy saw things happen" (Ray molesting Tanya)

12/12 Sara Barton: Betty took pictures during NMS [Naked Movie Star] game

12/12 Barry Gregg: Betty touched his heiney, exposed herself, tied him up, took naked pictures, drove him to a house.

12/13 Betsy Lawton: Peggy took nude photos; Peggy was naked

12/13 Otis Lawton: Babs played NMS game—she was naked[102]

Although the phrases in bold seem to convey the underlying content in abbreviated form, they actually convey just the subject matter of the questions. In all three instances, the topic was introduced by the questioner and the responses were either ambiguous or otherwise less than corroborative. But the log conveys the opposite. Indeed, given how critical these supposed statements were to the evolution of the case—since they were apparently the first children to implicate the female teachers—it is telling that none of these children became part of the criminal case. Though virtually all of the children interviewed in December were considered by the staff at CII to have been victims of sexual abuse, none of them—save Tanya Mergili (who came forward in early September)—became part of the criminal case. By any objective standard, these interviews were unproductive. MacFarlane was clearly frustrated that the children had so little so say.

January 1984

The pace of interviewing increased dramatically over the next four months (see Figures 2.4 to 2.6). The most children were interviewed in April, which also yielded more actual complainants than any other month. Figures 2.5 and 2.6 illustrate how the children in the case were drawn largely from those interviewed at CII in February, March, and April—all months after the case became a major media story. The interviewing at CII continued for several more months but the criminal case was built entirely on the statements of children interviewed at CII before May. Nobody seemed to wonder why the bulk of the children who were eventually involved in the criminal proceedings emerged five and six months into the investigation. The notion that all of these children had been scared into silence was one possibility. Another was that their "disclosures" were the product of influences separate from any actual abuse. But this explanation did not receive any consideration in 1984, when the criminal case took shape.

Several aspects of the interviews changed in January. First, the nature of the children's statements became much more bizarre than anything said in November or December. The first child interviewed in January told Kee MacFarlane that Peggy Buckey was "a naked horsey rider."[103] He said that "Babs, Betty and Peggy scared kids" but "not Ray." His statements got stranger and stranger; at one point, he said Miss Virginia killed animals at school. Later, he talked about going on a freeway to a church, to a hotel, and to a car wash with "mean people." There are so many seemingly fantastic claims in this single interview that it is difficult to imagine sorting out the truth in any of the more plausible sounding statements. This boy was included in the original complaint but was not among the children who went through the preliminary hearing.

Second, rigidity and overconfidence on the part of the interviewers took root in January. In comparison to the earlier interviews, it is clear that the interviewer's expectations became much stronger. The interviews in this time period do not read as though the interviewer was trying to find out what happened; it is as if the interviewer already knew what happened and wanted the child to affirm it. This does not mean every single interview in January should be disregarded. Breanna Chapman, who attended the McMartin Preschool in January, emerged as one of the most compelling witnesses in the case in connection with events that resulted in the school closing "voluntarily" on January 12.

Her parents, Ellen and Terry, were staunch supporters of the Buckeys in the fall of 1983. Breanna attended McMartin until mid-January 1984, when she made a disclosure to her mother that was quickly corroborated by medical evidence; the school closed down a few days later. The evidence concerning this child has not been acknowledged in the witch-hunt narrative, even though it is contained in the grand jury notebooks and was well known enough that it was referenced in outtakes of the 60 Minutes episode about the case in December 1986.[104] But, as explained below, the jury never heard this evidence.

It is fair to say that after the September letter from the MBPD, the parents who continued sending their children to the McMartin Preschool were supporters of the McMartins who had concluded that there was no basis to the allegations. Indeed, Ellen Chapman told one of the investigators for the district attorney that in the fall of 1983 she was "totally appalled that people were going to discredit the school."[105] She even recommended the preschool to a friend after learning about the investigation. She was so loyal to the school that she made nothing of a strange remark of Peggy Buckey's about the allegations.[106] She didn't even entertain the possibility of sexual abuse when, on the evening of January 6, 1984, her daughter screamed in pain as she urinated. Her mother bathed her, applied some cream, and "noticed that she was very red and very swollen."[107] When she asked her daughter if anyone had hurt her, Breanna replied that "Ray had spit in her face and hurt her arm."[108] Chapman later testified that she assumed Breanna must have been referring to a playground mishap with a child named Ray. She did not connect the genital discomfort with this comment because Breanna spoke only of a hurt arm. It is important to remember that the story about McMartin had not yet been in any media coverage. Whatever was brewing at CII was unknown to all but a handful of insiders. To McMartin loyalists, the September letter was ancient history.

If, as is often alleged, there were parents of children attending the McMartin preschool who were bent on extracting disclosures of sexual abuse from their children, Chapman was clearly not one of them. Indeed, she took her daughter back to McMartin on January 12.[109] Later that day, however, Breanna told her Mr. Ray had hurt her private parts. The meaning of Breanna's words was apparently so clear that they almost instantly turned Chapman from a diehard McMartin supporter to potentially the most convincing witness for the state.[110] She withdrew Breanna from the McMartin Preschool, and Peggy Buckey closed it down two days later. Breanna was examined at the medical office of Dr. Myron Mitzenmacher on January 28. The exam revealed an enlarged vaginal opening and markedly red mucous membranes. Later, a colposcopic exam by Dr. Astrid Heger found a "remarkable scar" that, given its stage of healing, was diagnosed as "between two and four weeks" old.[111]

Chapman recounted those facts to the grand jury in March.[112] But Breanna, who had just turned four, was considered too young to testify. Her older sister Nancy, who was almost seven, was interviewed, and she was slated to testify instead. However, she became one of the untold casualties of the McMartin case: Nancy literally had a nervous breakdown in June 1984, was hospitalized after a period of continuous vomiting and dehydration,[113] and was subsequently removed from the witness list. Ellen Chapman still testified at the preliminary hearing, but all she was allowed to say in her direct testimony, given that her daughter was not a complaining witness, was that Breanna attended McMartin in the fall of 1983, that Peggy Buckey made a strange comment in the fall about "checking Ray for hard-ons," and that her daughter left the school on January 12, 1984. The normally contentious defense attorneys, who drew cross-examination of some children out for more than a week, didn't ask Chapman a single question. This eliminated any danger that she would be given the opportunity to explain why her daughter left McMartin and what Dr. Heger observed when examining the child shortly after her complaints in January 1984. The jury never heard any of that.

Other than Breana Chapman, however, there were enough problems with the interviews in January that they are generally not useful in assessing whether or not a child was sexually abused. The problems with "source attribution" apparently increased in January as more parents sent their kids to CII, and more parents told other parents about their experiences. There are several examples in the interview transcripts where a child makes it clear that his or her seemingly incriminatory statements against Ray Buckey or others are based on something told to the child by a parent (My mommy told me Ray touched kids). Although the case still had not yet generated any media attention, it was creating considerable interest and conversation in the community. A parents' meeting at UCLA Medical Center in late October drew parents from about a dozen families; scores more attended the community meeting in Manhattan Beach on January 24. Those developments made it more likely that a child generating specific claims in January might have heard that information from someone else, rather than actually having experienced it. Most likely, the child's parent heard it from someone else's parent.

February Onward

An interview with a six-and-a-half-year-old boy during the first week of February involved the same problem. During the interview, conducted by MacFarlane, the boy made a number of specific statements about Ray "touching kids," including a seemingly telling response that "something came out" of Ray's penis. But in the time after the interview, while the tape was still running, the boy contradicted everything he had just said. He told Sandy Krebs, another CII interviewer, that he was not scared to answer MacFarlane's questions, that he had never seen Ray's (alleged) gun, that he was not actually at the McMartin Preschool for long, and that Ray did not hurt him or threaten him.[114] These statements were apparently ignored by the CII staff.

The next three months were the most important in the overall process, by two measures: total number of interviews and total number of complainants generated for the criminal case. These months were also when the CII interviews deteriorated in several ways. Most significantly, the interviewers had clearly reached the conclusion that there had been massive abuse at the preschool; they could not possibly be said to have an open mind about the interviews during these months. I have reviewed the videotapes of two interviews in February, one in March, and two in April. All involved children who became complainants in the case. None of the interviews had the feeling of open-ended inquiry that characterized some of those from November. To the contrary, they seemed aimed at getting the child to confirm that something bad happened, to say it on videotape. These interviews are filled with inappropriate questions.

The interview with Miranda Chase on April 3, 1984, is representative of some of the worst practices in the CII interviews. It also contains a particularly striking example of how the interviewers ignored statements that did not fit their own view of the case. Miranda was nine years old at the time; she had attended the McMartin Preschool from August 1977 until June 1979. As the defense later pointed out, Ray Buckey was still in high school during the time covered by some of the complainants in the case, including Miranda.

Miranda was strikingly older than the children in all of the other tapes I was able to review. She is described in Dr. Heger's medical evaluation, which was conducted on April 23, as "a bright cooperative nine year old who was able to volunteer a tremendous amount of information." The CII interview starts with a remarkable statement that is quite unprompted and involves considerable detail. It is all about how a friend of hers got "sick" because of all this stuff about McMartin. "His mind is playing tricks on him and he thinks things happened that never happened," she explains. "Hmmmm. I didn't talk to him," Krebs replies and lets the subject drop.

The interviewer and the girl then drew for more than ten minutes, making small talk about drawing. Eventually, Krebs gave Miranda a human figure she drew and prompted the girl to label various parts of the body: belly button, eyes, nose, mouth, fingers. With specific prompting, she added "boobs" and then "vagina." A few minutes later, Krebs brought out school pictures from various classes and years at McMartin. "Ray's in jail," Miranda said energetically and without any prompting. When shown a picture of some or all of the adults charged in the case, she added, again without any kind of prompt, "I'm glad he's in jail [pointing to Ray], but I'm not so sure about them" and pointed to several other adults. Krebs also let this remark pass, declining to inquire about the "not so sure" part.

Miranda then told her about a child she should interview. The girl once spent the night at Ray's house and later said "Ray's going to be my boyfriend." (There is no additional information in available records about this lead.) Apparently aware that she was supposed to say something about Ray Buckey, the girl then said, again without any specific prompt, that Ray "was dishonest." This time, Krebs followed up and asked for an explanation. The girl launched into a long story about how Miss Virginia would give Ray suckers, but the children were not supposed to eat them. Once Miss Virginia was gone, Ray said, "you guys can go eat some suckers."

Krebs abruptly said something about how helpful puppets have been and directed Miranda's attention to a host of puppets on the couch. They each selected one and Krebs started talking through her puppet to Miranda's puppet. She told the puppet how the older children can help out more because they are smarter, they can talk better, and they have better memories. Then she gave Miranda's puppet "a pretty blue pointer" and said: "We know somebody scared people; told them not to tell." She asked Miranda—again, through her puppet—to point out anyone like that in the photo. Miranda pointed immediately to Ray. "Anyone else?" Krebs asked. "Miss Betty, I think," she responded with equivocation. Krebs replied with enthusiasm: "You know what, Wookie [the puppet Miranda was holding], that's what all the other kids said! You're going to be a big help."

Miranda was then asked a series of very leading questions. "What did they say to Miranda when she was little to make her scared?" She responded with something about "don't go home" that did not quite make sense. "Did they say to Miranda that she might get hurt?" This is when Miranda said something about a bomb threat. "Getting rid of these secrets is kind of neat. And everybody's doing it." This is when Miranda said something about Ray letting children go swimming in the pool naked. Krebs proceeded to ask more leading questions, such as, "Who tickled the kids?" Miranda was given huge praise for her answers. "Congratulations, what a brave bear," she is told after nodding in response to a question as to whether Ray did any "tricky tickling" of Miranda. Krebs later employed some of the worst kind of leading questions, ones with forced-choice answers, such as "Which hurt more, the bottom or the vagina?" Either answer, of course, "confirmed" the implication contained in the question. This interview ended with Krebs giving excessive praise: "You really did a good job! You really did a good job! You're terrific!"[115] Two weeks later, when Miranda was evaluated by Dr. Heger, the cooperative fourth-grader repeated much of what she said to Krebs. The adults were apparently so taken by the articulateness of this nine-year-old that they did not take her negative responses to heart. What seems most convincing from her interview is that Ray Buckey gave children suckers when he was not supposed to; he also apparently let children swim in the pool naked. But almost this entire interview is ambiguous, contradictory, and overly leading. The single-mindedness of the interviewer is apparent throughout. Miranda Chase was included in the forty-one complainants; she was not, however, one of the fourteen who testified at the preliminary hearing. It is not clear why she dropped out of the case between the grand jury proceedings and the preliminary hearing.

In retrospect, the mistakes made during this critical phase of the CII evaluations seem fairly clear; what remains less clear is why such a shaky foundation of interviews resulted in seven defendants being charged and in official claims that far more people were probably involved. In other words, why did so many people come to believe, based on so little evidence, that there had been such widespread abuse? The answer is complicated and involves a confluence of factors that are analyzed next. First and foremost was the role of medical diagnosis.

Contested Medical Evidence

Medical evidence played a critical role from the beginning. The case was referred to the Manhattan Beach Police Department after an evaluation of Matthew Johnson, conducted at UCLA's Medical Center, yielded evidence that the boy had likely been sodomized. Several other children, interviewed later in the case, were also examined by pediatric specialists at UCLA. The vast majority of medical evaluations in the case, however, were conducted through CII—the same organization that interviewed hundreds of children in the case. These medical examinations were conducted by Drs. Astrid Heger and Bruce Woodling. Dr. Heger was a young pediatrician with strong credentials; she graduated at the top in her medical school class at the University of Southern California in 1972 and started working at CII in 1983. Dr. Woodling had gained some experience—and later, notoriety—for his testimony in the Kniffen and McCuan cases in Bakersfield, California.[116] Together, they helped pioneer the use of the colposcope, a medical instrument that combines binocular magnification with the power of photography, in evaluating the possibility of sexual abuse.[117]

The medical evaluations conducted through CII played a significant and complicated role in the McMartin case. On the one hand, it is clear with the benefit of hindsight that Drs. Heger and Woodling overdiagnosed abuse in the children who were interviewed at CII. The overdiagnosis became apparent as advances in medical knowledge demonstrated that some medical findings clinicians considered to be related to sexual abuse were also found in nonabused children. The overdiagnosis helps explain why parents became convinced that their children had been sexually abused, even if their statements at CII were ambiguous or strained credulity. Yet, these shortcomings do not mean their evaluations should be rejected out of hand. The changes in medical knowledge that occurred between 1984 and the late 1980s, particularly two well-known studies by Dr. John McCann, discredited some "findings" from the early 1980s, but they did not dismiss all relevant medical knowledge from that era.[118]

The significance of evolving medical knowledge in the McMartin case cannot be ascertained without case-by-case analysis of the constellation of findings reported for each child. The first original effort at such analysis—given here—reveals that a considerable amount of the evidence presented in the McMartin case would still be considered strong today. Unfortunately, any close inquiry into this medical evidence is limited in at least two ways. First, although there is fairly extensive information about the fourteen children involved in the preliminary hearing and even more information about the subset that went to trial, there is only scattered information available for the rest of the children who were evaluated by CII. Second, even though medical reports and related documents were entered into the court record for many children who did not end up in the trial, the photographic slides that were entered as exhibits in support of those records are not in the court archives. It is a standard practice that transcripts are retained by the court while exhibits are destroyed or returned to the parties soon after the case is over.[119] With one exception, none of the photographic slides were available to this researcher. Despite those limitations, there is considerable documentation in the court record concerning some of the most significant children in the case, particularly Matthew Johnson and the three girls who were involved in the original trial and the retrial. Information about the earliest children involved in the case was also obtained from various sources.[120]

The Overdiagnosis Problem

Just as the interviewers at CII "found" indications of child sexual abuse in interviews that do not, on close examination, support the conclusion, the physicians at CII "found" medical evidence of sexual abuse in an astonishing number of children. Medical records for most of these children were never part of the criminal proceedings, so it is not possible to assess the details. There are some aggregate claims, however, that indicate there was a significant problem of overdiagnosis in medical evaluations conducted between January and May 1984. Two claims about the widespread prevalence of medical evidence have been cited in various writings about the McMartin case. One is that Dr. Heger found medical evidence in 80 percent of the 150 children she examined; the other is that the "majority" of the 400 children evaluated at CII had medical indications of sexual abuse.[121] The latter statement was made by Kee MacFarlane in congressional testimony in September 1984.[122] Information about most of these evaluations remains elusive because most of the children who received medical examinations through CII were never part of the criminal proceedings. The case had forty-four children at its height and Dr. Heger apparently evaluated thirty of them. Most of those children were diagnosed with having medical signs of sexual abuse. Dr. Heger has since published a peer-reviewed article concluding that approximately 5 percent of sexually abused children actually have medical signs of abuse. So even if all thirty children whom Dr. Heger examined early in the case were actually sexually abused, one would expect, under current understandings concerning this kind of evidence, that no more than a few would present with medical indications.

Why did the CII "find" such widespread indications of abuse? The primary reason is that the prevailing clinical understanding of sexual abuse was quite limited in 1984. Doctors knew what they often saw in sexually abused children, but there had not yet been studies examining the prevalence of such findings in "normal," or nonabused, children. Clinicians were aware of this problem. Drs. Heger and Woodling had written about the need for such studies.[123] Early examples of this kind of study include McCauley, Gorman, and Guzinski's prospective case-control study conducted at the University of Maryland Hospital in Baltimore between July 1984 and May 1985.[124] The study was conducted to evaluate use of a blue dye as a method of detecting lacerations, but it also provided scientific proof concerning the significance of fourchette lacerations in girls under ten years old. The incidence of lacerations "in the sexually abused group was 55 percent, whereas none of the control children had any lacerations detected."[125] In short, this study confirmed the common-sense conclusion that lacerations in the genitalia are not normal. The study also confirmed that physical signs were present in a minority of confirmed cases. The percentage of cases thought to have meaningful physical findings has gone down as knowledge advances in the field. Astrid Heger was lead author on a study published in 2002 that concluded, on the basis of a sample of 2,384 children, referred for suspected sexual abuse, there were "abnormal medical findings in only 5.5%" of the cases.[126]

There were several beliefs in the medical community in the 1980s that later proved to have much less basis than findings concerning certain lacerations in young girls. One involved the "normal" opening of the hole in the hymen. Pediatrician Hendrika Cantwell published an article in 1983 that argued openings larger than 0.4 mm are abnormal.[127] It was eventually proven that "normal" (nonabused) children could also have a large hymenal opening. Studies of "normals" also dispelled notions about "neovascularization" and "vaginal ridges and notches" as evidence of abuse. Most famous were the McCann studies that dispelled some conventional wisdom about anal findings.[128] What Woodling described as an "anal wink" response occurs more often in nonabused children than Woodling or others ever knew. Advancements in knowledge have also produced results that challenge the witch-hunt narrative. For example, there have been controlled studies of the reliability of genital exams in the context of sexual abuse. Atabaki and Paradise found that physicians with experience evaluating cases of suspected abuse evinced less diagnostic bias than did physicians with less experience.[129] It makes common sense that experience improves the knowledge of physicians, but the witch-hunt narrative definitely tells a different story: one in which child-abuse professionals, pejoratively known as the "child abuse industry," are considered most "prone" to "finding" abuse whether or not it exists because it is supposedly in their professional interest to do so. Instead, this study demonstrates that professionals are generally more conservative. At least they are now. It is clear in retrospect that some clinicians were overdiagnosing sexual abuse in the mid-1980s.

The consequences of the problem were enormous in the McMartin case. A medical diagnosis of sexual abuse is an extremely powerful way to convince parents that his or her child has been sexually abused, almost regardless of what the child said on tape at CII. Statements that contained direct denials of abuse, clear equivocations, contradictions, and even fantastic details would not likely raise enough skepticism to overcome such "findings." To the contrary, the medical diagnosis apparently "validated" the content of the interviews. What parent, faced with a medical diagnosis, would decide that his or her child has not been abused because the CII interview contained leading questions, or the child's answers were less than clear and convincing?

In this way, the overdiagnosis of children who did not move forward in the case caused far greater harm than overdiagnosis of the children who did. The evidence concerning children who moved forward was subject to cross-examination and critique by the defense. Because the proceedings lasted so long, it was also subject to Dr. Heger's frank testimony about changes in medical knowledge since the original examinations. The diagnosis of children who did not become part of the case had the effect of convincing a host of parents that their children had been abused. Had the same parents been faced with only the CII interviews, they might have been far more skeptical about how those interviews were being interpreted.

Relevant Medical Evidence

The witch-hunt narrative has used the fact that medical knowledge became more conservative over time—learning that some medical indications associated with sexual abuse were sometimes found in nonabused children—to reject all of the medical evidence in the McMartin case. But this is an overstatement of the studies of "normal" children. Moreover, the argument does not account for the medical findings on Matthew Johnson; the defense's own medical expert agreed that they were significant. The witch-hunt narrative has employed a different argument to dismiss the medical evidence concerning Matthew, arguing essentially that it should have been much more dramatic. Nathan and Snedeker asserted that the kind of sexual abuse Judy Johnson suspected her son had endured "can be expected to leave horrific anal tears and bruising" and that such abuse "often maims or kills."[130] Since Matthew was neither maimed nor killed, the argument goes, he must not have been sodomized. But the single publication on which they relied for this argument merely says that "Children, who are smaller and unwilling, experience more pain and injury."[131] It says nothing about being maimed or killed. Moreover, the article—which is actually about the behavior of child molesters, not the injuries sustained by their victims—cites several studies that directly contradict Nathan's claim.[132] The defense's own expert rejected Nathan's claim, although this has never been recognized in the witch-hunt narrative. [133]

Beyond the evidence concerning Matthew Johnson, some of the most relevant medical evidence in the case involved three girls.[134] A majority of the jurors in the first trial found the evidence pertaining to these girls convincing enough to vote that Ray Buckey was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The jury in the second trial also split on those charges. The witch-hunt narrative relies heavily on Dr. David Paul, who came from England to testify for the defense, for the claim that there was no credible medical evidence in the case. But he did not reject all of the evidence concerning these girls. Moreover, it is not clear how much weight his opinion should receive. The nature and extent of disagreements concerning these girls is considered here.

Sally Gregg

Sally Gregg was the only September responder who ended up in the actual trial. This is the family to indicate by mail that "in a preliminary discussion with Sally, she said 'Ray Ray does not wear underpants'" and that "we would like more time to talk to Sally without a heavy cross examination." Sally was not interviewed in the earliest phase of the CII interviews. Instead, she was fortieth in the CII interview sequence, interviewed on January 16, 1984.[135] Her medical examination was conducted by Dr. Heger about six weeks later, on March 2. Dr. Heger testified at the grand jury that Sally's hymenal opening was "one-and-a-half times" the normal size, that she had many areas of "rounding" on the hymen, and that there were "multiple scars" in various locations around the opening of the hymen. Dr. Heger also testified there was a scar located posteriorly, that is, in the anus.[136] Several years later, in her testimony at the first trial, Dr. Heger acknowledged that some of the vaginal findings mentioned at the grand jury were no longer considered indications of abuse. But she also testified that the anal findings on Sally were still consistent with blunt force penetrating trauma. She testified further that causes other than sexual abuse, such as diarrhea, could not have caused these findings.[137]

Three other doctors testified at trial about the photographic slides that formed the basis of Dr. Heger's conclusions: two for the prosecution (Drs. Woodling and Gordon) and one for the defense (Dr. Paul). Dr. Gordon testified that he saw "extraordinary injury to the anal verge." He testified further that given those findings there was a "very high probability that Sally was a victim of anal penetration." He noted the anal area was "grossly abnormal in its pattern" and showed "evidence of significant injury." He also testified that he saw thickened tissue, "broad base large wedges pointed into the anal opening," as well as a "markedly abnormal anal opening showing evidence of injury and trauma to the anal verge."[138] Dr. Woodling, who examined a photograph in a three-dimensional viewer, testified that the picture of the anal area showed a "marked deformity"; he said this suggested "multiple traumas" had occurred in the area. He testified further that an anal scar could clearly be observed, extending toward the anal funnel. Dr. Woodling called it a "significantly scarred anus" and said it was "significantly deformed."[139] Dr. Paul contradicted these three doctors, testifying at the first trial that the slide reflected a "perfectly normal" anus. On cross-examination, however, he also identified as "perfectly normal" a photograph of an anus from a British medical journal article that, unbeknownst to him, was about cases of corroborated trauma from sexual abuse.[140]

Dr. Heger's testimony in the second trial clearly took into account the changes in medical knowledge since 1984. She discussed the vaginal findings, particularly the scarring,[141] which would still be considered significant, but her testimony focused on the anal findings, which were even more clearly abnormal. When testifying about the vaginal findings, she noted that some, particularly scarring, were significant and some, like rounding, were no longer considered relevant.[142] She testified that the minor findings in Sally included a hymenal diameter of 0.6–0.7 cm and the rounding of the hymenal edge.[143] She maintained that the vaginal area was nevertheless abnormal, describing it as "deformed" in the sense that it was "disrupted and transected looking vestibular mucosa or hymen . . . it's a scarred hymen."[144] She described it as being a scar half a centimeter to a centimeter posteriorly away from the vagina on the anus.[145] Finally, she testified specifically in relation to the new studies of "normals" that she felt "very confident that the major findings in [Sally] G. would be supported by any of [the] studies" of nonabused children.[146] In other word, studies of nonabused children did not find these kinds of medical indications.

Trisha Walters

Among the eleven children who eventually went to trial, Trisha Walters appeared earliest in the CII interview sequence. She was interviewed on November 22, 1983, and her medical exam was conducted by Drs. Heger and Woodling on January 7, 1984. This is the girl who spontaneously asked Dr. Heger to examine her eyes. When Dr. Heger inquired why, the four-year-old said Ray's "gray tinkle" got in her eyes and her hair, and she was afraid she might go blind.[147] The jury was admonished not to take this statement into account because it was hearsay evidence.

Dr. Heger testified at the grand jury that Trisha's hymenal opening was "one-and-a-half times" what she thought was normal. She also noted there was rounding of the hymen and "neovascularization."[148] These findings would be considered nonspecific today; that is, they would not be considered indicative of sexual abuse. But Trisha also had several scars and healed lacerations of the hymen. There was one at the 3 o'clock position and another in between 3 o'clock and 4 o'clock. Dr. Heger testified as to an "impressive" scar at 6:30 that extended into the vagina.[149] These findings would still be considered significant today. During the second trial, Dr. Heger emphasized them; she testified there was a crescent-shaped scar that came across the hymen at 5 o'clock and extended across the "actual edge of the hymen."[150] There was another scar at 7 o'clock and a scar in the posterior fourchette.[151] Her conclusion was that the medical findings were "consistent with sexual assault."[152]

There were no slides taken of Trisha Walters; the colposcope in Dr. Heger's office did not yet have a camera in early January, 1984.[153] Instead, she drew a diagram based on what she saw through the colposcope. Dr. Paul testified that if the findings that she drew were present, it would also be consistent with sexual abuse. He later claimed that such findings would be consistent as well with "normal wear and tear."[154] It is difficult to ascertain what kind of "wear and tear" Dr. Paul thought a four-year-old girl would have sustained. No other doctor provided any testimony that supported this peculiar claim.

Dr. Paul's testimony in the second trial was inconsistent with that in the first trial, as he testified that there were no signs in the medical reports consistent with penetrative abuse through the hymen or the anus.[155] On cross-examination, however, he allowed that if the exam by Drs. Heger and Woodling was accurate, and there was damage to the posterior fourchette, this would be a significant finding.[156] Finally, he admitted that the combination of findings on the girl—scarring to the posterior fourchette as well as scar tissue—was "strongly suggestive of penetrative injury." Thus, in the end he conceded that if Dr. Heger's findings were accurate, her conclusions would be correct.

Allison Brown

The third girl involved in both trials was Allison Brown, who was first interviewed at CII on March 13, 1984. Her initial medical examination was less than a month later, on April 8. Allison attended the McMartin Preschool from 1981 to 1983. She had nightmares during her time at McMartin about someone coming into her house at night; her father actually nailed her bedroom window shut during that time to ease her mind. The findings on Allison were, in retrospect, quite mixed. Several findings—"rounded hymen," neovascularization—were considered significant in 1984 but would not be considered important by the time of the second trial. Dr. Heger addressed those changes directly in the second trial. Several of the original findings involved scarring.[157] There was a tear to the posterior fourchette (the mucous membrane forming the posterior margin of the vulva). Dr. Heger testified that "to a medical certainty" these were not the kind of scars that could have been self-inflicted or accidentally incurred.[158] Dr. Paul did not reject those findings entirely; rather, he testified he could not tell if there were one or more scars. Multiple scars would presumably be a stronger finding than a single scar. But allowing that there was at least one scar seems to indicate there was some kind of attendant injury.

Whatever the number of scars, it is important to consider the weight that should be given to Dr. Paul's testimony. The witch-hunt narrative seems to accept it all without question, and apparently without looking closely enough to see that he did not reject all of the state's evidence. There is no question he made statements that were eminently quotable. He was also firm in his opinions, concise in his statements, and unfailingly British in delivery ("You have to be jolly careful" about magnifying photographic images, he said at one point[159]). But his critique of the colposcope, however quotable, was deeply flawed. The colposcope became the basis for controlled studies about "normals." It is also what allowed the findings in the McMartin case to be examined by other doctors.

It is not surprising that Dr. Paul knew little about the colposcope. He was trained in the 1950s and the device did not start being used in the United States until the early 1980s. One of the strangest arguments offered against the medical evidence in the McMartin case is against the colposcope, a medical instrument "now accepted as the standard of care in most referral centers in the world."[160] Debbie Nathan claimed that use of the device was inspired by the dubious practices of a Brazilian doctor named Wilmes Teixeira.[161] But the colposcope was not introduced to the medical community in the United States by Teixeira's article; the instrument was already well established for use in cervical pathology and for "the diagnosis of early carcinoma in situ."[162] The absurdity of criticizing the colposcope is that the device itself is what allowed Dr. Paul to review the evidence in the McMartin case. It is also what allowed the studies by McCann and others of "normals." Every advance in medical knowledge in this area is based, in part, on the colposcope. Dr. Heger's use in 1984 was pioneering and prescient.

Dr. Paul also had some decidedly unusual methods—such as inserting his finger into a child as a way of measurement. The witch-hunt narrative was quick to label a Minnesota pediatrician, who testified for the state in the Jordan cases, as a child abuser for having engaged in this practice.[163] But the narrative heaps only praise on Dr. Paul, despite this unusual practice, along with his inexplicable objection to taking a medical history from a child, and his absurd claims about assessing the honesty of children by observing their "eye contact."[164] Although Dr. Paul faded from the field after his appearance in the McMartin case, Dr. Heger went on to considerable professional prominence. She coauthored a major textbook on evaluating sexually abused children and was the medical expert who helped identify problems at Children's Hospital in San Diego in 1992.[165] She was also one of the peer reviewers of the famous McCann study.[166] Her original evaluations of children in the McMartin case were definitely overstated, but there was also considerable evidence that remained significant over time on all three of these girls.

Beyond the three girls who participated in both trials, there was medical evidence presented for most of the remaining children who participated in the first trial. Two of the boys were reported to be "within normal limits"; that is, their medical evaluations resulted in no medical evidence of sexual abuse. The medical evidence concerning the five other children involved in the first trial varied considerably. There were definitely issues of overdiagnosis, but there was also medical evidence that seems significant even with the benefit of advancements in medical knowledge since 1984. There was medical evidence worthy of consideration on at least five of the other children in the first trial.[167] Among these children, there are findings that would still be considered significant today contradicting the central claim in the witch-hunt narrative: that there was virtually no meaningful medical evidence of sexual abuse in the case.

Many of the earliest children in the case also had positive medical findings. Unfortunately, much of that evidence was not fully developed. Of course, evidence involving children who became complainants but dropped out before the preliminary hearing was never subject to cross-examination. Nevertheless, it is important to consider such evidence since the witch-hunt narrative denies the existence of any evidence of abuse. In fact, the medical evaluations of some of the earliest children in the case help explain how and why the case moved forward. There were five September responders who became complainants; only one, Sally Gregg, actually testified at the preliminary hearing. She also went on to trial and retrial, and the medical evidence in her case has already been discussed. Documents indicate that three of the other important September responders had medical signs of sexual abuse as well.[168] The fourth, Tanya Mergili, had some suspicious medical findings, but nothing as strong as with the other three.[169] Finally, there was relevant medical evidence concerning Kathy Ingram, whose family responded to the MBPD in late September 1983. The girl's mother indicated she had a chronic thin watery discharge with a distinctive odor. Dr. Heger told the grand jury that she saw "numerous scars surrounding the entire entrance through the girl's hymenal opening," and some of them "crossed the hymen and had been torn."[170] One of the reported findings is more ambiguous; a "scalloped hymen," though considered relevant at the time, was shown to be far more common in nonabused children than ever known. Another finding on Kathy Ingram was also, in retrospect, given too much importance at the time: neovascularization. This was thought to be a sign of new blood vessels, but it can also be congenital. Nevertheless, if the scarring evidence was accurate, it would still be considered highly significant today. Indeed, it would be unthinkable for authorities to ignore evidence of this nature.

In sum, the medical evaluations helped to support the state's case in McMartin—and, ironically, they also helped to undermine it. The latter effect was ultimately more powerful, since the overdiagnosis of many children in early 1984 fueled the idea that the case involved dozens, if not hundreds, of children. It also gave parents a strong reason to believe their children must have been abused, regardless of what else they said about the matter. The damage caused by the overdiagnosis was enormous, and it undoubtedly helped doom the case. But the witch-hunt narrative that has since emerged does an injustice in the other direction: it ignores or dismisses credible medical evidence of sexual abuse that would still be recognized today.

The Confluence of Forces Beyond CII

The mistakes that were made at CII are pivotal to explaining how the McMartin case spun out of control. The interviewers, in an earnest attempt to avoid dismissing children's voices, "heard" far more than they were actually told. Convinced that the children were afraid to talk, they coaxed responses that seemed to confirm their view. Faced with the implausible idea that all of the teachers in the school participated in the abuse, they came up with a conspiracy theory about a national network of child pornographers. These problems were compounded significantly when medical evaluations "confirmed" that most of the children interviewed in the first few months at CII had been abused. Children who made few incriminating statements, if any, were seen in an entirely different light because the evaluators "knew" they showed medical signs of abuse. The chance that parents might view the CII videotapes skeptically was virtually eliminated when they were presented with medical evidence "confirming" the abuse. The toxic combination of these problems explains a lot about why the case went so wrong. But three factors external to CII are also important to understanding the story. First, there were activist parents and therapists who provided substantial reinforcement to an emerging view of the case in 1984. Second, a barrage of national publicity that came long before a grand jury was ever convened changed the dynamics of the case in such a way as to accentuate the extremes. Finally, the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office, which was responsible for actually charging and prosecuting the case, failed in a variety of ways.

Parent-Investigators and Activist-Therapists

One factor that undoubtedly influenced the content and intensity of beliefs that developed around the McMartin case was the role of parent-investigators and activist-therapists. Parents started becoming investigators in middle to late December 1983, when the idea that the McMartin case involved activities beyond the school grounds first began to take shape. Various houses in and around Manhattan Beach were mentioned as possible places where children had been taken. Some parents drove their children around Manhattan Beach and surrounding communities, asking them to point out places they may have been taken. A number of the children apparently provided affirmative answers, further fueling the idea that the case involved parties well beyond the preschool. In late December, various parents start reporting addresses of suspect houses to the MBPD. This soon evolved into the reporting of suspects in general, as parents reported license plates of "suspicious" individuals, an assessment made on the basis of how their child reacted to, say, a stranger in a pizza parlor. The documentation of these events is all in the form of police and DA's investigator notes. From existing records, it is impossible to know what these children were actually asked or how they actually answered.

It is also difficult to ascertain how much of this amateur investigation was requested or encouraged by authorities. Some of it definitely was. A number of parents were given photographs of buildings to show their children; the photos came from the MBPD and were circulated in December 1983 and January 1984.[171] But some of the parents took matters into their own hands. One of the parents who played a leading role in these efforts was Robert Currie, who was portrayed in the movie Indictment as yelling at the chief of the Manhattan Beach Police Department:

> I'm going to ask you, this is about the thousandth time, for the grand jury transcripts and the police report. I mean, if you won't pursue this, we'll conduct our own investigation!

Investigator notes from the DA's office indicate that Robert Currie was providing the FBI with photos of possible additional suspects as early as February 3, 1984—the day the case began receiving intensive media coverage. Sociology professor Jeffrey Victor eventually identified Currie as one of the "carriers" of the satanic cult legend that swept through this community.[172] Currie led a group of parents who started to dig at the site of the preschool in 1985 because they were convinced they would find dead animals, killed to scare the children into silence. Some of these parents also believed there were tunnels underneath the school where children had been abused. The district attorney's office had the area cordoned off and conducted their own dig—which did not turn up any evidence of tunnels. They did find some tortoise shells, which were the subject of considerable attention at the eventual trial with competing experts arguing about whether the turtles had died of natural causes.

Another parent who was extraordinarily involved in the early investigation was Madeline Randle, whose daughter attended the preschool with Tanya Mergili. Randle's amateur investigative work was dutifully reported to the DA's investigator. She was one of the parents who drove children around Manhattan Beach and surrounding areas to see if particular houses looked familiar. Two notations from police investigative notes in early January reveal the extent of her activity:

> 1/6/84 Randle: "Daughter Molly picked a yellow house. 829 2nd Str. Hermosa Beach as place where Ray took her." "Girls independently ID same house."
> 1/11/84 Randle: "2 more licenses for Jean." "Molly IDs all three houses with absolutely no help from mother."[173]

The final notation might be a reference to some photos of buildings prepared by the MBPD. There is no question that Randle went overboard in her efforts. Through her own "investigation," this parent convinced herself that the case involved numerous buildings beyond the preschool; this "fact" alone helped reinforce the view that the case had to have multiple defendants. On February 16, she provided "a two-page handwritten letter re a dark skinned oriental they saw @ Cocos in M.B."[174] She also supplied a license plate number for the "suspects." This letter was received the same day the investigator received a two-page communication from Judy Johnson about satanic cults. The prosecution would later be charged with withholding vital evidence from the defense by not disclosing Johnson's strange allegations. It is not clear whether Randle's equally dubious theories were ever disclosed to the defense. But the fact that she was writing about a suspicious "dark skinned oriental" at the same time Johnson was imagining satanic cults indicates that something was in the air. Something was happening in the community. Johnson's statements in February were just one of many such claims, none of which ever amounted to anything.

The parent-investigators reinforced the sense that the CII view of the case was correct. These parents "confirmed" places, and they helped account for the fact that the formal investigation spread to Harry's Market, a Nautilus gym, several farms, and various churches and day-care centers. Parents also became a political force, lobbying on issues including a bill to allow children to testify by closed-circuit television. The most ardent of this group financed another effort to find tunnels under the school in 1990. Curiously, the most active parents did not actually have children in the case.[175] But they certainly had an effect on how the case was perceived. Some of these parents also formed an organization called Believe the Children, a support group for parents of children in day-care abuse cases; it also had the stated goal of addressing the "sexual and ritual exploitation of children." Believe the Children began in Manhattan Beach and was later run out of Chicago, the location of the Rogers Park case (discussed in Chapter Three). The organization had, at most, several hundred members and a very limited budget. Richard Beck recently cast such groups as right-wing, but nothing in their newsletters supports this claim.[176]

Therapists also exerted influence on parents and investigators by adding a professional stamp of approval to various claims, particularly the focus on satanic ritual abuse. They were not part of the criminal case, however, and their records would be subject to discovery only in civil litigation, which never came to pass; so they were largely hidden from view. But they were deeply involved. A small number of therapists accounted for all of the children at the preliminary hearing. One therapist, Cheryl Kent, was seeing nine of the fourteen children in the preliminary hearing.[177] Wade Green, who was discredited at the preliminary hearing after making increasingly implausible claims, had Michele Dugan as a therapist. According to Glenn Stevens, the prosecutor who quit his job during the case, these therapists used devil puppets in their therapy.[178] Stevens also noted that "most or all the children who made tunnel claims were going to the same therapist." Documents from the DA's office support this observation. Many of these therapists also met as a support group. Even though the need for support makes sense, it is likely to create a dangerous echo chamber of sorts if appropriate precautions are not taken. When various children described similar but implausible things, these therapists viewed it as proof of the widespread existence of their theory—rather than proof that their theory had taken hold of their view of the case. The therapists got so caught up in the satanic abuse theme that some of them persisted well into the 1990s with their conspiratorial theories.[179]

It should be noted, however, that the extremism was not limited to one side. There have been a number of dubious conspiracy-theory claims made by case critics as well. When there was a fire at the McMartin school site on April 8, 1984, the Eberles jumped to the conclusion that a roving band of crazed

McMartin local parents "torched" the school.[180] But, as reported in a local newspaper on May 26, the man arrested for the arson had no connection to the McMartin case.[181] Yet the implication that "McMartin parents" torched the preschool has become part of the urban folklore of the witch-hunt narrative. The arson is described in the same misleading way in the movie Indictment, which was promoted and praised on the basis of its alleged fidelity to the facts. Curiously, Abby Mann also had a suspicious fire at his own house. This was in 1993, when Indictment had just started filming. Mann rushed to judgment and blamed crazed McMartin parents. He later blamed the U.S. attorney, when the FBI concluded there was no link between the suspicious fire at his house and the parents in the McMartin case.[182]

Massive Media Coverage

"The gaze of the world is a fickle, intoxicating thing," Lisa Belkin wrote in 1999 about the effects of national media attention on a public-housing lawsuit in Yonkers, New York. When television cameras turned their attention to Yonkers, "they magnified and electrified events, changing the body language of the combatants and sharpening the tone of their words."[183] The media attention on Yonkers was nothing compared to what happened fifteen years earlier in the McMartin case. On February 2, 1984 the beginning of the rating sweeps week, the ABC television affiliate in Los Angeles aired the first in a series of "exclusive" stories about sexual abuse at the McMartin Preschool. The stories were long, detailed, and sensationalistic. The reporter, Wayne Satz, claimed that sixty children—basically the total number of children interviewed at CII since November 1, 1983—had been sexually abused at the McMartin Preschool and scared into silence through physical threats and the killing of small animals (rabbits, turtles).

These stories had the requisite number of qualifiers to protect the station against libel actions, but they nevertheless left the distinct impression that the allegations were true. And this is precisely how they were seen. The regular Channel 10 news anchors weighed in with dismay and editorial-like approval of the reporting.[184] The stories were "exclusives." Satz had some kind of "exclusive" access to someone (or more than one person) at CII. Because they were "exclusives," the rest of the media was reduced, at least initially, to the role of reporting on KABC's stories. It is not clear whether Satz was given access to the CII videotapes or whether he relied on sources at CII that described the children's interviews to him. Whatever the specific basis for these stories, they were definitely prepared with the knowledge and assistance of Kee MacFarlane.[185] Night after night, there were new stories at the beginning of the broadcast. In retrospect, what is most remarkable about the airing of these stories is that they were aired before the case was even sent to a grand jury. No one had yet been arrested.

KABC later placed full page advertisements touting their McMartin coverage under the headline "Sometimes Being the Only One With All the Serious News Makes Us Feel Lousy." "We feel lousy because the story is so awful," the ad continued. But, as the ad explained, the story "has to be told because it can be the catalyst to provoke public outrage demanding better protection of our children." It is no wonder the media was later accused of participating in a moral crusade. KABC basically took credit for launching a crusade.

The early media coverage, which appeared to document widespread sexual abuse at the McMartin Preschool, enraged parents who understandably felt that "nothing was being done" about a seemingly widespread problem. After all, by the time these stories aired, it had been almost four months since Assistant DA Jean Matusinka referred the case to CII, and the investigation had produced no arrests. The Satz stories fueled the idea that there was much more to the case than had been reported. After the first story was broadcast, the DA's chief investigator started receiving phone calls that reflected a new level of fear and paranoia. Investigator Brunetti's notes, dated 8:00 p.m. on February 2, contain a report of "a scary man at Magic Pizza."[186] The parents furnished a license plate number. The next day, Robert Currie was giving photos of possible additional suspects to the FBI. Within two weeks, numerous mothers were calling the DA's investigator to report all kinds of fantastic things. These stories were mutually reinforcing, and a view formed that it was the largest child sex-abuse case in history.

The intense media spotlight magnified the forces that rushed the case to the grand jury and resulted in such broad indictments. There were almost a dozen national news stories about the McMartin case in the month of March. Glenn Stevens later described it as a period of "intense pressure" at the DA's office. This is when some of the worst and most fateful decisions about the case were made—from what charges to present to the grand jury to how to handle the question of bail.

The period of most intense media coverage—the time from which almost all the egregious examples of media stories are taken—was surprisingly short for a case that lasted seven years. The months of February through May 1984 were by far the worst time in this regard, though the period is described as much longer in the witch-hunt narrative. Philip Jenkins has claimed there were "high-profile national stories throughout 1984." Curiously, he cites four media reports in support of the proposition: three from the first week in April 1984 and one from the third week in May.[187] In fact, coverage of the McMartin case dropped off significantly during the final six months of 1984. The national media had nothing to report again until January 1985, when the first child testified in the preliminary hearing. But there was intense coverage from February 2 through the end of May. Emotions were running high, and the media was in a frenzy. When Stevens went to the McMartin preschool to film the layout in early May, his notes indicate "Residents seem angry. Media arrives by helicopter."

That the period of media excess lasted months, not years, does not diminish the damage done in the critical period when the McMartin case was charged and bail decisions were made on the seven defendants, five of whom were initially held without bail. Two of those five were in the McMartin family; the other three (Betty Raidor, Babette Spitler, and Mary Ann Jackson) were unrelated teachers. The injustice to those teachers cannot be overstated.

In short, the media was a major culprit in the McMartin case. It might even seem like the primary culprit at first glance—but the stories could not have been done without cooperation from one or more people at CII. Moreover, the case would not have become a case without the decisions made by the Los Angeles DA. The complicity of CII in these stories is arguably more objectionable than the stories themselves because social workers at CII had a professional obligation to keep details of the investigation confidential.

David Shaw, media critic for the Los Angeles Times, won a Pulitzer Prize for criticizing his own newspaper's coverage of the McMartin case. Although his four-part series, which began the day after the original McMartin verdicts, was actually broader than that, Shaw laid considerable blame for the McMartin debacle at the media's credulous early acceptance of virtually everything said against the defendants. The argument has considerable force.

Prosecutorial Failures

The DA's actions in the case came after various other actors—particularly CII staff, a number of therapists, and the media—had wreaked havoc. Those forces created enormous pressure to bring a significant number of charges soon. Of course, this does not absolve the prosecutors of responsibility for their mistakes. Indeed, the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office bears primary responsibility for three of the worst mistakes in the McMartin case: failing to supervise the CII process, charging the case without adequately reviewing the evidence, and approaching the case in political, not professional prosecutorial, terms. Avoiding any of these mistakes might have resulted in a narrowly charged case that did not involve fantastic claims and include inappropriate defendants. Those mistakes were all much worse than what later became the rallying cry for criticisms of the prosecution: their failure to provide the defense with notes concerning Judy Johnson's February 1984 rantings.[188]

Neglecting to Supervise the CII Process

Although the DA's office invited CII to evaluate children in the McMartin case, there was no clear agreement in advance about the scope or purpose of the CII interviews. The interviewers did not see themselves, at least originally, as investigators; they were evaluating children and supplying information to the DA. But the interviews soon became investigative. The CII interviewers even showed the children "photo lineups" of possible suspects and places. Some, or possibly all, of those photos originated with the MBPD; it is not clear from available records what role was played by the DA's office. But either they facilitated a bad idea or they failed to see how the investigation was being compromised.

Overall, the LA District Attorney's Office paid scant attention while the process evolved at CII between November 1983 and early February 1984. They did not review interview tapes and they did not offer feedback, but rather relied almost entirely on reports from CII. Those reports were not informed by forensic considerations. The impressions of interviews, often reduced to shorthand notations in the video log, ended up playing far too large a role in shaping the case. How the children were interviewed became the focus of the defense in the case. This was a direct function of the DA's office allowing the process to move along for months without paying close attention, let alone offering a prosecutor's skepticism to evidence they would have to defend in court.

Charging the Case Without Reviewing the Evidence

The DA's office was caught unprepared when the media spotlight hit them on February 2, 1984, with a story that suggested there was widespread sexual abuse at the McMartin Preschool and the government was dragging its feet in response. The most active parents had already been busy for weeks "investigating" the case and organizing other parents. The early stages of organizing meant convincing other parents to have their children evaluated at CII. The success of the effort is demonstrated through the remarkable fact that CII never solicited anyone to come in for an evaluation but ultimately interviewed more than four hundred children. There were some referrals through the DA's office, but in December 1983 and January 1984 it appears the long waiting list that developed was generated almost entirely by parents being convinced by other parents to participate.

While that process was still in progress, the DA's office rushed the case to the grand jury. The CII investigation, or evaluation, was still very much in progress; in fact, they had interviewed only about half of the children they would ultimately evaluate.[189] Remarkably, the DA's office took the case to the grand jury in early March without having reviewed almost any the CII videotapes, which were supposedly the state's primary evidence. The DA's investigator had obtained statements from Kee MacFarlane about the content of the interviews, but they had not independently reviewed the evidence.[190] As MacFarlane told it, the videotapes documented children who were initially too scared to talk but who, through skilled questioning and the use of puppets, ultimately unburdened themselves of various "yucky secrets." But those videotapes ended up being most useful to the defense. The DA's office did not realize the problems posed by the tapes until well after they had charged the case. This is probably the most egregious error in the case because it did not involve a judgment call, or possibly a good-faith difference of opinion. It was pure shoddiness.

This dereliction of duty was compounded when prosecutors filed an additional two hundred counts against the defendants in May. Twenty-four children were added to the case. Investigative notes from the DA's office indicate they "processed" twenty-seven names at a two-hour meeting in May. This meant no more than an average of about five minutes to discuss an interview, the medical evidence, and the likely nature of parental cooperation for each child. This abbreviated "processing" was, at least for questions concerning the content of the children's allegations, based entirely on the videotape log notes and the recollections of the interviewers. There was no independent review of the actual interviews until after the charges were finalized. The new charges added the potential of prison sentences in the hundreds of years. Stevens later admitted it was "a huge rush" to announce those charges and the potential sentences.[191] Inventory logs indicate he had not yet reviewed any of the CII videotapes at the time.

The grand jury, which met for only a few days in March, became what lawyers sometimes call a runaway train. They indicted someone the district attorney did not ask them to indict: Virginia McMartin, the wheelchair-bound grandmother. All told, the grand jury indicted seven people: Ray Buckey; his sister, Peggy Ann; their mother, Peggy; their grandmother, Virginia; and three other teachers from the preschool, Babette Spitler, Mary Ann Jackson, and Betty Raidor. A review of the grand jury transcripts reveals a combination of relevant medical evidence on some children, and cursory but reinforcing testimony from eighteen children and some parents. Much of the testimony focuses on Ray and Peggy Buckey, but apparently the grand jury also brought charges against anyone else a child named. The prosecutors had decided that the would-be allegations against Virginia McMartin were not credible, or perhaps they simply shied away from the specter of charging a grandmother. But the grand jury saw no reason to draw distinctions between possible defendants and took a kind of all-or-nothing approach. Ironically, by accepting "all" of the claims, they helped to ensure that ultimately "none" would result in convictions.

Politics over Professionalism

Political factors were also apparently more important than professional ones when it came to key decisions in the Los Angeles County District Attorney's Office. Rushing the case to the grand jury in early March was undoubtedly a product of the media coverage and the attendant need for Robert Philibosian, the elected district attorney, to show he was "doing something." This was apparently more important than taking the considerable time it would have required to evaluate the case thoroughly before going to the grand jury. The DA also made a critical decision that has largely been lost to history: he brought in prosecutors with experience in handling "high-profile" cases, mostly murder cases. The new prosecutors added the two-hundred-plus charges in May. Beyond rushing the case to the grand jury, the DA, who was up for election in June 1984, blatantly used the case for publicity. He appeared at court hearings and frequently gave press conferences in the hallway. Philibosian's media strategy did not succeed; he lost the election to Ira Reiner.

The Brutal Preliminary Hearing

Although the actual trial did not begin until 1987, there is a good argument that the case was effectively over in January or February 1985. This is when the first two children testified at the preliminary hearing. It is also when it became apparent that the prosecution would not be able to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. Some of the children's testimony included incredible claims that had to create reasonable doubt (one boy testified that his teacher took him to a cemetery, where human bodies were exhumed and cut with knives to scare the children). It also became clear in the preliminary hearing that the CII interviews, on which the case largely rested, actually raised more questions than they answered.

The hearing lasted seventeen months and was the longest preliminary hearing in California history. There were several explanations for its taking so long. First, the parents of some children helped to delay the case in order to lobby the California legislature for adopting new provisions for children to testify by closed-circuit television. Second and more important, there were seven defendants, which meant every witness was subject to possible cross-examination by seven defense lawyers.

The most important developments in the case occurred during this pre-trial period. First, the number of complainants was winnowed from the original forty-one to fourteen who actually testified at the preliminary hearing. Second, the number of defendants was also brought down significantly. Although the preliminary hearing resulted in a technical victory for the prosecution—that is, all seven defendants were held over for trial—in perhaps the most dramatic single moment in the case, District Attorney Reiner dropped charges against five of the defendants shortly after the preliminary hearing ended. The story behind the dismissal of charges against most of the defendants is explained in the witch-hunt narrative; the winnowing of complainants is not.

The preliminary hearing is best remembered for the fantastic claims made by several children. The second boy on the stand said he had been forced to drink rabbit's blood. He made the statement during his fourteenth day on the stand.[192] Another boy testified he had watched as McMartin teachers dug up corpses and mutilated them to scare the children. As prosecutor Stevens put it, "the kids are falling apart."[193] A contributing reason was that the preliminary hearing was brutal; the children who testified at the hearing were savaged by the process of cross-examination. The second boy was on the stand for seventeen days, sixteen of them in being cross-examined. "Trial by ordeal" is how John Jackson described the process in the Torrance (California) Daily Breeze.[194] In another story about how the children were experiencing "a legal battering," People magazine focused on a thirty-two-minute span during which defense attorney Danny Davis used the word kill twenty-four times while questioning a young girl.[195] The prosecution pleaded without success for the judge to constrain cross-examination. Some parents withdrew their children from the case because they saw what happened to the first few children in the preliminary hearing. Others refused to go forward without being able to have their children testify by closed-circuit television. Their concerns were not exaggerated. Even after defecting from the DA's office, Stevens described what happened to the children as "inhumane" and how Danny Davis acted as "monstrous."[196] This aspect of the case is not included in the witch-hunt narrative.

Remarkably, there was no real strategy to presenting the children's testimony at the preliminary hearing. "The press kept asking why [Walter Gorman] was first in the preliminary hearing," Stevens later told Abby Mann. The boy did not do particularly well as a witness, and the press assumed that the prosecution would open with its strongest witness. It did not. "He was the only kid there that was ready," Stevens later explained.[197] Why the prosecution was not prepared with its witnesses, let alone how they neglected to consider the order of the evidence they presented, remains unclear.

The damage done by those errors is clearer. One can easily see why so many people think that most of the children in the McMartin case made claims about satanic practices and tunnels—things that were inadvertently highlighted in the preliminary hearing. There was no strategic effort to select children whose interviews would be the least susceptible to attack: the earliest and the most spontaneous. Indeed, the earliest interviews were underrepresented at all stages of the case. The thirty-four children interviewed at CII during the first two months accounted for only four of the forty-one criminal complaints in the McMartin case, and only one of these four children made it to trial. On the other hand, more than 70 percent of the forty-one complainants were interviewed after Wayne Satz broke the story on television in early February 1984. The significance of these facts was not appreciated at the time.

The preliminary hearing was a ferocious attack on many adults as well. Parents reported various intimidating tactics by the defense, which was admonished for the investigators they hired.[198] One parent, whose daughter reportedly touched Ray's genitals in the spring of 1983, testified he felt as though he were being put on trial.[199] Similarly, the defense put MacFarlane and the rest of the CII staff on trial. They inquired into whether she had been sexually abused as a child and into the details of her relationship with Satz, the reporter who broke the case. There were long sidebars about the appropriateness of these excursions into issues of admittedly remote relevance. Judge Bobb was generally ineffective in containing these detours.

After the judge ruled that none of the remaining complainants could testify by closed-circuit television, the state rested its case. Fourteen children had testified; none of the remaining children was called. Given what was described as "a mass defection of witnesses," it is not clear how many of those children would have participated if allowed to testify by closed-circuit television. The lowest estimate I have found is six; the remainder presumably dropped out of the case for other reasons. Whatever the number, the judge was required to dismiss all of the charges related to these children.

The decision to drop charges against five of the seven defendants stood in sharp contrast to the implications of holding them over for trial. Judge Bobb's decision to hold them over meant she found probable cause to think the defendants were all guilty; Reiner's decision to drop the charges meant he did not think there was sufficient evidence to prove the allegations. Calling the evidence against the five defendants "incredibly flimsy," Reiner dismissed all of the charges against them. This decision was not a reaction to the judge so much as the end result of the internal discontent on the part of Glenn Stevens. In the six months since claiming that "the kids are falling apart," he had second thoughts about the evidence. His expression of those misgivings, offered within the confines of the DA's office, resulted in a dramatic story in a local newspaper. "McMartin Quandary," the Daily Breeze announced in an exclusive headline on September 25, 1985. The story reported that one of the McMartin prosecutors was having second thoughts about some (possibly most) of the charges. The DA called for "a candid and complete" evaluation of the evidence.[200] It resulted in a confidential memorandum written in December in which Stevens detailed two conclusions: (1) he did not find the evidence against the female defendants to be credible enough to justify charges, and (2) he still thought there was sufficient evidence to convict Ray Buckey. Stevens resigned in early 1986 and, as his collaboration with Mann deepened, he slowly changed his mind about Ray Buckey.[201] The beginning of the trial was a year away, but the dismissal of so many charges caused Newsweek to report in January 1986 "A Child-Abuse Case Implodes."[202]

The Trial and Retrial

The prosecution went forward to trial with eleven of the fourteen children who were involved in the preliminary hearing. The trial was preceded by a highly publicized motion to dismiss, based largely on the tape recordings of conversations between former prosecutor Stevens and screenwriter Mann and his wife and coauthor, Myra. The tapes, which were supposedly made confidentially, were interviews of Stevens by the Manns. Stevens had already signed a secret agreement to sell his story to the Manns and share in the profits of any book or movie.[203] The Manns ultimately turned the tapes over to the defense.[204] They were publicized largely for the obvious and highly unusual story line, involving a prosecutor who switched sides in the middle of a case. The Manns made it clear to Stevens that he would be the hero in their movie, and this is how he was ultimately portrayed. But the hearing revolving around his conversations with the Manns was embarrassing to Stevens in several ways. First, it demonstrated his raw ambition as a prosecutor; he described "what a rush" it had been to charge the original defendants with enough counts to translate into hundreds of years in potential sentences. He also described the McMartin case as "just a career stepping stone."[205] Further, the hearings revealed that Stevens still thought Ray Buckey was guilty when he participated in a toast with the Manns to the acquittal of all defendants.[206] Before leaving the district attorney's office, Stevens wrote a confidential 113-page memo to Gil Garcetti, chief deputy DA, dated January 10, 1986, analyzing the evidence in the case and detailing the problems with how it was investigated. He rejected various claims (among them the idea that children were taken from the preschool to other locations) as "totally unbelievable," but not the entire case. His bottom line was clear: "It is my opinion that Raymond Buckey did in fact molest some of the children at the school."[207] Stevens later allowed that he anticipated receiving "substantial additional sums of money" from the movie, although he had made it clear to the Manns he "can't be made to look like I have any pecuniary interest in the outcome of the case."[208] Although the hearings deflated the value of the much-hyped Mann-Stevens tapes, they did not move the judge. After a three-month hearing, Judge Pounders ruled that the case should, at long last, go to trial.

The trial took two years. The main component was the child witnesses, but an extraordinary amount of time was also spent on medical testimony and on the testimony of social workers and psychologists. There were even several days devoted to battling veterinary testimony, concerning animal bones found in the ground at the preschool. Many of these arguments had been aired at the preliminary hearing. A new claim by the defense, one that would become a mainstay in the witch-hunt narrative, was that many of the charges against Ray Buckey could not have occurred because he was not working at the preschool at the time.

These arguments were popularized by Mary Fischer in a story in LA Magazine that included a chart entitled "Where Was Ray?" The chart detailed the attendance periods for eleven children in the trial, arrayed along a timeline conveying that Ray Buckey was "at McMartin Preschool" from 1981 through summer 1983, with the first six months of 1981 designated as "A.M. only."[209] By this reckoning, three of the children at trial attended the preschool before Ray was ever there. The claim grew slightly in the movie Indictment; actor James Woods, who starred in the movie, claimed, with characteristic indignity, that Ray Buckey was charged with crimes against "four kids who never met him." The LA Magazine article has since become a foundational article in the witch-hunt narrative.[210]

This claim was undermined at trial, where prosecutors introduced extensive evidence that placed Ray at the preschool before 1981. The evidence included visual aids for the jury that contradicted the chart in LA Magazine, backed up by pay stubs, entries in Virginia's journal, photographs, and testimony by parents corroborating the fact that Ray Buckey was at the preschool before 1981. He just was not there full-time before 1981, but he was there doing odd jobs, hanging around, and working as an aide in a class with children who, according to the witch-hunt narrative, had never met him. Several parents who were never part of the criminal proceedings, and who told the MBPD they had no information about sexual abuse at the preschool, verified that Ray was at the preschool in 1980 and earlier.[211] A former college student testified that, as part of a class at El Camino College in the fall semester of 1980, she observed at the McMartin Preschool. This was more than a year before the LA Magazine chart places Ray "at" the school, but the ex-student testified she saw him there on many occasions between September and December (1980) "observing and helping out."[212]

There was also extensive evidence concerning his character and behavior. Was there any reason to think he might be the kind of person to sexually abuse children? This is inevitably an important question for the jury in any child molestation case. Had there been any complaints or concerns about Ray Buckey? The question is particularly relevant in cases with multiple complainants. In this case, the answer to both questions was yes, but you would never know it from the witch-hunt narrative. Nathan and Snedeker assert that "when [Ray] took a job at his family's preschool, the move was hailed as evidence that Ray was finally figuring out what to do with himself."[213] It is not clear from this oblique assertion to whom this was hailed as such evidence, or why they needed it.[214] But there was evidence introduced in the trial to contradict that view. There had been concerns raised about Ray Buckey's behavior around children, both by his family and by others. Darlene Gregg testified that Betty Raidor, a teacher at the school, registered "concern" about Ray. One of his friends told the police that Ray was abusing alcohol at the time, and possibly much stronger drugs.[215]

Neighbors remember him throwing violent temper tantrums outside, screaming and crying "I hate my life." There was also an entry in Virginia McMartin's preschool-related dairy about Ray having "troubles" in April 1981.[216] In short, the record is replete with evidence that supports the conclusion, included in one case study written about the McMartin case, that Ray Buckey was "a strange and troubled individual, who, even if not a child molester, had no business being entrusted with the care of young children."[217]

More significantly, there had been prior complaints about Ray Buckey—specifically about inappropriate exposure of his genitals in various situations. Several neighbors told police that he masturbated in his bedroom in plain view of the neighbors, declining to pull down shades or turn off lights.[218] Donna Ennis, a mother otherwise unconnected to the case, testified she scolded Ray in 1981 for not keeping his genitials covered during pre-match exercises with eleven- and twelve-year-old girls on a soccer team he helped coach.[219] Donald Spitler, husband of McMartin teacher Babette Spitler, was the main coach. Ennis testified she told Buckey "he ought not to be on a girls' soccer team if he was not going to wear underwear" and she complained directly to Donald Spitler, who apparently made sure Buckey wore sweat pants at future events.[220] Brett Weisberg, who worked briefly as a teacher's aide at the McMartin preschool, testified that Ray would sit so as to expose his genitals and frequently had a child on his lap.[221] There was even a notation in Virginia McMartin's diary in the spring of 1983, months before the case broke, about an incident involving a child touching Ray's penis. (McMartin later blamed the girl's father and spoke of the incident as if Ray played no role whatsoever.[222] The girl's father, incidentally, had picked her up one day from the preschool and found Ray "in the middle of the playground," with children around, "exposed and not wearing underwear."[223])

Testimony from two loyalist parents who stuck with the McMartins long after the letter from the MBPD revealed a bizarre response from Peggy Buckey to the charges against her son. According to Ellen Chapman, Peggy Buckey told her:

> . . . she would—she had been molested as a child herself, that she would be aware of anything like this going on. That she would always continually watch Ray when the children were sitting on his lap or hanging on his neck, um, that if he ever had a hard-on, that she would have noticed it.[224]

Trisha Walters's mother had a similar story. She once saw Ray with kids on his lap reading Playboy magazine. Peggy, apparently not the least surprised, told the mother she "would take care of it." Mrs. Buckey later testified she did not think Ray's behavior was a problem:

> Q: What would you say about a teacher of children that age who would be reading Playboy magazine while students are in the classroom?
> A: I believe it's a very popular magazine, so I really wouldn't have much to say about it.

She was also asked whether she would be upset if children could see the genitals of a teacher. Making a reference to "modern bathing suits," Mrs. Buckey responded: "I don't know how the poor little kids could help but see everything there is to see if they go to the beach."[225]

The proceedings involved excruciatingly detailed testimony on the smallest points. As the trial dragged on, press coverage became more episodic. The overall question, as most people saw it, was simply whether the jury would believe the children. But the jury was being asked a much more specific question that involved the exacting burden of proof in any criminal case: whether the state had proven the defendant guilty of specific charges beyond a reasonable doubt. By 1989, when the case had dragged on for years and children had made so many dubious statements it was impossible to know what to believe, the only drama for assorted observers of the trial was whether the jury would reject all the charges, or end in a mistrial because they could not agree. Those seemed like the most likely outcomes.

What actually happened is a combination of the two. The jury rejected fifty-two of the charges, voting unanimously to acquit Ray and Peggy Buckey of a host of child molestation charges. The jury could not reach a unanimous verdict on twelve child molestation charges involving Ray Buckey and one conspiracy charge involving his mother.[226] Judge Pounders dismissed the conspiracy charge, ending all charges against Peggy Buckey. The results involving Ray Buckey were less clear, especially given the number of charges on which the jury could not agree. At a press conference shortly after the verdict was announced, seven jurors made it clear they thought that children had been sexually abused.[227] They just were not certain enough about the details to convict on a "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof.[228] "I never voted innocent; I voted not guilty," said juror Sally Cordova. Asked directly whether she was convinced Ray Buckey was not guilty, Cordova responded: "I am not."[229] Juror Julie Peters said "the verdicts should not be considered a victory for the defense." Several jurors also made it clear they had doubts about the case largely because of the CII tapes, which "did not help me. They gave me a lot of reasonable doubt," Peters said. This is what makes the case a tragedy. Despite the best intentions of the interviewers, their efforts actually made the case unwinnable and gave the witch-hunt narrative its signature song.

The verdict was received with shock and outrage by some parents of children in the case, and some parents of children who were never in the case. But there is little evidence that this view captured public opinion at large. There were commentaries on whether courts were sufficiently child-centered, or put differently, whether they were too adult-centered to be fair to children. Outspoken parents who thought Ray Buckey—and maybe even Peggy Buckey and others—should have been convicted were quoted extensively on television in the days after the verdict arguing for a retrial. There were also voices in favor of dropping the remaining charges. An editorial in the Washington Post praised the jury.[230] The DA decided to retry Ray Buckey, assigning new prosecutors to the case. There was an abbreviated trial held in the spring and early summer of 1990, where the lead prosecutor misstated some basic facts in his opening statement, raising questions about whether the DA's office was dedicated to the retrial. In what seemed a fitting conclusion at the time, the jury ultimately deadlocked on all eight charges, although the extent of the split varied significantly by charge. (The strongest vote for the prosecution was 8-4 on one charge involving the first girl; the strongest vote for the defense was 11-1 against conviction on all three charges involving the third girl.) "I don't know that you can get 12 people together to agree on this case," said juror Lloyd, who voted for conviction on the one charge that he concluded was "spontaneously disclosed."[231] Everyone agreed there should not be a third trial. Within hours, the Los Angeles County District Attorney's Office announced it was dropping all remaining charges against Ray Buckey. Seven years of proceedings, $15 million in public expenditures—most of which funded the defense—resulted in not a single conviction.

Conclusions

The McMartin case was doubly unjust. First, it was unjust to the defendants who were charged without sufficient evidence or adequate investigation. Several defendants were held without bail, some for an extended period of time. Babette Spitler had her children taken away for a while, and Peggy Ann Buckey, Ray's sister, lost her teaching credential. (It was later reinstated.[232]) There was an unfathomable personal and financial toll to these people, who were falsely accused in an environment where they were publicly castigated before they were even charged with anything. For most of the defendants, the case was a monumental injustice.

But the case was also unjust to children. Some were brutalized by the judicial process, particularly in the preliminary hearing. Although that was widely recognized when it occurred in 1985, it was long since forgotten by the end of the McMartin case in January 1990. There were also children who had been sexually abused but who never received justice and instead have been demeaned by the witch-hunt narrative's assertion that the entire case was a "hoax."

The McMartin case began as a morality play about the failure to protect children. It ended as a morality play about the failure to protect civil liberties. The final step in the evolution of how the case has come to be remembered was the complete negation of the evidence of abuse elaborated in this chapter. This development marked the triumph of the witch-hunt narrative. It also marked a change in attitude about the case from one of complexity and confusion—which characterized the case in its later stages—to one of moral clarity. In this regard, the case came full circle.

It is ironic that those who saw the inappropriateness of the original moral framework were not more suspicious of the stark opposite view. Not surprisingly, both caricatures are inadequate representations of the complicated underlying facts. This chapter ends, then, with the puzzle posed by the juxtaposition of the considerable evidence of guilt in the case with the rise of a witch-hunt narrative that denies all of the evidence. Just as one must ask how supporters of the prosecution were able to ignore the seemingly obvious problems with the case, it is important to ask how case critics have been able to minimize or deny all of the evidence of guilt.

The most obvious reason the witch-hunt narrative has become dominant is that it is by far the larger of the two opposing stories. Five or six defendants[233] were charged with heinous crimes they did not commit, and dozens of others were cast under a cloud of suspicion for the flimsiest of reasons while the Sheriff's Ritual Abuse Task Force followed dozens of "leads." If there has to be one simple storyline for the McMartin case, the witch-hunt narrative fits much better than the alternative. The alternative—focusing on the evidence of abuse and the travails of the children—is undoubtedly the smaller story. But it is an important story, nonetheless.

Why haven't both stories been maintained, side by side, for history? The McMartin case was, after all, a dual tragedy. It was tragic for the defendants who should not have been charged, and it was tragic for the children who were mistreated and those who were never appropriately vindicated. But only one of those tragedies has been remembered over time. The most general explanation is that dual tragedies are cognitively and politically difficult to acknowledge. It is difficult to worry about defendants who should not have been charged and about children who were never vindicated, particularly since measures to remedy one problem might be seen as exacerbating the other one. The first problem seems to cry out for more skepticism about children's testimony, while the second cries out for taking children more seriously. Political interests have organized around these problems, as well. The members of VOCAL (Victims of Children Abuse Laws) are not concerned about children's testimony being summarily dismissed; they are worried about it being accepted too readily. Conversely, members of Believe the Children never evinced any concern about accusations or charges that had no merit; they were focused entirely on the social forces that would minimize or deny the extent of child sexual abuse. As perplexing and challenging as these dual tragedies are, they are not impossible to comprehend together. Indeed, most writing about the case during its final stages conveyed this sense of complexity.

A more specific explanation about why this did not continue is that there has been a crusade to promote the witch-hunt narrative. The view that the case was complicated and conflicting has been lost to history by design, not by accident. A narrative without ambiguity is far more compelling—in court, in print, and in the movies—than a narrative that acknowledges injustice on both sides. The moving forces in promoting the witch-hunt narrative include journalists, defense lawyers, and defense-oriented expert witnesses. What is remarkable is that these actors seem to mirror, in fervor and tactics, the very things they claim to abhor. Instead of disregarding evidence that might point away from guilt, they disregard evidence that points toward it. Instead of automatically believing any child accusation, they seem to automatically believe the denial of any adult. Instead of assuming all of the medical evidence presented by the prosecution must be true, they take the position that it should all be rejected. In this way, the McMartin case provided the foundation for a witch-hunt narrative that would eventually extend well beyond the case.

Scrutinizing the Evidence of a National Witch-Hunt

The witch-hunt narrative is a national claim. It is a claim about social trends, the central one being that there were scores of cases just like the McMartin case. In 1987, Debbie Nathan used the phrase "junior McMartins" to describe what she called "a nationwide rash of similar cases."[1] It has since become widely accepted that there were at least one hundred such cases between 1984 and about 1990.[2] They are sometimes referred to as "the day-care sexual abuse cases of the 1980s" and have also been referred to as the "ritual abuse cases of the 1980s," or even the "Satanic ritual abuse cases of the 1980s," although those definitions include cases well beyond the day-care setting. Social psychologist Mary de Young combined most of those labels (and more) into a single book title: The Day Care Ritual Abuse Moral Panic. The book repeats the claim that "a hundred or more day care centers and preschools around the country" were investigated for "ritual abuse" during the 1980s.[3] The prominent academic psychologists Stephen Ceci and Maggie Bruck concur in an article that refers to "the McMartin case and hundreds of others like it."[4] Carol Hopkins, who founded something called the Justice Committee, has claimed there were one thousand false convictions during this era.[5] Paul Craig Roberts, a syndicated columnist for the Washington Times, made an even stronger claim, asserting that there were two thousand such cases.[6] Although claims about the overall number of cases vary, there seems to be almost universal agreement that these cases stemmed from the McMartin case and that there were more than a hundred of them.

This chapter scrutinizes the best evidence that has been put forth for those claims. There are two particularly important lists of case names in the witch-hunt narrative: (1) a list of thirty-six cases from an investigative series in a Memphis, Tennessee, newspaper in 1988; and (2) a list of fifty-four names (representing twenty cases not contained on the first list) in Debbie Nathan's 1995 book with defense lawyer Michael Snedeker called Satan's Silence: Ritual Abuse and the Making of an American Witch Hunt.[7] These lists carry the authoritative weight that comes with details such as a full name and accompanying place name. Even though these lists, in the aggregate, do not come close to supporting the claims about hundreds of these cases, they nevertheless constitute an impressive accumulation of case names. However, an intensive examination of these lists reveals they are not well researched; nor, more importantly, do they provide strong support for the witch-hunt claim. The lists are wrong in many instances and are dubious in others, and although they are occasionally largely correct, it is not often enough to support the claim of a national trend. There were, indeed, some frighteningly mismanaged cases during this time, and some charges were brought without sufficient justification. But a few lightning strikes do not create a national lightning epidemic.

Charlier and Downing's List of Thirty-six Cases

Two reporters for a Tennessee newspaper were the first to make an extended argument that there was a national pattern of witch-hunts following the McMartin case.[8] In "Justice Abused: A 1980's Witch-Hunt," a six-part series published in the Commercial Appeal in January 1988, Tom Charlier and Shirley Downing purported to identify thirty-six cases around the country that demonstrate this phenomenon. The article had a national map plotting the cases, a full page with abstracts of them, and other graphs and text that seemed to make a convincing argument that investigations across the country had found little or no evidence of sexual abuse but had resulted in a significant number of false accusations or convictions.

The series has become one of the foundational works in the witch-hunt narrative. It has been referred to as "the most comprehensive" source on the day-care sexual abuse cases of the 1980s.[9] Ellen Willis, Nathan's editor at the Village Voice, called it "a fine investigative series."[10] A journal published by defense psychologist Ralph Underwager claimed, incorrectly, that the series won a Pulitzer Prize.[11] Law reviews, academic journal articles, and various books have subsequently relied on this list as authoritative.[12] One book even reproduced the summaries of Charlier and Downing's thirty-six cases as a long appendix[13]; this single source accounts for more than a dozen footnotes in the chapter of Nathan and Snedeker's book which also argues that these cases constitute a national trend. None of the sources just mentioned have expressed any doubt about the quality or accuracy of the reporting. To the contrary, the series has been held up as the "most in-depth treatment of these cases."[14]

These uncritical endorsements notwithstanding, a close examination of the cases covered in this series reveals that this list is deeply flawed. Some problems are apparent simply by examining the article on its face.[15] Charlier and Downing's claim that the thirty-six cases prove a nationwide trend over four years is contradicted by the actual distribution of these cases over time. Thirty-one of the cases are dated by the authors as beginning in a twenty-six-month period between August 1983 and September 1985; there are only three cases for the twenty-seven remaining months covered by the article (see Figure 3.1). But without a graphic representation of the distribution over time, it is not clear to most readers that almost all of the evidence Charlier and Downing offer to prove an alleged four-year trend is from the first two years.

Charlier and Downing's list also appears to be padded through the inclusion of cases that never involved an arrest, let alone prosecution. What kind of witch-hunt or "justice denied" results in no charges whatsoever? Sixteen of the cases never got to the stage of a trial; charges were dropped in some cases and they were never brought in others. One-third of the cases resulted in a conviction, seemingly undercutting the claim of "justice abused." Table 3.1 lists the cases by place name, as they are identified by Charlier and Downing. Notably, only a handful of the cases involved charges "taking place on a large scale," something the article claimed was a feature of these cases. In explaining the series, the authors said that a "pattern emerged . . . most cases evolved from a single incident involving one child, but investigations often triggered runaway inquiries that fed on publicity and parents' worst fears." But many of the thirty-six cases involved a single alleged perpetrator, some involved two, and it is impossible to ascertain the number in several. Only four cases clearly involved a large number of alleged perpetrators: the Manhattan Beach case (McMartin); the Kern County cases; the Jordan, Minnesota, cases; and the Memphis case (Georgian Hills). The vast majority of the thirty-six cases in this series do not fit the pattern. Many also do not fit another theme that is repeated throughout the series: day-care abuse. At least ten—almost a third of their evidence—have nothing to do with day-care centers.

The most significant problems, however, are apparent only after doing research. One problem that becomes clear on researching secondary sources is what I call satanic exaggeration. As it turns out, fewer than one-quarter of the thirty-six cases actually fit the primary theme of the series, which combined the idea of witch-hunts over child sexual abuse with claims of ritualistic or satanic overtones. Some of the cases Charlier and Downing discuss had nothing to do with satanic or ritualistic abuse.[16] Moreover, several that did involve such elements were clearly based in reality. The Richmond, Virginia, "case" is described as follows:

> Two children believed to have been sexually abused by family members began telling of rituals they allegedly took part in a year earlier. They said they had been forced to witness the slaying of a child, a friend of > theirs whose decomposed body had been discovered in the woods. . . . The police found burn rings—similar to those left by candles—on the floor of the apartment where the acts were said to have occurred. But the police couldn't tell whether the children were telling the truth or fantasizing. No charges have been filed in the girl's slaying.[17]

The authors never explain why this case was included in their "Justice Abused" series. A dead body was found, the children "were believed to have been sexually abused," and nobody was charged. The injustice appears to have been to the victims. Similarly, the Atherton, California, "case" allegedly involved wild allegations made by a girl after a dead cat was found in her locker at school. The authors do not contest the fact that the case involved something that would merit investigation—a dead cat in a locker. Moreover, they do not explain why a case in which the district attorney considered the evidence insufficient to prosecute anyone would merit inclusion in a series about "justice abused."

A third "case" that fails after basic research of secondary sources is Spencer Township, which the authors incorrectly list as June 1984. (The events occurred in June 1985.) This is Charlier and Downing's entire description:

> Sheriff James Telb and his deputies dug up a swamp in a wooded area, searching for the graves of 50 to 60 people allegedly slain in satanic rites. Despite days of digging, no bodies were found. There were no arrests.[18]

What the authors neglect to acknowledge is that the search was prompted by a confirmed kidnapping case. The search was conducted near a home that had reportedly been abandoned by LeRoy Freeman, who was wanted in the abduction of his seven-year-old granddaughter, Clara Freeman.[19] The girl had been missing for two years and was last seen when he took her on his first court-ordered visitation. "We never said we had cult killings," Sheriff Telb explained when the swamp was searched. "We have a missing child and an awful lot of informants saying this is a burial ground."[20] The authorities also had apparent evidence of cultlike activity of some sort.[21] While playing up the satanic allegations and ignoring the facts that prompted the dig, Charlier and Downing never mentioned what was uncovered in the swamp: "a headless doll with nails driven through its feet and a pentagram attached to its arm, a nine-foot wooden cross with ligatures attached" along with hatchets and knives, and an anatomy dissection book.[22] In October 1988, the missing girl was located in Huntington Beach, California. Freeman pleaded guilty to child stealing two months later.[23]

The claim that all thirty-six cases are bound together by satanic or ritualistic allegations is summarized in a dramatic table labeled Similar Tales. The text at the top reads "Some details occurred over and over in children's statements about alleged abuse," and the table itself lists several dozen "elements" of such cases, with numerous place names or defendants' names listed after each element.[24] For example, one entry in the table reads "Children taken to mortuary: McMartin, Grenada, Torrance, Rolling Hills Estates, Bakersfield." The table creates a powerful impression. "Perhaps the most striking feature of these allegations," law professor Denis Brion would later write, relying entirely on this table, "was the fact that the details of these bizarre activities were altogether similar despite the wide geographic dispersion of these episodes."[25]

But a close examination of the table reveals several problems. First, the "elements" used to weave these cases together are extremely overinclusive. Some are not remotely satanic or ritualistic. A case could be tagged as having "ritualistic" elements for something as common as "activities in the basement" or "Barbie dolls." It apparently made no difference to Charlier and Downing that the day-care operation in the White Plains case, for example, was in the basement of Jeanette Martin's house. Similarly, the authors do not explain what is unusual, let alone ritualistic, about children reporting Barbie dolls at a day-care center. Other elements in this table reflected aspects widely known to be involved in the most ordinary child sexual abuse cases. The Bronx case, for example, is noted for only one so-called element, allegations involving oral sex. That is a common type of sexual abuse, and certainly not a marker of anything ritualistic. Similarly, there is nothing ritualistic, or even all that unusual, about "Activities during naptime or trips to rest room"—but seven cases in the table are linked by this feature. A case could be labeled as having ritualistic features if a child claimed to have been pinched or physically abused in any way.

Some of the seemingly least-plausible features in Charlier and Downing's account are employed in a misleading manner. The Richmond case, for example, is listed for one element: "stabbed, or murdered babies or children." But by Charlier and Downing's own account, this case revolved around the discovery of a girl's dead body. So this was not a wild, uncorroborated tale. Other elements were apparently constructed with satanic exaggeration in mind. "Animal sacrifice," for example, clearly suggests something ritualistic, but cases were tagged with this purported element whether or not there were allegations of "sacrifice." There was evidence in the Craig case, for example, that the children saw and maybe even handled a dead rabbit, but nobody described it in terms of sacrifice.

What is most striking about this table is apparently overlooked by the many writers and scholars who have since cited it without skepticism: even by Charlier and Downing's inflated accounting, many of the thirty-six cases involve only one or two of these elements—and many more apparently didn't involve any. Eleven of the cases included in this table have only one or two of the forty-one listed "elements." In short, a handful of the thirty-six cases account for the vast majority of the entries—and several of those cases are never discussed in the article. [26]

But this has not prevented writers and scholars from exaggerating the claims in this article. In a stunning example of satanic exaggeration, Michael Phillips, referring to Charlier and Downing as the "most comprehensive source" on the matter, claimed that "nearly all of the cases they investigated alleged Satanism and pornography."[27] In fact, by Charlier and Downing's account, eight of the original thirty-six cases involved allegations of child pornography—and at least one of those cases never had any claims remotely related to Satanism. In other words, seven cases have been exaggerated into a claim that is five times larger than what the article actually supports. This is without examining the extent to which Charlier and Downing overlooked evidence of guilt in those cases.

Although the series has become famous for the list of thirty-six cases, the actual coverage of those cases varied from extensive to negligible. Three cases received extensive treatment in the series: the McMartin case (Manhattan beach); the Jordan, Minnesota cases; and the Georgian Hills case (Memphis). Eight others are "profiled" in the series, each receiving a few hundred words of coverage (see Table 3.2). The remaining twenty-five received very little coverage. Many are mentioned only in short abstracts that fill one full page in the series. For those cases, it is difficult to ascertain much about the underlying facts or the specific nature of Charlier and Downing's concern. The plan for this book evolved into an effort to research all thirty-six cases. Almost fifteen years of effort produced extensive information on most of these cases, but not all. Some of the research was still in progress when this book went to press, and a few cases proved impossible to crack. One of the eleven cases highlighted in the series—those from Jordan, Minnesota—will be the subject of a separate publication. Extensive research into the Jordan cases reveals substantial evidence of abuse alongside strong evidence that there were unjustified charges.

What is most striking about the highlighted cases is how many involved significant evidence of abuse. There are two clear exceptions; notably, neither one occurred in a day-care setting, although that is the stated theme of the article at times. One was in Cincinnati, involving the Isaac Wise Temple summer camp. It ended in acquittals, so there is no official transcript of the proceedings. But local newspaper coverage of the trial indicates the charges in this case were highly suspect and should never have been brought.[28] The other case that clearly did not involve any plausible evidence of abuse is from Sacramento, where charges were dropped after it became clear to Municipal Court Judge Ronald Robie that the children had been told by their grandmother to make baseless charges.[29] No other case in the series is similar. Beyond these, however, there was credible evidence of abuse in all of the other highlighted cases that I have analyzed. As explained in the previous chapter, the evidence was restricted to one defendant in the McMartin case. Indeed, as indicated in Table 3.2 and elaborated in this chapter, several of these cases involved credible evidence of abuse and they involved unjustified charges. The "justice abused" in those cases had two dimensions, but only one of those problems was acknowledged by Charlier and Downing.

At least three of the highlighted cases did not involve any unjustified charges. There was a solid basis for charging the defendants in the cases from Chicago, Clarksville, and Sequim, Washington. Nobody was ever charged with a crime in the Fort Bragg case, where the license revocation proceedings for the Jubilation Day Care Center stemmed from proven claims of sexual abuse by the owner's niece.[30] Beyond the cases already mentioned, there were two others that involved some unjustified charges: Memphis and Bakersfield (Kern County). But as explained below, both of those cases (or groups of cases, in the Kern County instance) also involved credible evidence of abuse.

Six of the ten cases in Table 3.2 are discussed in this chapter: Memphis, Jordan, Chicago, Clarksville, Sequim, and Bakersfield. (The McMartin case, of course, has already been discussed.) All six involved more evidence of abuse than has ever been recognized in the witch-hunt narrative. Three additional cases from the list of thirty-six that also involved substantial evidence of abuse are discussed in this section as well: West Point, New York; Niles, Michigan; and White Plains, New York.

BALLARD

Location	Memphis, TN
Institution	Georgian Hills
Date	1984
Lead Def.	Frances Ballard

The Georgian Hills Early Childhood Center case began on May 31, 1984, just as the charges in McMartin were being finalized. A four-year-old girl told her mother that her vagina hurt; she quickly volunteered that Frances Ballard had put her fingers in it. Ballard was a fifty-five-year-old woman who had never worked outside the home until taking a job at Georgian Hills in 1983. The center was run by the Georgian Hills Baptist Church and had about 120 students. Ballard, who had cared for children in her home for years without incident, was a devout Baptist and, according to multiple sources, a "stern" preschool teacher. She was the last person one might suspect of being a child molester. But there was medical evidence that appeared to support the sexual abuse claim; according to her family physician, the little girl's hymen was torn.

After an initial investigation that involved about a dozen children, Frances Ballard was arrested on June 12, 1984, and charged with four counts of sexual abuse involving four children, among them the original girl. The investigation continued, and there was a bureaucratic struggle between the child protective service agency and law enforcement over the ownership and administration of the investigation. Law enforcement took charge, and in a few months there were far more complainants, and eventually more defendants. In October, Ballard was charged with thirty-eight additional counts of sexual abuse involving nineteen children. The following month, the investigation spread to the Daybridge Learning Center, where children had been sent from Georgian Hills. After suspicions were raised there, fifteen staff members were suspended and then fired in a move that, in retrospect, seems like a clear indication of a case run amok. Six months later, three more defendants were indicted for sexual abuse related to the charges in the Ballard case: Betty Stimson, the Georgian Hills director; her son Jeff; and Rev. Paul Shell, pastor of the Georgian Hills Baptist Church. These charges were brought almost exactly a year after the investigation began. Why did the investigation last so long? If Betty Stimson was involved in events at the same time and place as Frances Ballard, why did it take a year of interviews to find out? Those questions were not being asked in 1985.

The criminal trials did not reveal much about the larger investigation, but there is an important document uncovered in a subsequent civil suit: a letter from local investigators to Special Agent Kenneth Lanning of the FBI, providing a confidential "synopsis of the case and the problems encountered" in early February 1985, several months before the additional adults were charged. That letter indicated children had "required a lot more leading than would be desirable with older victims" and "it appeared that some information may have been coerced or improperly extracted from the children."[31] Given this candid assessment of the problems with the investigation, it seems remarkable that, instead of reassessing the case in full, authorities went ahead and indicted three more adults a few months later.

Betty Stimson's case came to trial first, in March 1987, two years after the charges were brought. The trial was interrupted when a child left the stand in tears; the proceedings were suspended and charges were eventually dropped. Charges were also dropped against Pastor Shell; Jeff Stimson was acquitted. But the case against Ballard went forward. When the trial began on October 27, 1987, the charges were whittled down to eleven victims.

There were, on close examination of the trial transcript, a host of problems with the charges against Ballard. First, it was difficult to believe she actually had the opportunity to commit all of these crimes. Only three of the eleven children were in her regular class; two others had her for something called Mother's Day out. This leaves six of the eleven children whose only other time for possibly encountering Ballard was 7:00 to 7:30 a.m. But a few of those students were never there at seven, leaving it unclear when she would even have had the opportunity.[32] Second, several children said Ballard had driven them to places away from the school. This has been known to happen at day care centers, but because of terrible eyesight Ballard never had a driver's license. She also had a complicated medical history that included multiple surgical scars, skin grafts, and other distinguishing marks that were described in embarrassing detail at trial. But not a single child who claimed to have seen her naked remarked about any markings that would apparently have been both noticeable and unusual.

There were various statements in the case that seem satanic in nature. From Charlier and Downing's description, one would think the children's testimony was filled with these elements. Six of the children at trial said nothing of the sort. But there was also testimony about an "exploded hamster" and a "blood man." The "Satanic tint," as one investigator called it, was there from the day when Mrs. Ballard was arrested. There was extensive testimony at trial about something she said in the police car, rebuking the devil.[33] The testimony was inconclusive, but investigators thought the devil was so significant to the case that it was the first word on a list of catch words distributed to parents and others. By my count, only one child actually invoked the devil in describing anything related to sexual abuse, saying that "the Devil would turn [him] into fire" if he told about what Frances Ballard did to him.[34] Authorities seemed particularly baffled by the satanic aspects. The lead investigator commented, in the confidential letter to the FBI, that "all of this is in direct contradiction to the atmosphere of the Southern Baptist Church that houses the day care."[35] Indeed, Ballard's outcry about the devil makes more sense as the response of a religious woman than it does the implied confession of a child molester. The intensely religious environment certainly made the devil references more likely, not less. This was proven years later in a study that found children in highly religious settings were more likely to invoke the devil.[36]

Although the "fantastic" elements of the case were arguably overplayed, two other elements of the case have received limited attention: the earliest statements, in June 1984, and the medical evidence. Both provide evidence supporting the charges but are omitted from the witch-hunt narrative. The origins of the case are not fully documented in the trial, but I located records documenting ten interviews conducted between June 6 and June 22, 1984. The records are not transcriptions; rather, they were prepared from audiotapes. The case was ultimately overturned on appeal, in part because the tapes were recorded over before they could be supplied to the defense.[37]

What is most noteworthy about the accounts in June is how "garden variety" they were. There were no references to Satanism or the devil. But there were some powerful exchanges, as when Wayne Hargrove was asked if Miss Frances ever kissed him. His answer was recorded as:

> Is anybody gonna get mad at me, mommy's gonna get mad at me, I don't like to talk about what, Yep, she does kiss me. Like a man and a woman.[38]

He followed-up with a statement about Ballard kissing "my dingaling."

Many of the children in the case were examined by a family physician, and a significant number were also examined by Dr. David Muram, a child-abuse pediatrician at the University of Tennessee. Dr. Muram's testimony in the case was quite conservative. The family physician of the first girl in the case reported that her hymen was "torn." Dr. Muram, a specialist in child abuse, testified the girl had a "notch in the hymen, which may or may not represent a tear," at 3 o'clock.[39] The most significant medical findings were probably the "depressed scar at 11 o'clock" on Cameron Bennett's anus. More of this scar was on the exterior of the anal canal, basically ruling out the possibility of constipation as a cause.[40] Dr. Muram's testimony was similarly guarded for other children. He described the anal findings on Charlie Higgins as "possible" sexual abuse.[41] For Brooke Northrup, he described labial adhesions, which "can be a normal occurrence or can result from friction-type dry intercourse." He cited a study concluding that the incidence of labial adhesions was five times higher in sexually abused kids. Noting a small scar on the midline of her rectum, Dr. Muram concluded there was "possible sexual abuse."[42] It is not a strong finding, but there were enough children with such findings to raise important questions that the witch-hunt narrative ignores.

In the end, the jury did not see the case as a witch-hunt or as a proven case of mass molestation. Instead, the jury acquitted Ballard on fifteen charges and found her guilty on one count of sexual abuse concerning one boy—a boy who apparently said early in the investigation that "You don't understand. Her husband's old and she had to have someone to love her, nobody loves her. I have to be her helper and I have to love her."[43] It is a puzzling result because there does not appear to be anything about this count making it far worthier of credence than most everything else in the case. Apparently, the jury was reluctant to let Ballard off completely, but they were also extremely ambivalent regarding the children's testimony. The conviction was later overturned on appeal and the prosecution declined to retry Ballard.[44]

Charlier and Downing's series is most remembered and cited for the claims about national trends, but the most original and extensive reporting was specifically about the Georgian Hills case. It has become the definitive explanation; there has been no other major published account. But Charlier and Downing's version does not convey that any of the earliest statements in the case were clear and without fantastic elements, or that several children in the case had medical findings relevant to sexual abuse. Those facts make the case the complicated conundrum it appeared to be at the time, rather than the one-dimensional witch-hunt story it eventually became. Like the McMartin case, however, the extent of the wrongful prosecutions was much larger than the rest of the story. It is impossible to defend the charges brought a year into this investigation, let alone the firing of fifteen people at Daybridge; there were terrible costs inflicted on innocent adults. The complication is that it also seems likely some children were sexually abused. It appears the reality of the injustice to adults drove Charlier and Downing to overgeneralize from Memphis to the country. Though they saw similarities to the McMartin case in dozens of instances, the Ballard case was actually more like McMartin than any other cases that Charlier and Downing covered. Accordingly, their article gave the rest of the country an overstated claim about national witch-hunts that would have been far more fitting had it focused largely on the case in Memphis.

There are three cases on the list of thirty-six that involved more defendants than four as in the Georgian Hills case. One is McMartin Preschool, discussed in the previous chapter, with seven defendants. The other two were far larger than McMartin, although neither was actually based at a day-care center and neither was really a single case. There were a set of related cases in Jordan, Minnesota, that involved twenty-eight defendants and another set in Bakersfield, California (also referred to as Kern County), with thirty-five defendants. Both of these "cases" received significant attention in the Commercial Appeal series. As with McMartin and Georgian Hills, they both included prosecutions that should never have been initiated. But they also involved more evidence of sexual abuse than has been recognized in the witch-hunt narrative. The Jordan cases are discussed briefly below and those in Kern County are discussed later in the chapter.

JORDAN

Location	Jordan, MN
Institution	none
Date	1983-84
Lead Def.	Robert & Lois Bentz

The Jordan, Minnesota, cases were the first "mass child molestation" cases to come to trial after McMartin catapulted the issue of child sexual abuse into the national consciousness in the winter of 1984. They were also the first cases to come to a conclusion, albeit an abrupt and puzzling one. "Jordan" was not a single matter, but a series of cases against twenty-four defendants. Some were against individuals, but most were against couples. The defendants were generally categorized into two "rings." The case originated with the lead defendant, James Rud, who lived in a trailer park described by the Minneapolis Star-Tribune as being "on the wrong side of Jordan's tracks" and populated by "a transient population who people don't trust."[45] The case then spread to the better-established part of town. The case against Robert and Lois Bentz, who were not among the first group of defendants, was the first one to come to trial. The three major television networks carried national news stories about the beginning of the trial during the third week of August 1984. It would be two years before the McMartin trial actually began and four more years before it ended ambiguously; in less than two months, however, all of the criminal cases filed in Jordan would be over. The Bentzes were acquitted in late September 1984 and charges against the remaining twenty-one defendants were dropped in mid-October amid reports about wild stories children told about undetected child murders. Rud was the only defendant whose case ended in a guilty verdict. He completed his sentence in 2011 and has since been held through Minnesota's civil commitment procedure.

The state attorney general, Hubert Humphrey III, examined the situation and declined to refile any of the sexual abuse charges. He explained his decision in the February 1985 Report on Scott County Investigations, commonly known as the Humphrey Report. The report concluded there was no credible evidence of child murders and the investigative process in the case was flawed in ways that made the refiling of charges inadvisable. The report also noted that "some" children had definitely been abused in Jordan but concluded it was not possible to assess how many.[46]

Some of the former defendants joined Ralph Underwager, the defense psychologist from the Bentz case, to launch an advocacy organization called VOCAL, standing for victims of child abuse laws. A petition was filed with Minnesota Governor Rudy Perpich requesting the removal of County Attorney Kathleen Morris for filing the Jordan cases. Former defendants also initiated a federal lawsuit alleging civil rights violations. Although they did not prevail in federal court, and the inquiry into the county attorney did not recommend Morris's removal, VOCAL prevailed where it matters most: in the court of public opinion. The Jordan cases have come to be known as "witch-hunts," which is how they were described by Charlier and Downing in 1988. Philip Jenkins, a professor of history and religion, drew an explicit parallel between the Jordan cases and the Salem witch trials, concluding, "almost all of the testimony that led to 25 indictments on very grave charges was invented."[47]

But the witch-hunt version of the Jordan cases does not do justice to the underlying facts. There are two sources of information beyond the Humphrey Report that were based on careful, systematic examinations of the factual record. Neither source supports the witch-hunt narrative as the best explanation of what happened in Jordan. The Olson Commission was created in response to the petition that accused County Attorney Morris of making arrests without probable cause. The commission found little evidence to substantiate the claim; in fact, by the time the hearings were over, Morris was being accused of the opposite—improperly dropping solid criminal cases.[48] A federal court in the Eighth Circuit also evaluated a broad array of documents underlying the Jordan investigation while adjudicating civil rights claims brought by many of the former defendants. Relying on a detailed examination of the underlying factual record, the court concluded the wrongful prosecution claims were without merit. The appellate decision reads like the report of the Olson Commission; that is, one is left wondering why so many prosecutions were dropped, not why they were brought in the first place.[49] Neither source applies this conclusion across the board; and both found considerable fault with how the investigation was conducted. What the Olson Commission and the Humphrey Report demonstrate, however, is that the witch-hunt narrative has reduced a complicated double tragedy to a simplistic one-line story.

The Jordan cases were flawed in ways that ultimately diminished the credibility of some key children. In addition to the murder allegations, there were other children subjected to repeated interviews that ultimately diminished their credibility. A few therapists played a significant and improper role in the process. But considering the array of evidence—medical, physical, adult, and child (at various stages of the interview process)—the witch-hunt narrative is misplaced.

The overinterviewing aspect of these cases is important because it led to fantastic claims that ultimately spoiled the case. The mother of one child indicated that her daughter had been interviewed "at least thirty and possibly as many as fifty times" by Scott County authorities."[50] But how widespread was this problem? Every witch-hunt account of the Jordan cases glosses over the question, acting as if all of the children were "brainwashed," as was asserted by defense psychologist Underwager. The Humphrey Report did not attempt to answer the question, simply reporting a few startling anecdotes instead. The Olson Commission took a more systematic view, identifying ten children in the case who had been subject to more than twelve interviews. The commission concluded there was still sufficient basis for proceeding against nine defendants, even if all the children subjected to the most repetitive interviews were excluded from testifying. What is clear on close examination is that the intensive interviewing phase of the case came late in the process. It does not make sense to automatically disregard statements children made in the fall of 1983 simply because some of them started making fantastic claims six to nine months later. The earliest statements are the most important to analyze in cases where children have been subject to repetitive interviews, since they are least affected by this problem. Tellingly, critics of the Jordan case have never tried to take into account the earliest statements that formed the basis for the Jordan cases.[51]

When the Jordan cases were dismissed, the outcome was generally seen by those in Minnesota as unsatisfactory and unsettling. Josephine Marcotty, a reporter for the Star Tribune, predicted the legacy of Jordan would be "one of confusion."[52] This has not turned out to be the case. What was so perplexing at the time has, deceptively, become much starker over the years. Now the witch-hunt narrative prevails as exemplified by Charlier and Downing's account, written four years later, which did not acknowledge that there was credible evidence against any of the defendants beyond James Rud.

ROGERS PARK

Location	Chicago, IL
Institution	Rogers Park JCC
Date	1984
Lead Def.	Deloartic Parks

The Rogers Park Jewish Community Center case began the first week of April 1984 when a mother named Brenda Voigt reported that her four-year-old daughter told the janitor, while leaving her preschool, to leave her alone. The girl told her mother that the man tickled her. Asked where he tickled her, the girl's answer included her vagina. Voigt complained directly to the school and then to the Department of Children and Family Services. Charlier and Downing's description of the case states:

> Children soon began to accuse teachers of abusing them in satanic rituals. No teachers were arrested. [The janitor] was acquitted. The Illinois Department of Children and Families concluded that most of the 246 allegations against other staff members were unfounded. In February 1986, prosecutors dropped remaining charges.[53]

The implication by Charlier and Downing is that the outcome was appropriate. There is no sense in their reporting that children may have been sexually abused. Their account is accurate in describing fantastic statements and expanding allegations, including ritual abuse claims. It was widely reported in the media that children made statements about "animal mutilation and satanic rituals of an almost medieval quality."[54] The details about those statements remain vague as they were all part of the confidential DCFS investigation. But the statements were never used against anyone in a judicial context. The investigation involved eighty-eight children; interviews were conducted in late April 1984 and occurred in an environment of publicity and intense parental interest.

An internal DCFS report in June 1984 indicated there was credible evidence "that nineteen children were abused at the Center." Those findings were controversial within the agency. A state-level review reversed the conclusions months later, and cases that had been deemed "indicated" were reclassified as "unfounded."[55] The school was reopened. On the basis of existing records, it is not possible to piece together precisely what went wrong in the investigation. But this much seems clear: too much of the investigation was delegated to someone who was not qualified to conduct it.[56] Complaints pertaining to a small number of children, including the original girl, moved ahead against Deloartic Parks, the janitor. The case went to trial in criminal court, and several families pursued civil claims. None of the civil cases went to trial, however, and it is impossible to ascertain from court files what the ultimate settlements and dismissals mean. Moreover, the available evidence from the Parks trial is limited, owing to difficulties in getting the full stenographic record converted into an actual transcript.[57]

The witch-hunt narrative ignores the evidence that moved law enforcement to bring criminal charges against Parks. First, there was medical evidence pertaining to the first girl in the case, and to another girl, Jane Cranshaw, who testified at Parks's criminal trial. She experienced medical problems in the spring of 1984 and went to the doctor's office four times in four months. She had a sore throat and upper respiratory tract problems during this time, but the doctor also noted she was not gaining weight. Her mother brought her daughter back on April 6 with the girl's complaint that it hurt when she urinated. Laboratory tests were "grossly positive for leukocytes." "It is very unusual for children to have pus cells in their urine," the doctor explained when he testified.[58] The doctor raised sexual abuse as a possibility. This was before anything had been said publicly about the possible sexual abuse at Rogers Park day care. Her labia were "intensely inflamed." Emergency Room Dr. Lorraine Ling, who saw the girl later that day, testified she suspected the girl "was sexually abused, but not to a medical certainty."[59]

The other child with strong medical indications was Sophie Voigt, the little girl whose mother heard her tell Deloartic Parks to leave her alone as she was departing school one day in early April. This girl had been to her family doctor on March 12 for a rash that had not gone away for two weeks. She came back on April 9, when the doctor noted "multiple erythematous lesions on Sophie's right labia majora and the adjacent inner aspect of the right thigh."[60] He prescribed some medicine. The Voigts came back several days later, after Sophie told her mother Parks had tickled her "on the vagina." The doctor did a genital examination and reported:

> With separation of the labia majora, the labia minora were exposed and found to be intensely erythematous with a white exudate upon them. The hymen ring was not intact and the gaping vaginal walls were also noted to be intensely inflamed.[61]

These findings were cited in a DCFS report that described the interviews with this girl in a single sentence: "In two separate interviews, both using anatomically correct dolls, Sophie told Detective Keenan and DCFS Worker Robinson that Mr. Parks lifted up her dress and tickled her vagina."

There is additional evidence bearing on the question of guilt in this case. Parks flunked a lie detector test. According to the police report, the polygrapher concluded that he "was not being truthful" about a general question concerning touching children's genitals and two specific questions about touching the Voight girl.[62] Lie detector results are always mentioned in the witch-hunt narrative when they might support the defendant, but they are conspicuously absent when defendants fail them. The judge who heard the case did not present the acquittal as an exoneration; instead he remarked about how "these are not easy cases to decide."[63] As Judge Jack G. Stein concluded, "There is a reasonable doubt in my mind, so I have no choice but to discharge."[64] It is important to understand the evolution of an investigation that could spawn the kind of outlandish allegations reported in this case. It is also important to keep in mind the evidence that those problems arose in the context of a real child sexual abuse case. If cases labeled as witch-hunts are actually botched investigations of real sexual abuse, then the defendants who go free do so under false pretenses. That is arguably what happened in the Rogers Park case, although neither side would characterize it this way. A core group of parents were dedicated to believing every word the children said, and the witch-hunt narrative has cast Parks as the victim regardless of the evidence of abuse. Given such evidence, this would seem to be an example of a case where the acquittal of the defendant reflects the price we pay for ensuring that convictions occur only when there is an extremely high confidence level in the conclusion. Attaining this level of confidence in any case pitting a child's word against that of an adult is bound to be difficult, but such is not the story Charlier and Downing told.

CRAIG'S PRE-SCHOOL

Location	Clarksville, MD
Institution	Craig's Country Pre-School
Date	1985
Lead Def.	Sandra Craig

The Craig's Country Pre-School case is one of eight cases profiled by Charlier and Downing. Their 250-word account paints a dreamy picture of Craig's as "a place where children learned to operate computers and studied French." Out of nowhere, they imply, a little girl began to accuse Sandra Craig of sexual abuse, apparently without any corroborating evidence. But as reported in the Washington Post nearly nine months before publication of the Charlier and Downing series:

> Accusers and defenders of Sandra Craig have expressed dismay with what they saw as the failures of police and the County Department of Social Services, which had investigated a report of abuse involving a five-year-old girl at the center more than a year before it was closed, without notifying other parents.[65]

This case had additional features Charlier and Downing did not report. In day-care abuse cases such as Georgian Hills, there are serious questions about whether there was an opportunity for the defendant to commit acts of sexual abuse without being detected. In this case, however, there was extensive testimony about children being sent upstairs to Mrs. Craig's room for discipline.[66] This practice violated the staffing plan for the facility, which stated that Sandra Craig would always be downstairs and no children would be upstairs. There were also a series of former employees who started working at Craig's Pre-School and left after becoming uncomfortable with her harsh demeanor. One former employee described how Craig's treatment of disruptive children left them looking "frightened," and her quite uncomfortable.[67]

None of this proves sexual abuse, of course. But the most powerful evidence for the prosecution was never mentioned by Charlier and Downing: the "graphic testimony of a medical expert," which was also described in the Washington Post. Dr. Charles Shubin, a pediatric specialist, testified:

> that his examination of the 6-year-old girl and the three other children who testified that Craig had abused them produced evidence of internal scarring that suggested that they had been molested in a "remarkably consistent manner."[68]

He observed a "very clear healed injury" in the vagina of the first girl in the case, concluding that "beyond a reasonable degree of medical certainty" some object "would have to be pushed into this child with penetrating force" to cause this kind of injury.[69] The girl testified she had been touched in her "privates" with a "stick."[70] She was the only complainant in the case because the judge had ruled that charges involving other children had to be tried separately. But medical reports for three other children with similar injuries were admitted since they were so consistent.[71] The defense was left to argue that perhaps all four children had likewise been abused elsewhere.

The "satanic or ritualistic" feature that Charlier and Downing highlight is one child's statement that Sandra Craig killed a rabbit. They did not mention that there was a rabbit at the day care, it died at the school, and one of the parents of a child who attended the day-care handled it.[72] (This was not part of the charges.) The conviction in this case was reversed on appeal over objections to the use of closed-circuit television. This is the only one of the contested child sexual abuse cases from the 1980s to end up before the U.S. Supreme Court. Their decision in Maryland v. Craig is known for the issue about closed-circuit television.[73] What has been lost in all discussions of this case is the evidence that four children who attended Craig's sustained surprisingly similar penetrative injuries.

The prosecution declined to prosecute Sandra Craig a second time; five years had elapsed since the original trial. Charges against Craig's son were dismissed in 1987 when the accusing child in the case was deemed incompetent to testify.[74]

CORA'S DAY CARE

Location	Sequim, WA
Institution	Cora's Day Care
Date	1986
Lead Def.	Ralph Priest

The Cora's Day Care case was also profiled in Charlier and Downing's series. It is notable as well for being one of only two of the thirty-six cases that began after 1985. The authors summarize this case as follows:

> The case surfaced after an area woman placed her 2-year-old granddaughter in the day care center for the first time. After a two-hour stay, the grandmother noticed redness in the girl's vaginal area. Medical tests found no evidence of abuse, but word spread among parents of possible problems. . . . Suspicions focused on Ralph Priest [Cora's son]. They also assert that this occurred at a "highly-regarded day care center."

In fact, there had been previous complaints of physical abuse by Ralph Priest, whose medical history included severe mental instability and a finding that he was dangerous to others. A state worker who visited the day-care center in 1978 observed Priest in the "back forty" waving a rake or stick at children. Later that year, a pediatrician diagnosed choking injuries in a girl who attended the day care.[75] Interviewed again on April 29, 1986, the doctor was disturbed that Cora Priest still had a day-care license after the 1978 incident. He examined two girls who attended the day care in 1986 and concluded there had been sexual abuse.

Charlier and Downing reported that "suspicions focused on Ralph Priest," but they omitted any mention of his criminal history and mental illness. In subsequent civil litigation, Cora Priest confirmed that Ralph first exhibited signs of emotional problems in 1970.[76] He was diagnosed in 1975 as paranoid schizophrenic. After being arrested for criminal activities in 1979, he pleaded insanity and was hospitalized at Western State Hospital until 1984. He then moved back to Cora Priest's house, where he started a fire and was allegedly hallucinating; he was rehospitalized. Soon after his release, he was charged with simple assault and then voluntarily committed to Olympic Memorial Hospital. After a seventy-two hour observation period, he was found to be a danger to others.[77] Ralph Priest applied for SSI, listing "mental problems," and it was determined that he met the criteria for incapacity; a state DHSD document from July 1985 lists "manic depression, disorientation, bizarre behavior, a danger to himself and others."[78] It was determined that he required protective supervision twenty-four hours a day. Instead, he moved back to his mother's house, where he had contact with the children in the day care, sometimes alone, during the period when these allegations arose. In an article that discredits the allegations of abuse in this case, defense psychologist Underwager summarized all of the information described in this paragraph as follows: [Priest] "had a history of alcohol problems, had recently lost his job, and therefore was living at home during the day."[79]

According to Charlier and Downing, the case stalled when Clallam County Prosecutor David Bruneau "convinced a local court to drop charges of indecent liberties against the Priests."[80] But this is not an accurate representation of what the prosecutor said at the time. His explanation, contained in a contemporaneous article in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, specifically said "the four alleged victims were too traumatized to testify."[81] Several children in the case were diagnosed with posttraumatic stress disorder.

In sum, there is ample evidence to challenge the witch-hunt narrative about this case. If anything, the state was too easy on Cora's Day Care in 1978. As a result, a dangerous, mentally ill man who should never have been alone with children was placed in that position. But there is one nagging problem: bizarre claims related to Satanism emerged later in the case. How prevalent were those claims, and why did they happen? First, not all of the children made them, but at least one mother in particular became an "investigator," much like some of the parents in the McMartin case, taking the child to the cemetery and churches to seek "confirmation" that he had been there. Those developments definitely undermined the criminal case. But the tragedy is not that Ralph Priest was accused; it is that those children were left alone with a man considered dangerous to himself and others.

NILES

Location	Niles, MI
Institution	Small World Preschool
Date	1984
Lead Def.	Richard Barkman

The Small World Preschool in Niles Township, Michigan, was not highlighted by Charlier and Downing, but it is on their list of thirty-six and is often mentioned in the witch-hunt narrative. This case, which occurred between 1984 and 1985, involved two defendants: Richard Barkman, twenty-eight, a teacher at the school, and his wife, Rebecca, thirty-two, the director. The case began with a single complaint and soon expanded to enormous proportions. According to an academic study of the case, "The investigation began with four children, spanned eight months, and involved interviews with a total of 106 alleged victims."[82] By one official count, sixty-two children indicated in interviews with various state agencies that they had been sexually abused at the preschool. Richard Barkman was charged with nineteen counts of sexual abuse involving four boys and five girls. Rebecca Barkman was charged with two misdemeanor counts of failing to report suspected child abuse. Nobody else was charged. There was one criminal trial before a jury, involving the charges concerning a four-year-old boy. Richard Barkman was convicted and sentenced to fifty to seventy-five years in prison. The remaining charges were then dropped, including those against Rebecca Barkman.

Barkman's conviction was overturned by the Michigan Court of Appeals in September 1988. The court ruled that the trial judge had improperly limited cross-examination of the child witness.[83] The state was allowed to retry Barkman after he had served five years in prison, subject to the appellate court's decision. Instead, Barkman pleaded no contest to one count of assault with intent to commit first-degree sexual misconduct with a four-year-old girl in exchange for time served and five years of probation.[84] Both sides received something, but neither side could be considered victorious. Nevertheless, the case has been classified as a witch-hunt.

There are significant research challenges involved in trying to study this case at large. Criminal charges were brought in connection with nine children, but charges related to eight were dropped after the original case ended in a conviction and long sentence. The trial transcript from the case provides considerable information about the four-year-old boy's complaint, but it contains nothing about the four-year-old girl connected to the post-appeal plea agreement. It also says nothing about the other seven children involved in criminal charges. Beyond the criminal case, there were thirty-nine children involved in civil suits. Almost all of the records from the civil suits are sealed or in private hands and subject to attorney-client privilege.[85]

Existing sources offer three reasons to conclude that the statements leading to criminal charges were credible. First, the case did not expand beyond the Barkmans. Second, it did not involve repetitive interviews before children made disclosures; the MDMH Report indicates that 83 percent of disclosures were on the first interview.[86] Third, there was consistency across statements. Significantly, four organizations were involved in the case and the disclosure rate did not vary by agency, providing a kind of check that did not exist against Children's Institute International in the McMartin case.

Yet, there are obvious reasons to question the credibility of some children in this case. It strains credulity to think that the children were, without anyone detecting these events, driven away from the preschool to photography sessions in barns and made to watch Richard Barkman snap the heads off chickens. But how significant were such claims in the case? By one measure—the amount of negative publicity generated—they were enormous. But Charlier and Downing said nothing about the frequency or context of these statements. They do not consider how many children made implausible statements and what role, if any, they played in any criminal or civil claims.

It appears that Charlier and Downing's account is quite exaggerated. They state that "the children" said they were driven to photography sessions and "made to watch as Barkman snapped the head off a chicken." A summary of statements by eighty-four children interviewed by DSS includes the word chicken twice—once involving allegations of actually cutting the wings of chickens.[87] There is no evidence that "the children" in this case made such claims. But there is evidence in the MDMH Report that a sizable number of children made fantastic claims. Twenty-eight made statements that were classified as "ritual/bestiality."[88] It should be reiterated that 106 children were interviewed, so those statements were not a significant part of what all of "the children" said, which is what Charlier and Downing suggest. In overall terms, it appears the majority of children who made incriminating statements in the case did not make the kind of statements that Charlier and Downing cite as reason to label the case a witch-hunt. Those could well represent all of the children who were involved in the criminal charges.

Beyond issues concerning the testimony of children, the witch-hunt narrative contains two instances of glossing over contrary evidence and a significant omission. The first inaccuracy is that Barkman "passed a polygraph test." Actually, he told police he was willing to take a test, and it was scheduled for two days later, at which time he declined to take it.[89] Later he arranged through his own lawyer to have one administered. The state had no input into the questions or the process and did not accept the results, which Barkman claimed as proof he was telling the truth when he denied sexually abusing children. The second problem is the inaccurate claim that there was "no medical evidence" in the case. It does not appear that anyone making this claim has actually reviewed the medical files of the children in the criminal and civil cases. From the files I was able to examine, the four-year-old boy at trial had a period of excruciating difficulty with bowel movements; he was found to have a fecal impaction. This is consistent with sexual abuse, but there are other possible causes as well. A five-year-old boy who was also involved in the criminal proceedings had a healed anal fissure at the 6 o'clock position. This is not diagnostic of sexual abuse, but it is consistent with it. Interpretations based on this evidence may vary, but the witch-hunt narrative does not allow anyone to consider it, preferring instead to omit it.

Another important set of omissions concerns Barkman's temperament and the history of complaints at Small World. It is clear from evidence developed in the criminal case that Richard Barkman did not have a personality suitable for working with small children. He had a terrible temper and was fired from a coaching job after throwing a tantrum (and a telephone). Moreover, the preschool had been the subject of two separate complaints about him in the previous two years. There was a complaint on June 29, 1982, from an anonymous witness stating she heard Richard Barkman slap one child on the head; two children (anonymous) who reported being spanked at school; a child being put in a garbage can as a punitive measure.[90]

A separate report in February 1983 cited an anonymous witness saying her daughter had been taken off the premises for lunch without her permission, and that Richard Barkman had kissed her on the mouth.[91] These previous complaints against him obviously do not prove the later allegations, and none gave rise to any kind of separate charges, but they are worth mentioning since the lack of prior complaints is regularly used as an argument against the credibility of abuse allegations in day-care settings.

With sufficient access to relevant documents, one could spend years analyzing the complete scope of this case, the evolution of the charges and statements, and the differences between children. This would likely lead to a more nuanced view of the case. But even without such intensive inquiry, an examination of a range of original documents paints a picture that is more complicated than the witch-hunt narrative. This appears to be a case with "fantastic" statements and credible evidence of sexual abuse—a combination never recognized in the witch-hunt narrative.

WEST POINT

Location	West Point, NY
Institution	West Point Child Development Ctr.
Date	1984
Lead Def.	none

The West Point Child Development Center case is not among a handful of cases commonly mentioned in the witch-hunt narrative, but it appears on Charlier and Downing's list of thirty-six. Although barely remembered today, it received a considerable amount of publicity in its time. It was the subject of an article in Newsweek in July 1985 and an article in Redbook in January 1986, and it was one of two major case studies in a chapter of David Hechler's prophetic 1988 book, The Battle and the Backlash.[92] Those works were all sympathetic to the view that children had been sexually abused at the West Point Child Development Center. They did not cast the case as a witch-hunt. To the contrary, there was the sense that too little was being done to address definite abuse.

But the case was also mentioned in one of Debbie Nathan's earliest witch-hunt articles, and it later appeared on Charlier and Downing's list. As they explained, "allegations grew to include several children, animal sacrifices, pornography and rituals involving people wearing bloody Dracula-type masks." Nobody was charged in the case. Charlier and Downing's three-sentence description ends, "An investigation concluded there were indications of abuse but insufficient evidence to prosecute."[93] The nature of those "indications" is not explained. Nor is any rationale provided for why a case with "indications of abuse" but no actual charges would be included in a series about "justice abused."

The case began on July 27, 1984, when a three-and-a-half-year-old girl came home from a full day at the West Point Child Development Center and screamed with pain while urinating in the bathroom. Her mother observed that she was bleeding from her vagina and so immediately took her daughter to Keller Army Hospital. The girl told a technician and the doctor that her "teacher did it." She also told the doctor, "She put a pen in my touchy." The doctor observed that the girl had lacerations in her vaginal canal and indicated on the report that these internal injuries had most likely occurred within two to four hours before 5:15 p.m.[94] The only place the girl had been during that time was the day-care center.

About two weeks later, another child made statements to her parents about being touched sexually by a "teacher" at the day care. She and her family had been on vacation in late July and early August and they did not know about the girl who went to the emergency room on July 27. But the second girl did not name the same teacher who had been implicated earlier. Her father, a U.S. Army doctor, was convinced by statements from his daughter that she had been sexually abused. The teachers at the center were questioned by investigators from the army, administered lie detector tests, and quickly cleared as suspects. Two of the teachers were later reconsidered as suspects, but nobody was ever charged or disciplined. The doctor soon came to the conclusion that the army was intent on minimizing or denying child sexual abuse.[95]

Ultimately, the FBI undertook a massive investigation that included 950 interviews and the screening of about fifty children by a child psychologist. There was never a public accounting of any sort, but the core number of victims was apparently around a dozen. A briefing memo to the FBI director, after twenty-eight children had been screened, stated that ten were "probably victims" and an additional eight were either abused or witnessed sexual abuse of other children.[96] There were nine parties to the settlement of the civil suit. Two prominent families in the criminal case did not participate fully in the civil case; they actually withdrew from it. In other words, there were eleven key children in this case, although only one or two were ever publicly identified. Unfortunately, little information is available about these children and their statements. A grand jury in the Southern District of New York heard evidence about this case for ten months before U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani declared that there was insufficient evidence to bring charges. He noted there was credible evidence that children had been sexually abused, but he said one couldn't be "absolutely sure" of who did it.[97] (The law does not require "absolute certainty"; it requires certainty beyond a reasonable doubt.)

So why is the West Point case on the witch-hunt list? Because a number of children made ritualistic allegations. How extensive and significant were those statements? There is apparently no way to ascertain the answer. The videotapes of child interviews are under seal, and the FBI's own reports are subject to redaction, which is substantial. The source of Charlier and Downing's description is likely a self-selecting group of parents who started seeing the case as ritualistic. They made claims in the public realm—claims that I think strain credulity. One of the first parents involved in the case became thoroughly convinced that the abuse at West Point was "ritualized" and "satanic," part of a national network of pedophiles who worked out of day-care centers. Other parents followed suit.

In short, the West Point case was a mixture of incredible claims and verified abuse. Some parents, faced with a nonresponsive bureaucracy that seemed to be stonewalling, succumbed to conspiracy theories of the case. Their exasperation was at least partially based on realities that have not been recognized in the witch-hunt narrative. And an important part of the story of this case—a part that distinguishes it from being a witch-hunt—is the failure to hold a perpetrator responsible for, at the very least, inflicting vaginal puncture wounds on a little girl.

WHITE PLAINS

Location	White Plains, NY
Institution	home day care
Date	1985
Lead Def.	James Watt

Another case from the list of thirty-six that contradicts the arguments in Charlier and Downing's series is from White Plains, New York. It involved an unlicensed day-care center in the basement of Jeanette Martin's house, which was raided on May 3, 1985—the day after a three-year-old boy who attended the day-care was admitted to an emergency room for injuries caused by anal penetration.[98] The police found James Watt, a thirty-four-year-old man who rented a room in the house, wrapped in a blanket in a cold, dirty basement with fourteen young children, some naked, who were watching television. Watt told the police it was "choir practice." On the basis of initial interviews with the children, Watt was arrested on May 8 and charged with sexual assault. The case was presented to a grand jury in July. Watt was then indicted on thirteen additional counts involving six children between August 1, 1984 and December 31, 1984.

Three of those children tested positive for venereal diseases. One girl had no hymen, and a skin tag on her anus that was suggestive of anal penetration.[99] The grand jury also indicted Jeanette Martin on three counts of rape, two counts of child sexual abuse, and one count of child endangerment. A twenty-count indictment several months later added additional sexual abuse charges against Watt, involving eight more children from before 1984. Three of those children also tested positive for venereal disease. Watt challenged the indictments for lack of specificity as to the dates of the alleged crimes. This would be his primary defense throughout the case: that the dates were not specific enough for him to provide a defense. Such an argument would make sense if Watt had no connection to the location and was, accordingly, hampered in his ability to provide alibi evidence that might place him elsewhere. But there was uncontested evidence that he had lived at the house since 1981, regularly drove a van that picked up and delivered some of the children, and was involved in the daily supervision of children during the entire time period covered by the charges. There were two other defendants in the case; charges against Jeanette Martin's husband, Harold, were eventually dropped, and James Freeman, who also lived in the house, was acquitted of child endangerment. Watt's trial began in April 1986 and lasted for nine months. Though children were the primary witnesses, various adults also testified, including parents, investigators, and two doctors who testified about the venereal diseases and related medical evidence. The jury convicted Watt of nine counts of rape, four counts of sodomy, and one count of child endangerment. Jeanette Martin was acquitted on the rape charges and convicted of child endangerment; the jury did not convict her on the charge that she held several children down while Watt raped them, even though Watt was convicted of rape in those instances.

Charlier and Downing impugned the case because one of the defense lawyers claimed that children made "bizarre" statements. None of the allegedly bizarre statements are mentioned in their article. Nor do any bizarre statements appear in the appellate documents filed by Watt, in the transcript portions that I located, or sixty-one assorted newspaper stories about the case. The same defense lawyer is quoted in several of those stories saying that children should never be allowed to testify in court.[100] He is also quoted making a statement that itself might well be labeled bizarre, asserting that "if [Watt] committed the crimes, he was a victim of circumstance."[101] He never explained why "circumstances" would be to blame for sexually abusing children. Watt appealed his conviction and succeeded in having most charges dismissed on the grounds that the time frame specified in the indictment was too broad. The New York Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, upheld the charges involving a five-month time frame, and the case was heralded an important accommodation to child victims.[102] Charlier and Downing justify the inclusion of this case on a "ritual abuse" list because there were "activities in basement," allegations of "sodomy," and something about urination. But there was nothing about urination in the charges, there is nothing bizarre about sodomy allegations in a sexual abuse case, and the daycare was located in the basement. James Watt is also listed in the dedication of Nathan and Snedeker's book, but there are no details in the book about the case. The advocacy group that now promotes the witch-hunt narrative, the National Center for Reason and Justice, also apparently considers Watt a victim. They rely on a freelance journalist, Lona Manning, whose website entry about the case is based on five articles from the New York Times and a few quotes from the same defense lawyer who thinks that all child-abuse cases are "incredibly weak" and that children should never be able to testify in court.[103] Notably, the two New York Times articles about the case that mention six children having venereal diseases are not quoted or otherwise acknowledged on the site.[104] All of the medical evidence, including the anal scar on the girl whose charges were never overturned, must be ignored in order to assert, as Manning does, that a case like that of James Watt "has all of the hallmarks of a ritual abuse panic mass molestation case."[105]

Nathan and Snedeker's Dedication Page

No writer has done more to perpetuate the view that scores of people were falsely imprisoned on charges involving satanic ritual abuse in the 1980s than Debbie Nathan. She published her first article on the theme four months before the Charlier and Downing series was published. Focusing on a single case from El Paso, Texas, where she lived at the time, Nathan argued that there was a "nationwide rash" of these cases. She proceeded to identify six cases by name, notably Kelly Michaels and Country Walk—each the subject of an entire chapter later in this book. In her next paragraph, these cases were all labeled "junior McMartins" and described as "an epidemic." The other cases mentioned by name included Jordan, Minnesota (discussed earlier in this chapter and to be written about in a future publication), where there was substantial evidence of sexual abuse, and West Point (also discussed earlier in this chapter), where there was clear medical evidence of sexual abuse but no actual arrests. This leaves two cases that might conceivably support Nathan's nationwide claim: the Barkman case in Niles, Michigan (discussed earlier in this chapter), and the Amirault case in Malden, Massachusetts (to be discussed in a later publication). In short, Nathan's first article claimed there was a national trend, on the basis, at best, of a handful of cases. But few of those cases actually support the claim, if any.

Nathan's 1995 book with defense lawyer Michael Snedeker contains a longer list of names that has been widely cited as evidence of the nationwide trend of witch-hunts involving child sexual abuse claims. The list was presented on the dedication page of their book, "to the men and women still incarcerated, including those whose names we know." Information about those cases is contained in Table 3.3. Unlike the Charlier and Downing list—where many of the "cases" did not even involve criminal charges—Nathan and Snedeker's list consists entirely of people who were actually in prison at the time of publication, making it a much stronger list on its face. One book reviewer cited this list, along with the phrase "whose names we know," as evidence that there must be a national trend much larger than the names listed.[106]

Lists with complete names and specific places look authoritative. They have a certain precision: Michael Joseph Schildmeyer (Edgewood, Iowa). But there is much less here than meets the eye. First, the list is strangely disconnected from the book. Twelve of the cases included on the dedication page are not even listed in the book's index, even though the index includes cases that are mentioned on just a single page.[107] Moreover, two of the cases are included in the index but cannot fairly be counted as being covered in the book.[108] And none of the names from the Wenatchee case, which accounts for one-third of the names on the list, are even cited in the book; instead, the Wenatchee cases are discussed once, in a sentence that is in parentheses.[109] There are also two puzzles in this list, both involving cases with two defendants, only one of whom is included on the list.[110] A skeptic might wonder why so few of the allegedly "phony" ritual-abuse cases listed on the dedication page are actually included in a book that argues there was a nationwide trend of such cases.

The Satan's Silence list suffers from two of the same problems as the list compiled by Charlier and Downing. First, it is filled with exaggeration regarding satanic elements. Most of the cases on this list have nothing to do with satanic ritual abuse claims. Second, the list features cases in which there was substantial evidence of guilt. I have done enough research on seventeen of these twenty-one cases to reach at least a tentative conclusion about whether the case involved a wrongful conviction.[111]

That judgment is tentative in four cases. In the Aldridge and Wilcox case from Dayton, Ohio, one judge overturned the criminal convictions but another rejected the defendants' subsequent claim for civil damages, finding there was actually substantial evidence of their guilt.[112] Similarly, Lawrence Wright made a convincing case in the New Yorker that the Ingram case from Olympia, Washington, involved a wrongful conviction, but Karen Olio and William Cornell published a subsequent article that raises substantial doubts about Wright's claim.[113] The Parker case from North Carolina was described by Martin Gardner in the Skeptical Inquirer as a wrongful conviction, but newspaper accounts and appellate documents suggest it was not.[114] The conclusion is tentative because the transcript is not currently available; the only available copy is in the possession of a defense lawyer who was unwilling to make it available for fear it might damage his client's ongoing efforts to overturn his conviction.[115]

Finally, it would take many years to research the Wenatchee cases thoroughly, but there is evidence to suggest that labeling the entire matter a witch-hunt is highly inappropriate. A local television station broadcast a prison interview with an adult woman who had pleaded guilty and—even after all the criticism of the case—maintained that she and other adults had engaged in sexual contact with numerous children.[116] It is also apparent that there were false convictions in Wenatchee, spurred by a sheriff who would later be discredited in many ways.[117] The false conviction problem has been expounded on in the media and in a book by a defense lawyer. What has been lost in those accounts is any sense that some of the cases were well founded, that some were rightly not overturned, and that some were never even challenged.

Only three of the seventeen cases involved wrongful conviction. The clearest case is Bernard Baran, discussed below. The two others were massive cases that involved wrongful convictions and well-founded ones: Kern County, the earliest cases of all, and Wenatchee, from 1995. Even if all four of the "undetermined" cases were wrongful convictions, this would mean only seven of the twenty-one cases bear out the argument of Nathan and Snedeker's book. In short, the dedication page, which has persuaded so many people with its specificity and length, actually provides surprisingly limited support for the primary thesis of the book. The rest of this chapter provides case-by-case details that support this conclusion, analyzing the cases in chronological order.

KERN COUNTY

Location	Kern County, CA
Institution	none
Date	1982-85
Lead Def.	Kniffens & McCuans

A series of cases from Kern County, California, were the earliest and most problematic of the child molestation cases of the 1980s. Eight "organized sex rings," allegedly involving fifty-four identified adults, were listed by law enforcement officials in the Bakersfield newspaper story in January 1985.[118] Two months later, the County Sheriff's Office organized a special task force to investigate claims that there was organized satanic abuse in the county. The task force almost immediately referred eleven new complaints to the District Attorney's Office. Prosecutors rejected those complaints, and within four months the task force was disbanded. A grand jury in Kern County then requested that the California Attorney General's Office investigate the role of various Kern County agencies in this fiasco. The Report on the Kern County Child Abuse Investigations, published in September 1986, delivered a strong indictment of how children had been interviewed and child molestation complaints investigated. But the report did not take a position on specific cases.

At least twenty-six people were eventually convicted of child molestation in connection with the cases in Kern County. By 1996, eighteen of those defendants had their convictions overturned. The number includes two couples, the Kniffens and the McCuans, who were first charged in April 1982. Their cases have been the primary focus of the witch-hunt narrative about Kern County. They were the subject of a chapter in Nathan and Snedeker's books, they accounted for most of a similar chapter in Edward Hume's book Mean Justice, and they have been featured in two movies.[119] None of those accounts do justice to the facts of the McCuan part of the case. Instead, they ignore or minimize the actual origins of the case and the quality of the medical evidence. Accounting for those facts presents a far more complicated picture than the witch-hunt narrative presents, including the unavoidable conclusion that the McCuans' girls had been sexually abused for years.

John Stoll's conviction in Kern County in June 1984 has also received considerable attention in recent years. He was the subject of a New York Times Magazine article in 2004 and was featured in Sean Penn's 2009 movie Witch Hunt.[120] Although these accounts provide persuasive evidence that Stoll was falsely convicted, neither one tells the complete story of the evidence against his codefendant, Grant Self, who has also been embraced in the witch-hunt narrative.

The Kniffen and McCuan Cases

The Kniffen and McCuan cases began as an intrafamilial sexual abuse case in the McCuan family. The primary victims were two young girls, identified by Debbie Nathan as Bobbie and Darla, the daughters of Deborah and Alvin McCuan. The children's mother was the daughter of Gene and Linda Barbour, who divorced when Deborah was a child. Linda then married Rod Phelps. Gene remarried twice; his third wife was Mary Ann Barbour. Mary Ann suspected that Bobbie and Darla were being sexually abused by Phelps, their stepgrandfather. Mary Ann Barbour is the focus of the witch-hunt narrative, which argues, just like the claim against Judy Johnson in the McMartin case, that the case began in the imagination of a mentally unstable woman. As Edward Humes put it, "the events that triggered the Bakersfield Witch Hunt occurred in January 1980" and started with "an obsessed woman named Mary Ann Barbour."[121] But the story did not begin in January 1980. There are important events and facts that preceded Barbour's would-be imaginings about child sexual abuse. First, there is substantial evidence that Deborah McCuan, the girls' mother, was determined to minimize or ignore their abuse at the hands of her stepfather, Phelps, well before 1980. When Barbour told Deborah McCuan in 1979 that Bobbie had visible vaginal bruises from what she thought Phelps was doing to the child, Deborah reportedly responded that Bobbie "had a lot of accidents."[122] Deborah later told Mary Ann that what Phelps had done was "no big deal." This was not the only time Deborah McCuan used the phrase to minimize child molestation. Deborah had accused Phelps of sexual abuse when she was younger, but the case was dropped when she recanted. When later confronted by Detective Glen Johnson about the discrepancy between her denial and an earlier sworn statement about Phelps, Deborah "stated that she had testified that Rod had not molested her because 'it was no big thing.'"[123] It is no wonder Mary Ann Barbour was worried about those girls. Their mother had sworn to having been abused by Rod Phelps, she had later minimized the matter, and she was then leaving the girls with him.

Second, it turns out that Deborah McCuan took Bobbie to the doctor some months before being confronted by Mary Ann Barbour about this in 1980. Records never mentioned in the witch-hunt narrative indicate that it was for some kind of injury to the girl's "pubic area." Deborah apparently told the doctor that her daughter had sustained injuries "falling on a wire fence." The pediatrician who examined the girl months later concluded that the vaginal injuries she observed at that time could not possibly have been caused by such an accident because there were no skin lacerations.[124] When Dr. Squyres informed McCuan in 1980 that her daughter had medical signs of sexual abuse, Deborah expressed disbelief and asked if maybe the findings could be explained "due to a fall."[125] They could not. In short, the would-be imaginings of Mary Ann Barbour had strong foundations in fact. McCuan, on the other hand, seemed to be imagining every possible alternative explanation to avoid facing the idea that her own daughters were now the ones being sexually abused by her stepfather.

The McCuan girls were interviewed by the Kern County Sheriff's Office in October 1981. The incident report indicates Bobbie McCuan disclosed that Rod Phelps, her stepgrandfather, had molested her two years ago and that her father, Alvin McCuan, had been molesting her about once a week since then.[126] Darla also said that "her dad and her grandfather rub between her legs" and "rub their 'hotdog' there." The girls were put in shelter care and Child Protective Services was notified. There is conflicting evidence about where the girls lived between then and April 1982. The April date is critical because, as Judge Jon E. Stuebbe explained years later, "that is when the case changed from two victims and two suspects to seven more victims and nine named and numerous unnamed suspects."[127] It was during interviews in April 1982 that the girls named the Kniffen boys, Brian and Brandon, as victims, and their parents, Scott and Brenda, as perpetrators. Notably, the judge reviewing the case years later concluded that "the earliest stages of the investigation" were sound. The initial "interviews and notes appear to have sought to find out what, if anything, happened," he concluded, adding that "there does not appear to have been a preconceived conclusion during this period up until April, 1982." Those conclusions alone would seem to implicate Alvin McCuan and Rod Phelps, since the McCuan girls made detailed incriminating statements in October 1981 (and earlier) that have never been impugned.

But the Kniffen boys were in a much different position. They were taken into custody on April 7, 1982, and their parents were eventually prosecuted on the basis of a recorded statement from the boys taken on April 13. The five days of interviewing that occurred in the interim are not well documented, but there were tapes and transcripts of interviews with the Kniffen boys in mid-April. When Judge Stuebbe reviewed those years later in a proceeding challenging the convictions, he concluded "the questions themselves were almost always suggestive of the answer" and "questions that were answered 'wrong' were asked again."[128]

The troublesome convictions here were against the Kniffens, not the McCuans. The Kniffens also made their statements after being taken away from their parents by the state. None of those concerns apply to the statements in October 1981 by the McCuan girls. Indeed, Edward Humes, who is quite critical of this case in his book Mean Justice, allows that in the girls' first interviews "the only molesters mentioned were the father and grandfather."[129] Humes uses this fact to question the validity of all of the allegations that emerged as the investigation unfolded over the next few months. But he never comes to terms with another implication of those initial interviews: even if "the only molesters" were Rod Phelps and Alvin McCuan, then Mary Ann Barbour's concerns were well taken and the case did not originate in wild imaginings.

The medical testimony in the Kniffen and McCuan case has also been the source of considerable criticism, for one reason: Dr. Bruce Woodling was the primary medical expert for the prosecution. Woodling had a novel clinical "test" that later made him the object of derision in the witch-hunt narrative. He employed something that became known as the "anal wink" test (although Woodling actually called it the "wink response" test).[130] The idea behind the test was that stimulation to produce a reflex response of the sphincter muscle would basically have one of two results: there would be tightening among those who had not had regular anal penetration and an actual gaping, or opening, among those conditioned to this response. Dr. Woodling testified that both Brandon and Brian Kniffen had a "marked" response to this test with significant "gaping." Critics have since argued that the "wink response test" was not scientifically validated. The criticism is well taken. But this does not mean that anal "gaping" is an insignificant finding; when verified, it can be quite significant.[131] The problem with Woodling's "test" is that it was too subjective. But the same objection can be made to several of the quirky procedures employed by Dr. Paul, the medical expert for the defense in this case and in McMartin, including what he called the "lateral traction test" and his insertion of fingers in the anus to "test" for anal tone.[132] But Dr. Paul's testimony should not be rejected entirely because of these faults. (He was correct, for example, in stating that synechia—intrauterine adhesions—are not a relevant finding and that formation of the hymen varies significantly.) By the same token, one should not automatically dismiss every observation made by Dr. Woodling.

The expert who testified for the state at a hearing years after the original convictions agreed that what Dr. Woodling described in one of the Kniffen boys—anal dilation over 20 mm without stool present—was significant because "it appears to be a learned response to the body to avoid injury from repeated sodomy." The judge who overturned the convictions in those proceedings noted it is "clear that even under the most recent medical studies" the dilation that Woodling reported observing would still be considered "a very strong indication" of sodomy.[133]

The medical testimony about the McCuan girls was even stronger. After all, the case began with Mary Ann Barbour's concern about vaginal bruising. For all of the attention focused in the witch-hunt narrative on her medical records, there has been surprisingly little attention to precisely what the medical records reflect about the McCuan girls. Humes, who devotes almost twenty pages to the Kniffen and McCuan case, allows in a single sentence that the girls saw "a doctor, who found bruising and swelling and concluded that [Bobbie] had, indeed, been molested."[134]

That is an understatement, to say the least. Dr. Carol Squyres, the pediatrician who had examined the girls in 1980, found them to be extremely abnormal in 1982. She had examined "hundreds of vaginas" in her pediatric practice and testified that "prepubital children do not look like" these young girls. More specifically, she testified that Bobbie's "hymen had been transected," cut at the edges at approximately 4 o'clock and 8 o'clock—findings that would still be considered abnormal today.[135] Dr. Squyres also made statements that would not be considered appropriate now; she testified that sexual activity causes vaginal "rounding," when this is no longer considered a medical indication of abuse.[136]

According to the trial testimony, Dr. Woodling's colposcopic images in 1982 documented vaginal scarring in Bobbie. Dr. Squyres examined these slides[137]; she was in the unique position of having a comparison to her observations two years earlier. The time period is significant because the girls supposedly had no exposure to Phelps during this time—but they had continuous contact with their own parents, who were named as defendants in 1982.

The testimony that compares the 1982 findings to those of 1980 has never been mentioned in the witch-hunt narrative. Dr. Squyres observed "gaping" of the anal area in 1982 that was not present in 1980. She testified that in all her years of practice she had never seen a child who had an anal lining like that in the pictures of Bobbie.[138] In her view, some kind of trauma to the area would have to be the cause. She also testified that she could not see Bobbie's vagina in 1980 without spreading apart the labia. In the pictures in 1982, however, she could see the vaginal mucosa without spreading the labia. This would be a highly unusual finding, but it cannot be confirmed without reviewing the actual slides.

In fact there is strong reason to conclude the McCuan girls were subject to repeated sexual abuse in the period between 1980 and 1982. Even the doctor who testified for the defense concurred with some of these findings. Nathan and Snedeker allow that this concurrence "buttressed intimations of incest in the McCuan family and seriously weakened Alvin and Debbie's protestations of innocence."[139] They do not explain why, given this conclusion, they included both of the McCuans on the dedication page of their book. Further, they do not disclose that Snedeker was representing the Kniffens and McCuans at the time. It would be a violation of Snedeker's ethical obligations to clients, especially during their appeal, to incriminate them; this demonstrates an inherent limitation when a defense attorney coauthors a book that analyzes cases involving his clients.

The focus of the witch-hunt narrative has been on the mental stability of the grandmother, who made a report in January 1980 and then fell apart when she concluded that authorities were doing little in response. It would appear from the medical evidence that her fears were well founded and that the witch-hunt narrative has now enshrined the result that worried her the most: the abuse of the McCuan girls would be minimized or denied. This is not to deny that the case expanded beyond all reason and that there are serious questions concerning the Kniffen boys. Those questions are more perplexing than they are clear. Both of these individuals recanted their statements and they apparently recanted their recantations at some point as well.[140] As the judge put it in 1996, in reversing the convictions of the Kniffens and the McCuans:

> It may be that all of the acts reported actually occurred and that later recantations by Brandon and Brian Kniffen are fabrications as a result of family pressure or personal guilt.[141]

In short, the proceeding that set all four defendants free was a repudiation of how the state interviewed the children in April 1982 and later, but it was not a declaration of the defendants' innocence. Indeed, the McCuan girls never recanted. But this is not reflected in the witch-hunt narrative.

John Stoll and Grant Self

John Stoll was charged in June 1984 with abusing numerous children, including his own son. Four other adults were charged as well: Grant Self, Timothy Palomo, Margorie Grafton, and Glenda Manners. Stoll succeeded in having his conviction overturned in 2004, after serving more years than anyone in the contested Kern County cases. Palomo and Grafton's convictions were reversed by the California Supreme Court in 1989 on the grounds that the trial court improperly excluded a defense psychologist who would have testified that the defendants' personality tests revealed "no signs of 'deviance' or 'abnormality.'"[142] (Ironically, the same people who excoriate pediatricians for diagnosing sexual abuse without the benefit of controlled studies are silent on the lack of "scientific proof" for profile evidence.[143]) As Judge Malcolm M. Lucas noted in dissent, the psychologist was "unable to cite any studies on the validity of the subject tests as applied to individuals charged with either child abuse or incest."[144] Notably, Grant Self's conviction was not overturned in the same case. Instead, he served out his sentence and was then held through the civil commitment statute. He later filed a lawsuit in state court, seeking to set aside his 1984 conviction connected to John Stoll.[145]

Stoll's conviction was set aside because of the recantation of four adults who accused him as children. One of those adults is particularly persuasive because a poem that he wrote as a child supports the idea that he provided false testimony and felt guilty about it at the time. But however persuasive one finds those recantations, there is additional evidence that should also be considered: Stoll's own son has not recanted. The witch-hunt narrative seems to assume that his son's position, which has not wavered over time, should not be taken seriously. But there is no explanation why the charges involving his son should be rejected, other than the fact that children unrelated to Stoll have since recanted. Then again, most, and maybe all, of the charges against him were baseless. This view is supported by the $5.5 million that Kern County officials agreed to pay Stoll in a civil case claiming damages for wrongful conviction.[146]

There is also the matter of Grant Self and Glenda Manners. The witch-hunt narrative never acknowledges the complete story about these two people. Glenda Manners is generally omitted from the discussion entirely. She is not mentioned in Maggie Jones's lengthy story, nor in the chapter about Bakersfield in Nathan and Snedeker's book. Her name does not appear on any of the lists in the witch-hunt canon, even though she was convicted of abusing one of the same children that Grant Self was convicted of abusing. Self, on the other hand, is widely labeled as a witch-hunt victim. Carol Hopkins of the Justice Committee organized a vigil for "innocent victims" including Self.[147]

A few accounts in the witch-hunt narrative allow that Self has a relevant criminal past. According to a detailed internet account that circulated on the witch-hunt list, he had "a few prior troubles with the law and was forbidden by his parole from being around children."[148] Writing in the New York Times, Jones allowed that Self had "a previous conviction of molestation" but said nothing else about it.[149] Those are both serious understatements. Self had more than "a previous conviction" or "prior troubles." He had multiple prior convictions involving sexual contact with multiple children each time. His first arrest for sexually abusing children was in 1976, with three boys (two ten-year-olds and an eight-year-old). Self was charged with oral copulation. He pled to contributing to the delinquency of a minor and was sentenced to one-year suspended and ninety-days in jail. Self was placed on three years of probation, and while on probation he was apprehended for his second sexual offense children—in 1979. Again there were three victims, all boys under the age of fourteen. Self took pictures of some of the acts and instructed one of the boys to take other photographs documenting the sexual activities.[150] The police recovered the photographs, which prove this case beyond any doubt. Self received an eight-year suspended sentence and was sent to a state mental facility.

He was released in 1983 and was supposedly under "supervision" when he moved in with a woman who had a nine-year-old boy. Self was working for John

Stoll at this point, and eventually started renting the pool house in his backyard. By one account, he did so as a ruse because the terms of his community release would not have permitted him to live with a woman who lived with a nine-year-old boy. Jones reported that "Stoll didn't know" that Self had a criminal record or that a mother had recently complained to the sheriff's office that Self had "inappropriately touched her son." The woman with the nine-year-old was Glenda Manners, the boy's maternal grandmother. It was in connection with this child that she was charged with two counts of felony lewd and lascivious behavior and one count of child endangerment. The latter charge stemmed from Manners having "twice witnessed without comment as Self sexually molested [the boy]."[151] Manners did not contest those facts on appeal; nor did she ever challenge her conviction. All that she appealed was the court's denial of probation.[152]

The crimes Glenda Manners observed Grant Self commit were not at the pool house in John Stoll's backyard, although Self apparently listed the pool house as his official residence at the time. Maybe Self sexually abused the boy at Manners's apartment but did not do the same thing at a pool house that attracted multiple children—although his prior convictions involving multiple children would suggest otherwise. Maybe Stoll unwittingly helped Self perpetrate a ruse concerning his supervised release,[153] although it would seem one would be aware if the person allegedly renting the pool house in the backyard did not actually live there. And maybe what Manners saw are things that Stoll knew nothing about. But the witch-hunt narrative never acknowledges these uncertainties, let alone attempt to address them. Instead the narrative has ignored Manners and embraced Self. Bruce Robinson opines, through his popular "religious tolerance" website, that Self is "not guilty of the crimes" and adds that in all likelihood "no molestations occurred."[154] Nathan and Snedeker dedicated their book, in part, to Self—a man who is unquestionably a serial child molester (two of his convictions rested, separately, on photographic evidence and on an adult eyewitness[155]). The earliest of his convictions for child sexual abuse was a guilty plea that he has never contested. Self was held in civil commitment after his prison term ended. In a civil commitment proceeding in 2000, Self denied having any sexual interest in children; he had no explanation for 115 disciplinary charges in prison, including possession of "full frontal nude photographs of children."[156] Self succeeded in getting one of his 1984 convictions set aside—the one connected to John Stoll. The boys in the case, except Stoll's own son, had recanted their testimony. Self then sued Kern County for civil damages and in March 2013 the county agreed to pay him $725,000.[157] What is perhaps most remarkable about this settlement is that it occurred after Self had been arrested again on child sexual abuse charges—this time in Jackson County, Oregon. Four months after settling his civil case against Kern County, Self pleaded guilty to using a child in a display of sexually explicit conduct (a class A felony in Oregon) and two related felonies. He was sentenced to seventy months in prison and three years of post-prison supervision.[158]

Both Nathan and Snedeker and Humes have argued that the excesses of the prosecutions in Bakersfield launched a wave of witch-hunts across the country. What they actually helped launch was a witch-hunt narrative that is so expansive it cannot or will not distinguish between those with legitimate claims of innocence and those who are clearly guilty. The Kniffens and Stoll may well qualify as the former, although this is not entirely clear; but the McCuans and Self certainly do not. There are other Bakersfield defendants, such as Richard Charles Bishop, who also photographed his abusive acts, whose convictions have, appropriately, never been overturned.[159] And there are confusing cases, as with the Pitts case, where convictions were overturned for prosecutorial misconduct and "three of six child victims recanted."[160]

There is no question that the problems identified in the 1986 report on Kern County were serious. They painted a picture of "one of the clumsiest and most destructive child abuse investigations in American history."[161] The harm done to the falsely accused in these cases was enormous. But there is also no question that the evidence of guilt in some of these cases has been ignored or distorted in the subsequent witch-hunt narrative.

BARAN

Location	Pittsfield, MA
Institution	Early Childhood Development Ctr.
Date	1985
Lead Def.	Bernard Baran

The brief description of this case in Satan's Silence gives no special reason to think that Baran's conviction was wrongful, but research into the complete trial transcript and other related documents reveals that the outcome was indeed a miscarriage of justice. There is, however, one important way in which the facts differ from the witch-hunt narrative: the case had nothing to do with ritual abuse.

Bernard Baran was working as an assistant at a day-care center in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, when he was accused of child molestation. The case began with a four-year-old boy who contracted a venereal disease. His mother notified authorities that her son had been sexually abused by Baran at the day-care center. An investigation ensued, and charges involving five other children were added. Baran was tried and convicted in a matter of months.

But nothing in this case is as it initially appears. The strongest statement made by the first boy to complain was taken by William Baughan, a Department of Social Services (DSS) investigator who "substantiated" the sexual abuse claim and referred it for prosecution. But the person the child named in that report was not Bernard Baran. It was the boy's mother's boyfriend, who lived with them at the time. He was never charged with any crime, although the matter was referred to prosecutors after DSS substantiated a complaint involving him.[162] She had already vehemently accused Baran, of course. But what, if anything, her son actually said about Baran became more doubtful over time.

During the trial, the boy did not implicate Baran on the stand, and all charges connected to him were dismissed. Nevertheless, Judge William Simons allowed medical testimony to support the prosecutor's preposterous argument that the first boy got his venereal disease from Baran because Baran was gay and therefore at higher risk himself. Any gay person who works with children is assumed guilty under this approach. The prosecutor, Daniel Ford, even suggested that Baran—who tested negative for gonorrhea—might have taken penicillin between voluntarily talking to the police and being arrested a few days later. But Baran is allergic to penicillin; this fact is stamped on his medical records.[163]

The prosecution seemed to be fueled by homophobia. The prosecutor told the jury that a gay man working in a day-care center was like "a chocaholic in a candy store." (The prosecutor later claimed that he was addressing whether Baran had the opportunity to commit the crimes, but the underlying homophobia is apparent.) Moreover, the bigoted man who led the original charge against Baran—the stepfather of the first boy—complained bitterly about having a gay man employed at the day-care center. A few weeks later, he accused Baran of child molestation.

The DSS report that pointed the finger away from Baran was dated January 17, 1985—a day before the pre-trial hearing began in Baran's criminal trial. Curiously, the report was not stamped as "received" at the district attorney's office until a day after the entire trial ended, about two weeks later. The report was apparently stamped, filed . . . and buried. The defense was never given a copy, and the mother's boyfriend, named by DSS, was never prosecuted. The critical memo was uncovered years later by lawyers representing the insurance companies of the day-care center. Faced with a lawsuit from the family of the first boy, the insurance lawyers did the kind of thorough investigation that was never done in the first instance. Several civil cases eventually settled for nuisance value.

Still, one might wonder, how did charges with such misguided beginnings spread to five other children? One answer is that they did not. The five other children at trial said surprisingly little that actually incriminated Baran. The three older children—two were then four-year-olds and one was five—have all given reasons to doubt that Baran abused them. One boy said so little on the stand that, like the first boy, charges related to him were dismissed. Another boy, added the day of trial, barely said more, but records uncovered in the civil cases document his repeated retractions. The civil investigation also uncovered evidence that the oldest girl told a therapist that "her mother led her to believe that if she didn't say the right words they wouldn't get a lot of money." The remaining two child witnesses were three-year-old girls. One clearly did not prove she was competent to testify.[164] The other was asked, "If someone asks you a question and you know what the answer is, what should you do?" "Bernie touched me," she responded.[165] Both were allowed to testify. There is much more that could be said about the weaknesses in this evidence. Baran's motion for a new trial contains hundreds of pages of "new" evidence from the civil case, plus 392 pages obtained under defense subpoena. The subpoenaed documents are sealed, but several, quoted liberally in the motion, add substantial weight to the already strong case for a new trial.

The Baran case is a challenge to those sympathetic to either side of the witch-hunt narrative. Those sympathetic to Baran seem to have a difficult time accepting the STD test and the implication, borne out in the DSS memo, that the original child in this case was sexually abused—though not by Baran. But someone got away with sexually abusing a child in this case. Those sympathetic to the prosecution have an even larger challenge. There are substantial reasons to think Baran was wrongfully convicted. Those who have defended the conviction point to the "admission" Baran made in 1989 in order to be transferred from the general prison population to the Massachusetts Treatment Center. Baran, who took the stand to proclaim his innocence at trial, told a newspaper reporter years later he made those statements after repeated assaults in prison.[166] Baran prevailed in reversing his conviction years after this section was written. He was freed from prison in 2006.[167]

RUNYAN

Location	Bainsbridge Island, WA
Institution	home day care
Date	1985
Lead Def.	Debbie Runyan

This case is listed on the dedication page of Nathan and Snedeker's book, but it is not discussed in the book. Debbie Runyan was convicted in January 1986 of molesting five girls, including her two daughters, at a day care she ran out of her home. The allegations surfaced when Runyan went on vacation and a distant relative took care of the children. The woman was startled by how sexualized the children were. One girl tried to grab the woman's breasts, another tried to French kiss her, and a third frequently masturbated. After finding a vibrator in drawer in the day care, she conveyed her concern to a parent of one girl. The mother's four-year-old girl had experienced constant redness and vaginal pain that year and two serious bladder infections, one very recently. She had also come home once with choke marks on her neck. Runyan told her mother another child had done it.[168] She attributed the other problems to general hygiene.

Detectives who then interviewed the children were told that Runyan often took the children into the bathroom, locking the door. One child described hearing "buzzing" behind the bathroom door when this happened. Another child described being abused by a "rolling pin, except it was flat on top." Other children said they were abused with "sticks." (The authorities found three vibrators and other sexual paraphernalia in the house.) Runyan's seven-year-old daughter said children were tied up in the garage and described green and white plaid cloth strips used to tie them up. Runyan's roommate turned over strips of that kind, which she said she found in Runyan's bedroom. Runyan's younger daughter used the phrase "monster mommy in the garage."[169] And a pediatrician testified that there were signs of physical abuse in three of the five girls.

It is not clear why this case appears in the dedication of Satan's Silence. The case is not discussed in the book; it is not even spelled correctly on the dedication page (where one sees "Runyon"). The most likely reason is that Runyan's name appears in Mark Pendergrast's book Victims of Memory. But he provided no analysis either; Runyan is just one of several names listed in a single paragraph that has no accompanying documentation.[170]

The children's statements in the case contained unusual and verified details, from the vibrators to the plaid strips of cloth, and there were medical findings to bolster their testimony. Moreover, as reported at the time, Runyan admitted under cross-examination that "she had lied on numerous occasions to family, friends, and police."[171] Indeed, her protestations of innocence grew stranger over time. She originally claimed that she was "set up" by her ex-husband.[172] She never specified how he accomplished this feat since the charges were corroborated in various ways and included several children beyond their own. After her conviction, Runyan expanded her conspiracy theory to include the argument that the prosecutor and trial judge acted for "political reasons."[173] As she made these fantastic claims, her lawyer withdrew from the case, citing "ethical" considerations. In a nine-page decision upholding Runyan's conviction, a unanimous three-judge panel concluded "the record in this case is overwhelming."[174] As they summarized the trial record: it reflects that "children were tied up, gagged and physically injured by Runyan's abuse."[175]

A post-conviction proceeding five years later resulted in an evidentiary hearing to consider Runyan's claim that her oldest daughter had recanted.[176] Runyan's older daughter was clearly troubled about testifying against her mother. The day she testified, a reporter who covered the entire trial wrote that she was "pale and uncomfortable on the witness stand" and "constantly stared at her mother." Nevertheless, the daughter testified she had seen two girls tied up, and "she identified strips of cloth that allegedly had been placed in the mouth of one child."[177] The court found that her affidavit was consistent with memory problems she expressed to her therapist in 1993, but it was "equally clear that her testimony at trial was truthful."[178] None of the other girls who testified at trial have claimed memory loss or otherwise recanted their testimony, including Runyan's other daughter.

FRIEDMAN

Lead Def.	Arnold and Jesse Friedman

Jesse Friedman is also listed on the dedication page of Satan's Silence, although his case was not discussed in the book. Friedman was apprehended in connection with an investigation that originated in 1987 as a child pornography investigation against his father, Arnold Friedman, who was a well-respected teacher in Great Neck, New York. The elder Friedman held after-school computer classes in the basement of his house. He had an interest in child pornography and ordered some from a source that turned out to be law enforcement; they subsequently raided his house. One of the items agents seized was a list of students in the after-school computer classes. Those students were subsequently interviewed, and some revealed they had been sexually abused in the basement of Friedman's house. As more victims were identified, Jesse Friedman, then seventeen, was identified as a participant in the abuse. Jesse eventually pleaded guilty to twenty-five counts of sexual abuse and was sentenced to six to eighteen years in prison. He told the judge, "I am sorry for my actions," and asked for "assistance with my problem," a request to be sent to a federal institution with sex-offender treatment. His father, then fifty-eight, pleaded guilty earlier to distributing child pornography through the mail and to multiple counts of child sexual abuse. He was sentenced to ten to thirty years.

The case was not highly contested at the time; after all, the defendants pleaded guilty. And for at least five years after those guilty pleas, nothing was written to suggest the outcome was inappropriate. Arnold Friedman sent some kind of "open letter" protesting his innocence, but even those who have come to support Jesse Friedman have not challenged his father's conviction by guilty plea. Nevertheless, Nathan included Arnold and Jesse Friedman's names on a list posted on the "Witch Hunt Information Center" in 1994. Because the case was not discussed in the book, it is difficult to know why Nathan considered the convictions to be inappropriate. The answer emerged in 2003 with the release of Andrew Jarecki's movie Capturing the Friedmans. Nathan appears in the film and argues that the Friedman case was part and parcel of the "sex-abuse hysteria" that was sweeping the country at the time. Her role in the film has never been fully explained. After the film was released, Richard Hankin, an editor and producer of the film, described Nathan as "a friend of the [Friedman] family" and as "an intermediary" in the project, raising questions about how the project evolved.[179] Nathan appears in the film as an expert on witch-hunts. She is not identified in the film as a friend of the family.

Capturing the Friedmans raises many questions about the case, but it purports not to take a side. The film was marketed with the tagline "Who Do You Believe?" Whereas the film gives voice to several officials who stand by the conviction, there is no question that it leaves the impression that the case was a miscarriage of justice. Three main objections are put forth in the film. First, investigators are criticized for pressuring the adolescents whom they interviewed. One family that secretly taped the interrogation of their son is featured prominently in presenting the argument that teenage boys were pressured to say they were abused. Second, there is a claim that the police manufactured or exaggerated claims about child pornography in the house. Finally, the film presents portions of a videotaped interview with one of the complainants from the time, who describes being sexually abused at the Friedmans' house but seems to say his recollections of the abuse emerged only after being hypnotized.

On their face, all three of these claims challenge the credibility of the state's version of events. On closer examination, however, there is much less here than meets the eye. Moreover, some relevant facts are left out of the movie. For instance, it omits any mention of a third defendant, outside the family, who pleaded guilty. When confronted with this startling omission, Jarecki responded that Ross Goldstein "did not want to appear" in the film.[180] Why this would prevent someone who was making a film they describe as a documentary from mentioning him has never been explained. The importance of Goldstein was acknowledged in Jesse Friedman's motion for a new trial, filed after the movie was released. In summarizing the facts, Friedman's lawyers allowed that "Jesse knew how detrimental the testimony of this adult witness might be at trial."[181] The film also omits any mention of the two lie detector tests Jesse Friedman failed. Jarecki later defended this choice on the grounds that he thought the results were inconclusive.[182] He did not explain how the editorial choice squares with the idea that the audience was supposed to decide whom to believe. The film also omits any of the dramatic videotape of Jesse describing his own sexual abuse by his father, and his participation in sexual abuse of boys in his family home, on the Geraldo program.[183] Nathan claimed in a 1994 posting on the Witch-Hunt List that the only reason Jesse Friedman gave the interview was the hope that it "would help him during sentencing."[184] In the same post, she claimed the interview was his lawyer's idea and Jesse "felt betrayed because he still ended up with a harsh sentence." But the interview was conducted after Friedman was sentenced, not before.[185] And Jarecki agreed, in a public session after screening the movie in New York City, that Jesse Friedman's lawyer counseled against the interview.[186] Jesse recanted his confession while in prison. As reported in Newsday, Friedman said he "lied to manipulate the media so that people would feel sorry for [me]."[187] The explanation could be equally true of Friedman's current claims of innocence.

The film also casts doubt on the child pornography claim by showing a picture of an empty table and challenging the description of a police investigator that there was a "foot high stack" of such material in plain view. But a year after the film was released, Jesse Friedman's lawyers made a different claim in their appeal: they described the materials as "approximately twenty magazines containing nude photos of adolescent and teenage males." In other words, the quibble seems to be whether twenty magazines constitute a "foot-high stack." (Nathan claimed in 1994 that it was "two or three old magazines.") Jesse's lawyers also argued that these materials were not "interspersed" with classroom materials but rather "were all found behind the piano in Arnold Friedman's private study." They made no mention of the pornographic games found on disks that were interspersed with materials in the classroom.[188]

Finally, the most important claim in the movie, at least from the point of view of challenging Jesse Friedman's conviction, involved hypnosis. The film features portions of a videotaped interview with a man identified as Gregory Doe, who makes statements to the effect that he did not remember being abused until after being hypnotized. Testimony obtained through hypnosis is not considered reliable and would be inadmissible in most states. Friedman's lawyers told the New York Times "they have obtained evidence indicating that some of the other youths who accused the Friedmans" had been hypnotized before testifying to the grand jury.[189] But there are serious questions about the accuracy of the presentation of Gregory Doe in the movie, and no actual evidence was ever offered to prove other complainants had been hypnotized. To the contrary, Dr. Joyce W. Parks filed a sworn affidavit in 2004 stating unequivocally that Doe was her patient and "at no time during this patient's treatment did I ever use hypnosis."[190] Moreover, Friedman's own lawyer cast doubt on the film, describing it as "reliable evidence of nothing." In a hearing on October 3, 2007, Friedman's lawyer said it was fair to characterize the film as "containing interviews, cut and spliced, and taken out of context."[191] It is not known whether the interview with Doe was subject to such techniques. What is clear is that Friedman's lawyers provided no evidence to support their claim that any other complainant in the case had been subject to hypnosis. Accordingly, the court turned down their request to reopen the case.

Other events have cast further doubt on the thoroughness and balance of Jarecki's research. When the film was nominated for an Academy Award, six of the complainants from the time came forward to say it "omitted or distorted important evidence about their cases."[192] Their statements raised important questions about how many of the victims Jarecki actually interviewed. There were fifteen complainants in the case. The film never addressed this question, but Jarecki told an interviewer after the film was released that he had interviewed "more than three" of them. He later filed an affidavit on Jesse Friedman's behalf saying he interviewed "approximately five" of the complainants.[193] It is difficult to imagine how Jarecki could be so unsure of exactly how many of the original complainants he actually interviewed. Moreover, even if it was five, this would mean he interviewed only one-third of the original victims. In other words, Jarecki found "no evidence" of Friedman's guilt, but he never talked to most of the people who could provide such evidence. Jarecki interviewed far more adults who never complained as children that they were abused at the Friedmans.

Recent developments largely support the argument that Jesse Friedman was not the victim of a witch-hunt. In response to a federal appellate court decision that questioned, but did not overturn, the verdict, the Nassau County District Attorney's Office re-opened the case and convened an independent panel of experts to guide an inquiry into the conviction.[194] The nearly three-year investigation ended in June 2013 with the release of a 155-page "Conviction Integrity Review" that concluded "by any impartial analysis, the re-investigation process . . . has only increased confidence in the integrity of Jesse Friedman's guilty plea and adjudication as a sex offender."[195] Among other conclusions, the reviewers found: (1) no evidence that improper police questioning materially tainted the investigation, (2) no credible evidence that hypnosis was used on any complainant, and (3) Friedman's guilty plea was not a product of coercion. The report detailed new information that further supports the outcome of the case, including an incriminating statement by Jesse Friedman's uncle and a psychological evaluation in 1988, never released by the defense, that Jesse Friedman was a "psychopathic deviant" whose personality was "consistent with someone who was capable of committing the crimes with which he was charged."[196] The review also criticized Andrew Jarecki for "misrepresenting Judge Boklan" in Capturing the Friedmans.[197] One important development, discussed in the report, could be seen as supporting Jesse Freidman's position: Ross Goldstein, the third defendant in the case who pleaded guilty, has since recanted his admission of guilt. For several reasons, the reviewers did not consider Goldstein's recantation reliable, including his inability to explain the things he originally told Andrew Jarecki—things Jarecki chose to leave out of the movie.[198] The Case Advisory Panel that oversaw the review included Barry Scheck, the defense lawyer who co-founded the Innocence Project. The Advisory Panel issued a unanimous statement that the Review Team's conclusion that Jesse Freidman was guilty was "reasonable and supported by the evidence."[199] The report is not a binding legal decision and Jesse Friedman has vowed to continue to seek to overturn his conviction through the court system.[200]

Marilynn Malcom's name is also on the dedication page of Nathan and Snedeker's book, although the case is not discussed. Michael Snedeker, Nathan's co-author, represented Malcom years later at a clemency hearing, although this too is not disclosed in the book. Malcom was convicted in 1988 of twelve felony counts of child sexual abuse, involving seven victims including her daughter Julia, then eight years old, and her son Kevin, then twelve. The other children, all younger, attended the Rainbow Christian Daycare Center in her home in Vancouver, Washington. The case began in late January 1987, when one of the children who attended the day care watched a video about sexual abuse and strangers. This boy told his mother about sexual games involving Malcom's daughter and other boys. She called a friend, whose son also attended the day care, and her son apparently confirmed the gist of the story (although the second boy said he was not involved). These mothers phoned the Clark County Sheriff the next day.

One of the boys apparently repeated the story about sexualized games at Malcom's house; the other one did not. Malcom, as would later be documented, soon "took a number of steps attempting to stifle the investigation."[201] This included telling at least three other parents not to let their children be interviewed by the police. These allegations should be handled within the church, she told them. She told another neighbor she was adamant she was not going to let the police talk to her daughter, Julia.

Detective Sharon Krause interviewed Marilynn Malcom and, separately, Julia Malcom on February 6. The girl apparently told the detective she had been molested by her brother and that she told her mother about it. Her mother denied any knowledge. Four days later, Marilynn Malcom called Detective Krause and said her daughter had fallen off a stool and "hit herself on the heel" and was bleeding from her vagina. Malcom said she did not want to touch her daughter "because of what has been going on."[202] The detective told Malcom to take her daughter to the doctor, who later reported that Julia was "too uncomfortable for him to do the exam" and that Julia wanted Detective Krause to "hold her hand and help her while at the doctor's, not her mother."[203] The girl was examined, under a sedative, two days later by Dr. Brigitte I. Mengelberg, who reported there was significant evidence of anal and vaginal trauma.[204]

While the investigation continued, the younger children who attended the day care implicated Kevin and then Marilynn Malcom. Kevin confessed to sexual activities with young boys at the day care and pleaded guilty in Juvenile Court on April 20, 1987. That afternoon, Detective Krause interviewed Julia again. The eight-page report of this interview indicates that Julia disclosed "there had been a number of sexual contacts between her and her mother which occurred over several years of time."[205] She also made statements indicating her mother had sexual contact with several children at the day care. Kevin then confirmed that his mother was involved in the abuse. Marilynn Malcom was charged with sexual abuse against her son, daughter, and other children later in April.

The parents of some of the children who attended the day care continued to question their children in the coming weeks. The state would later describe what happened as "an investigator's nightmare," including the claim that Marilynn Malcom killed a little girl. One parent was described as "hindering the investigation by her improper questions and lack of cooperation with the prosecutor's office."[206] A few parents also started complaining that Detective Krause did not believe their children. The detective interviewed one of the boys on June 2, at which time he retracted recent allegations and said he lied about many things because of pressure from his parents. Notably, he did not recant the basic claims against Kevin or Marilynn Malcom.

Malcom was charged with sexual abuse of all of the children, but the trial and the main witnesses were her own two children, who never made the most fantastic allegations and who were much older than the other children. Malcom was convicted by a twelve-person jury. She was then evaluated in advance of sentencing. The Sentencing Report and Psychological Evaluation noted "indications of deception" in response to the relevant questions about sexual activity. The examiner, whose credentials, methods, and findings were never challenged in any later proceedings, concluded this was "a clear-cut case of old-fashioned denial."[207] The conclusion was seconded by Dr. Kirk Johnson, who had been hired by Malcom's mother and concluded, after reviewing the same materials, that Malcom was "highly manipulative." Years later, after her release from prison, Malcom claimed in an editorial in the local newspaper that those reports "were not accepted by Judge Morgan."[208] The claim is flatly contradicted by the Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law signed by Judge J. Dean Morgan on February 5, 1988, in support of a sentence with "aggravated circumstances."[209] Malcom's conviction was upheld on appeal, although she also claimed years later in a petition for clemency that she had been "without recourse in the appellate court."[210]

The clemency petition—prepared by Michael Snedeker—included a report from a medical expert who contradicted the report about Julia's injuries and a statement of recantation by Julia Malcom. The recantation was reportedly written by Marilynn Malcom, not by Julia.[211] And it was written after Julia started rooming with a woman who had become Malcom's friend in prison. When prosecutors asked Julia if they could interview her about her alleged retraction, she said yes—but later her lawyer indicated "he had reconsidered and would not allow an interview."[212] Her attorney also denied access to the two counselors and their records from 1987 to 1995, when Julia was treated for sexual abuse by her mother.[213] Prosecutors sought those records in the hopes of finding detailed information that would contradict the "retraction."

There are several reasons the recantation is suspect. First, the claim that her incriminating statements were made after repeated, coercive police interviews is not supported by the report of the interview of April 20, 1987. This is the first time she was asked about abuse by her mother, and she made a detailed statement. Second, her recantation is contradicted by statements her brother swore she made in family counseling sessions that he also attended.[214] Third, her recantation is contradicted by statements by a close friend who swore Julia confided in her when they were sixteen years old about sexual abuse by her mother when she was a child. The same friend reported that shortly before the recantation Julia told her not talk to anyone who was trying to keep her mother in prison—a request eerily similar to Marilynn Malcom's request to all of the parents not to speak to police when the case was first investigated. This friend also reported that Julia said her mother was going to get out of prison and sue the state, and they were going to "get a lot of money and move to Montana."[215] There are, of course, obvious reasons for a family member to recant truthful disclosures about abuse. Possible motivations include a desire to reunite, feelings of guilt, and coercion by the perpetrator. Another is the hope of monetary gain. All of those possibilities potentially fit this case.

Dr. Steven Gabaeff, the medical expert offered on Malcom's behalf, disagreed with all of the findings from the examination of Julia in 1987. Without an independent assessment of the slides, which are not part of the public record, it is impossible to evaluate this disagreement. But it is worth noting that the doctor did not try to provide any explanation for why Julia was bleeding from her vagina; nor did he try to explain how his view that her findings were normal would be consistent with the symptom. He also did not provide any opinion about Malcom's absurd claim that her daughter's vaginal bleeding was caused by falling off a stool.

Snedeker offered the clemency board an affidavit from Maggie Bruck, a psychology professor at Johns Hopkins University, who concluded that none of the statements from anyone in the case were reliable—except the recent recantation by Julia Malcom. Bruck's lengthy analysis of whether the interviews with the children were coercive was silent on the possibility that coercion might be involved in this would-be recantation. Nor did Bruck comment on the discrepancy between Julia's claim that she "had no sexual knowledge" at age eight and therefore could not possibly have made those statements to Detective Krause, and the assertion in her recantation that she was raped by a babysitter at age four and still remembers how painful it was. Notably, neither Julia's older brother nor any of the others involved in the case have ever recanted. Anita Peterson, chair of the Clemency and Pardons Board and also a psychologist, stated she "had some considerable problems" with Bruck's report after she "went back and cross-checked Dr. Bruck's assertions."[216] Peterson concluded that Bruck had "lost her objectivity." The board voted 4-0 to deny the petition.

There is no doubt that some of the parents in this case damaged the state's case by overinterviewing their children. But the charges against Marilynn Malcom pre-dated those events, and her conviction was based on the testimony of her own two children, who never made such claims. The older child has always stood by his testimony, and the would-be recantation of the younger one is dubious on many levels. Malcom's subsequent efforts to overturn her conviction in federal court have all failed.

GLENDALE MONTESSORI

Location	Stuart, FL
Institution	Glendale Montessori School
Date	1987
Lead Def.	James Toward

James Toward's name is also on the dedication page of Nathan and Snedeker's book, although the case as well is not actually discussed. It stems from abuse allegations at the Glendale Montessori School in Stuart, Florida, where James Toward was headmaster. The first official record that there might be sexual abuse at the preschool came through the Child Abuse Registry Hotline on June 25, 1987. The caller reported highly sexualized behavior by a two-and-a-half-year-old girl. She lay on top of her mother and started "pumping" her; when her mother asked what she was doing, the little girl said "screwing." The girl also asked her mother to put her hand in the child's panties and "make her feel good." When asked if someone did this to her, the girl said "Mr. T," the name children used for James Toward.[217] The police interviewed these parents, who apparently removed their child from the school. Nothing else happened at that point, even though the case would later be said to have all the markings of a modern witch-hunt. But the witch-hunt narrative has never acknowledged this initial warning sign or the minimal response to it. Another complaint about possible sexual abuse at Glendale Montessori was received on the Child Abuse Registry Hotline two months later, on August 21. A police investigator contacted the parents of a four-and-a-half-year-old boy who had "feigned illness, screamed, cried and locked himself in the bathroom" to avoid going to school. The parents called the hotline after their son grabbed his father's hand and rubbed it against the boy's genitals. The boy told his mother he learned that from "Mr. T." Neither of these early disclosures could possibly have been caused by repetitive interviews or public hysteria. The reports occurred the same day as the observed behavior, and the matters had not yet become public. The following day, a search warrant was executed at the home of James Toward. The boy had told authorities he was taken to Toward's house, where he and several other boys were photographed naked, wearing masks, bandanas, and cowboy hats. The boy said those items would be found in the closet of a spare bedroom. According to the search affidavit, costume masks, bandanas, and cowboys hats "were located where the child had described." The child was also "able to describe the entrance to the home," even though Toward told the police he had never taken children from the school to his home.[218]

A third complaint pertaining to the Glendale Montessori came on September 11, 1987, when the Stuart Police Department received a call from a woman in Tennessee, who was visiting her mother in Knoxville and had not been in Florida during the events in late August. They reported that on September 3, the grandmother had taken their son to see a pediatrician about an upper respiratory infection. In the examination room, the boy reportedly said "in a very frightened voice, Nana, he won't have to touch my penis will he?" When asked why he didn't want the doctor to touch his penis, the boy reportedly said it was a "secret" that "I can't tell you." His parents arranged for the boy to see a social worker in Knoxville. After that visit, the boy told his mother that he had been to "Mr. T's" house and "we were touching." He said that "Miss Brenda," who worked at the preschool, made him take off his clothes. The parents, who had never given permission for the boy to visit Toward's house, contacted the Stuart Police Department.[219]

The police proceeded to interview children and talk to parents. The investigation went on for months before James Toward and Brenda Williams were charged with the sexual abuse of six boys. As the investigation continued, other teachers were considered suspects; one lost her teaching license in what was perhaps the most dubious aspect of the case. Brenda Williams eventually pleaded guilty in June 1989 and was sentenced to ten years in prison.

There was a pre-trial hearing in Toward's case in August 1989, lasting eight days and including testimony from all of the children connected to the original charges and some of their parents. The state also introduced sworn statements from teenagers, who claimed Toward had offered them "money or gifts for sex." They described Toward's sexual behavior as "sick" and "freakish." Prosecutors stated the intention to introduce this evidence if the defense raised Toward's character as an issue.[220] This is relevant only to the extent that Toward's "proper British demeanor" led some to conclude he could not possibly commit such crimes.

There was also significant circumstantial evidence concerning the claim that Toward had made, and disposed of, child pornography material in the months before his arrest. The six boys testified they were photographed by a "movie camera" and by a camera where the picture "came right out."[221] There was also testimony at trial from a clerk who sold Toward a Polaroid camera two years earlier. The clerk remembered Toward because he made repeated references to sex when he bought the camera.[222] But the camera was never recovered. Nor did the police find the video camera described by the children. They did find the original box for the video camera in Toward's attic.[223] Toward claimed he never owned either one. We will never know how he would have tried to explain that fact, or the evidence concerning his safety deposit box. A bank clerk testified she saw "bundles of cash and videotapes" in his safety deposit box on several occasions in 1986. Bank records showed that Toward's wife, Rosario, opened the box six days after his arrest. By the time police executed a search warrant, the box was empty.[224] Faced with this evidence, Toward entered into a plea agreement in exchange for a twenty-seven-year prison sentence, ten years of probation, and an agreement not to prosecute his wife. He also waived the pre-sentence report, which assured that "character evidence" against him would not become part of the official record.

The case became more contested in the years after his conviction, when additional civil suits were filed by families who were never involved in the criminal case. One of those lawsuits, filed three years later, was "aggressively defended" by an insurance company.[225] Insurance companies, which quickly paid as much as $1 million in settlements to some of the original complainants in the criminal case, viewed some of the later civil claims as baseless. Given the legal requirement to handle claims in "good faith" and the danger of paying enormous punitive damages if they are found to be in "bad faith," one can reasonably assume that the evidence for some of the later claimants was weak. By the same token, however, the earlier claims were paid quickly and to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs.

Toward first became part of the witch-hunt narrative when his name appeared on lists prepared by Professor Mary de Young, who never provided any supporting details or original documentation.[226] The False Memory Syndrome Foundation (FMSF) started writing about the case in 2008, after someone they described as a "retracting student" reportedly contacted them. It is not clear why this person, who has never identified himself or herself publicly, would be considered a "retractor" since, by the person's own description, the family never participated in any charges or lawsuits. It is unclear, in other words, that there were any charges to retract. But this person apparently recalled being subject to hypnosis in an effort to uncover memories of abuse at the school. The FMSF also advanced the argument that there were "suggestive interviews," purporting to quote numerous snippets from an interview that is never footnoted.[227] But none of these claims deal directly with the children who had withdrawn from the preschool before any charges were made public, or with the fact that specific items described in the original search affidavit were found in a search of Toward's house, a place he said the children had never visited.

Toward made no effort to challenge his guilty plea, so the facts of the case were not subjected to any post-conviction judicial scrutiny. Instead, he offered his own version of the facts, without the danger of cross-examination. Toward later claimed he did not even know he had pleaded guilty to child sexual abuse. But the actual transcript of that proceeding proves otherwise.[228] Toward declined all interview requests from journalists over the years, making an exception for a writer who befriended his wife and who recently wrote sympathetically about his allegedly false conviction.[229]

When Toward's prison sentence ended in 1999, the state petitioned to hold him under involuntary civil commitment. The petition included psychological evaluations by Alan J. Waldman, M.D., and Ada Rameriz-Brouwer, Ph.D., both of whom concluded Toward was a pedophile who was likely to reoffend.[230] There were extended legal proceedings and appeals, first over whether this petition violated the original plea agreement, and then over various aspects of the civil commitment law in Florida known as the Jimmy Ryce Act, which itself changed over time. Toward was released in 2010, at age eighty, with strict conditions, including immediate deportation to England and an order, which cannot possibly be enforced, for sex offender counseling.

SCHILDMEYER

Location	Edgewood, IA
Institution	Sunshine Preschool
Date	1989
Lead Def.	Michael Joseph Schildmeyer

This is another case included on the dedication page of Satan's Silence without providing any details or referencing any source material, so it impossible to know why Nathan concluded this was a false conviction. The case had not appeared on any other lists of alleged false convictions when Satan's Silence was published. It did appear, however, on a list of "ritual child abuse" convictions prepared by Believe the Children and available online.[231] The only source about this case on that site was a single newspaper article.[232] Presumably, Nathan included the case because Believe the Children listed it as a true conviction for ritual child abuse.

Neither Nathan nor Believe the Children is right about this case. Nathan is wrong in claiming it was a false conviction; Believe the Children is wrong is claiming it was a ritual-abuse conviction. The case began in April 1989, when a four-year-old boy in Edgewood, Iowa told his parents about a man named Mike at the Sunshine Preschool and Day Care Center who made him do things he did not like and made him promise not to tell anyone. The center was an unlicensed home day-care center operated by Kim Schildmeyer, who opened the business in 1988, the same year she married Michael Schildmeyer. On the basis of the statements from the four-year-old boy, Michael Schildmeyer was arrested on April 4, 1989, on a single charge of second-degree sexual assault. He was tried and convicted by a jury in July; the primary witness was the four-year-old boy.

But the state's case also included testimony from Janet Fitzpatrick, an employee at the center who testified that on five to ten occasions she had seen him take the four-year-old into the bathroom and shut the door; sometimes when they re-emerged, she said, it appeared the boy had been crying.[233]

Schildmeyer denied the charges and testified that the boy "could have become confused over incidents in which Schildmeyer helped the victim with a zipper after he urinated."[234] In point of fact, there is no evidence that the boy would have required that kind of assistance; moreover, the boy's testimony specifically included Schildmeyer sucking his penis, which the boy called his "nubbin."[235] According to an Iowa assistant attorney general who reviewed the evidence in the case, the initial statements "were entirely unsolicited and spontaneous and remained substantially consistent through trial."[236] The Iowa Court of Appeals agreed, noting it was impressed with the boy's "consistency, recall, endurance under pressure."[237] There were no allegations of ritualistic abuse in this case.

What began as a straightforward case with one allegation, however, later "exploded from one case into many others," according to Delaware County Attorney Jim Nussle, who requested the assistance of the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation. According to the Des Moines Register, children "reported drugging, animal slayings, and illicit photos" taken at the center.[238] The "explosion" apparently originated in the investigation by the Iowa Department of Human Services, which continued to investigate the case after Schildmeyer was arrested and charged in connection with the four-year-old boy. As later described by the Iowa Department of Justice:

> This investigation took the form of videotaped interviews with approximately forty-five children. Many of the children were interviewed on two or three occasions during this process, with the majority of the DHS interviews taking place during the months of May and June 1989.[239]

The videotapes were never used in any administrative and judicial proceedings, so it is not possible to assess the specific content of the children's statements or the nature of the questions. The Iowa Department of Justice, which reviewed all of this evidence and much more, concluded:

> While several of the children have reported further abusive incidents, it is difficult to determine in our opinion if these reports are the result of actual abuse or if they result from suggestions, references and questions raised with the children or in their presence during the past year and a half since the original disclosure.[240]

This aspect of the investigation demonstrated how difficult it is to interview a significant number of young children. Having conducted the kind of careful evaluation of the evidence that was lacking in the early stages of the McMartin case, the decision was made that additional charges could not be proven. The children's statements, beyond the original four-year-old, were not sufficiently credible and consistent. In other words, this case seems to demonstrate a careful and sound response to what was apparently a problematic DHS investigation. A similar approach in the McMartin case might have resulted in a conviction based on a few of the September responders and no further action.

The Schildmeyer case is complicated. It involved the original charge and an extensive investigation afterward. The original charge had no satanic or ritualistic overtones, and the evidence of guilt was strong enough that it is absurd to classify the case as a witch-hunt. The investigation that followed the charges is much more problematic and difficult to evaluate. It clearly involved fantastic statements, but these statements were not taken at face value. To the contrary, they were apparently seen as lacking in credibility, so it does not make sense to call even this part of the case a witch-hunt.

Lead Def.	Patrick Figured & Sonja Hill

Patrick Figured and Sonja Hill's names are also contained in the list at the front of Satan's Silence of those supposedly wrongfully incarcerated for ritual abuse, but they are never mentioned in the book. There is no indication Nathan did any original reporting on this case. The case was, however, featured earlier by Jonathan Harris, webmaster of the Witch Hunt Information Center, who called the decision upholding their conviction "outrageous."

Sonja Hill's mother ran an unlicensed day care out of her rural home in Smithville, North Carolina. Patrick Figured, who was married to someone else, was intimately involved with Sonja Hill at the time. Figured and Hill were charged in connection with the sexual abuse of three children at the day care in July 1988. Figured agreed to plead guilty to three counts of first-degree sex offense (one for each child) in exchange for a life sentence and an agreement not to proceed against Hill. The district attorney, who was leaving office soon, broke this agreement by recharging Hill four months later. As a result, Figured was eventually allowed to withdraw his plea. He was later found guilty by jury. Hill pleaded guilty to lesser charges. One wonders why Jonathan Harris and Debbie Nathan have rallied around Figured or Hill.

The answer appears to stem from the "bizarre" aspects of this case: to wit, all three children testified that Figured abused them with a screwdriver, two of the children described abuse involving dog urine, and one child described abuse with a candle. There was also testimony about a cape and a mask, things that the child, who went into detail, clearly understood as Halloween costumes. (It is clear from his full statements that the child did not think Figured was the devil or part of some cult.) Seizing on a brief (and insignificant) passage about "submissive dogs" and urination, Harris dubbed State v. Figured the "outrageous appellate decision of the decade."[241]

Harris provided links to the defendant's brief on appeal—apparently the extent of his research into this case—but not to the court's unanimous decision upholding the conviction. He made only selective use of the court's decision, which held that there was such overwhelming evidence of Figured's guilt that any error involved in admitting some psychological testimony was immaterial to the outcome.[242] The court described the extensive evidence of opportunity (since Figured purported to offer alibi evidence) and reported there was corroboration of the abuse by medical evidence. Harris described the medical evidence as "no more than medical signs (anal dilation) which are found in about 1/3 of nonabused children."

But this trial took place in 1992. The doctors who examined the children were quite familiar with the McCann study, which compared the genitalia and anuses of abused and non-abused children. Although McCann's study, and others like it, caused professionals to discount the strength of certain findings, the study should not be read, as Harris and others do, to dismiss any evidence of anal laxity.[243] What Dr. Sherry L. St. Claire found for one of the two children she examined in this case was recorded in Duke Medical Center notes as "extremely abnormal anal exam." She testified that the boy's "soft tissue area was gone, that his blood vessels were enlarged and that his anal canal was so wide that she could see into his bowels. Dr. St. Claire testified this was one of "the most significant medical exams she has ever seen" in all her years of examining children as part of the Duke Child Protection team.[244] The other boy was seen separately by Dr. Marcia Herman-Giddens, a professor of pediatrics at Duke University. The doctor observed anal muscles that opened so wide as to reveal the anal canal. She testified to seeing "an area of healing trauma inside the anal canal" and ruled out the (slim) possibility of congenital pigmentation when she observed further healing. These injuries were consistent with the use of a screwdriver. They required, according to Dr. Herman-Giddens, "some force object from outside the body." These are not injuries commonly, or even rarely, found in non-abused children.

The defendant had more than ample opportunity to abuse these children, although Harris suggests, without specific support, that there were only "rare occasions" when Figured was in the house. In fact, Pat Figured moved to North Carolina over Memorial Day weekend in 1988. He was unemployed and needed a place to live. He "stayed at the day-care home frequently until he got a job," and thereafter several witnesses testified they saw his distinctive white Corvette there frequently "during the daytime."[245]

This case was not born of an overanxious parent, as is often claimed about day-care abuse cases. Rather, it began with persistent and unexplained symptoms that caused a mother to take her daughter to the pediatrician in July and August 1988, after her daughter complained that her "lulu" (vagina) hurt. The medical evidence was strong, and there is no good reason to think this case was an injustice.

KELLERS

Location	Austin, TX
Institution	Fran's Day Care
Date	1991
Lead Def.	Daniel & Francis Keller

The Kellers were convicted in 1992 of aggravated sexual assault of a young girl who attended their home day-care business, Fran's Day Care, in Travis County, Texas. The Kellers were not charged with fantastic or incredible crimes but were also charged with sexually abusing two boys; those charges were dismissed after the Kellers received forty-eight-year sentences in the first case. There was substantial evidence in the first case that went far beyond the girl's statement, including medical evidence of vaginal injury and a detailed adult confession by a friend of the Kellers who participated in the abuse on at least one occasion. Debbie Nathan does not provide any reason for including the Kellers in the dedication page of her book, but it is apparent that the Keller case became part of the witch-hunt narrative through a single article in Texas Monthly entitled "The Innocent and the Damned."[246] Although that article raises questions about claims made by some children months after the case began, it does not impugn the basic evidence on which the Kellers were convicted.

The case began on August 15, 1991, when a mother picked up her three-year-old daughter at the day care and the girl said that she did not like "Danny." Her mother inquired why and the girl reportedly said Danny "had hurt her and pulled down her panties and he poo'd and pee'd on her head."[247] Later that day, the girl cried when she urinated, screaming "it hurts, it hurts." The girl was taken to Brackenridge Hospital, where the emergency physician found medical evidence that was unusually strong for a sexual abuse case. Dr. Michael Mouw testified that he observed "a tear of the posterior fourchette" and "what appeared to be lacerations of the hymen at three and 9:00."[248]

The investigation against Daniel Keller quickly expanded to include other alleged victims and perpetrators. Three other adults were indicted for sexually abusing children at Fran's Day Care: Douglas Perry, a friend of the Kellers, and two other adults. Perry provided a written statement to investigators on July 7, 1992, describing a Friday afternoon in August 1991 when he was present at the Kellers, along with the other adults. Perry described a beer party that resulted in several adults sexually abusing a girl and a boy who were under the Kellers' care. According to Perry, "Fran had a pen and was sticking it in and out of the little girl's vagina."[249] This account was entirely consistent with the fresh injuries on the girl who was taken to the emergency room after screaming in pain when she went to the bathroom that evening. Perry identified the girl when shown a videotape.

The investigation grew to include at least forty-two children who had attended Fran's Day Care. Some number of those children eventually made claims that were bizarre, and from my perspective impossible to believe. Some number of parents came to describe the case in terms of ritual abuse. An article in the local newspaper detailed those claims after the Kellers had been convicted.[250] Five parents spoke to the newspaper; they represented a total of four children and claimed that these children had, among other things, witnessed the murder of a baby, taken airplane rides, and dug up graves. Apparently on the basis of those statements and the fact that the Kellers were convicted, the case was considered by some to be proof of satanic ritual abuse in a day-care setting.[251] But the outlandish claims were not part of the original criminal case against the Kellers, and they apparently involved only a small number of the parents and children who were interviewed in the case.

The trial highlighted some of the difficulties with child witnesses. A five-year-old girl who testified "alternately denied and admitted that anything bad happened to her." The most incriminating statement that she made "was not admissible evidence because the child whispered the statement to her sister" and the court reporter was not able to record it.[252] But there was also the testimony of the emergency room doctor and of the Kellers' friend, Perry, who had recanted his written confession by the time of trial; even Gary Cartwright, who criticized many aspects of the case, called the confession "hard to refute." Perry eventually pleaded guilty to indecency with a child by contact, and charges against the other two adults were dropped because the primary evidence against them was the recanted confession.[253] The Kellers were both convicted by jury. They appealed, raising various objections, including the use of Perry's confession. But they did "not question the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the convictions."[254] They lost their appeal.

Given the number of adult participants described by Perry, one family later brought a civil action seeking monetary damages for their failure to report the abuse. They alleged that Francis Keller had confided in Perry's wife "with regard to Daniel Keller's abusive habits towards children."[255] There was also Perry's statement about the adults present at the beer-and-sex party that Friday afternoon in August 1991. The civil case went all the way to the Texas Supreme Court, which overruled an appellate decision that would have allowed the plaintiffs a chance to prove their case. The Texas Supreme Court agreed that the plaintiff's children "are within the class of persons whom the child abuse reporting statute was meant to protect, and they suffered the kind of injury that the Legislature intended to prevent." The court also agreed that the situation described constituted a violation of the child-abuse reporting law, but disagreed that the law created a private right of action for civil damages. "It would take a stone heart not to sympathize with the . . . family," the Austin American-Statesmen editorialized before concluding there were sound public policy reasons for not allowing this kind of lawsuit.[256]

It would appear that those citing the Keller case as a "wrongful conviction" have not actually read the Texas Monthly article. Cartwright does not proclaim the Kellers innocent on all counts. Rather, he argues that "parents have convinced themselves that the couple are guilty of much worse" than sexual abuse. Cartwright argues that "what started as a simple accusation—'Danny hurt me'—became an avalanche of charges that overwhelm the senses." His story is a cautionary tale about the escalation of sexual abuse charges. But it is not a wrongful conviction story. Cartwright acknowledges:

> There is certainly evidence that the [name omitted] girl was sexually abused—the medical report, Doug Perry's statement, the child's own allegations, which were unusually lurid and detailed for such a case.[257]

He cautions that "it is important when investigating allegations like those against the Kellers to distinguish between sexual abuse and the far more bizarre satanic ritual abuse."[258] The caution is appropriate for those who would list this case as proof of satanic ritual abuse in day-care centers. But it is also appropriate for those, like Nathan, who include this case on a list of false convictions. The actual conviction in this case was solid and did not involve any claims of satanic ritual abuse. The Austin Chronicle wrote a story about the case in March 2009, claiming it was "likely" that the Kellers were innocent. The article claimed that Dr. Mouw "wasn't sure" if he would have come to the same conclusion today as he did in 1991.[259] But his reported explanation—that he knows more now about "normal variants" in hymens than he did then—does not make sense. First, Dr. Mouw testified to more than a "laceration of the hymen at three and 9:00," which is not a "normal variant" of the hymen. Second, he also testified to a "tear of the posterior fourchette." This has nothing to do with the hymen and would still be considered an indication of abuse. The reporter states that Dr. Mouw "was contacted" for the story; there is no indication he had the medical report when responding to their questions. Since his original testimony made it clear that he "didn't have any independent recollection" of the exam and "would have to review the record," there is no reason to think a conversation about the case eighteen years after the fact should be given any weight.

HALSEY

Location	Lanesborough, MA
Institution	Lanesborough Elementary School
Date	1992
Lead Def.	Robert Halsey

Robert Halsey is also listed at the front of Satan's Silence as someone wrongly incarcerated, but the case was not discussed in the book or in any of Nathan's other writings. This case name also likely came directly from Jonathan Harris's Witch Hunt Information Center. But Harris cited nothing more than an innocuous article in the Boston Globe to support his claim that the case was a witch-hunt.[260] A careful analysis of the trial transcript indicates there was overwhelming evidence of Halsey's guilt.

Robert Halsey, sixty, was a part-time bus driver in western Massachusetts in 1990, when he was given a route that covered a remote part of Lanesboro, where he was a lifelong resident. The "bus" was actually a GM Suburban van, and the route covered the homes of a handful of kindergartners who arrived at school shortly after noon every day and left after 3:00 p.m. Sometimes, Alex and Wade Watkins, five-year-old twins, were the only passengers in Halsey's van. He drove this route for the entire 1990–91 school year, and part of the following year. In February 1992, Halsey was transferred to a different route, but the circumstances surrounding his transfer were kept quiet for almost a year.

The case began eleven months later, shortly after Alex and Wade Watkins's father handed out cigars in celebration of a new birth in their family. With cigar smoke permeating the house, the twins suddenly began talking about their former bus driver, also an avid cigar smoker; Halsey smoked cigars on the bus, and sometimes he used lit cigars to intimidate the children. The twins described various forms of physical abuse on the bus, including restraints with rope and duct tape, and abuse with a plastic baseball bat. They also described (in the words of a child) being anally raped by Halsey in a wooded area next to a desolate road he often used as a shortcut. Mr. Watkins contacted the police immediately. This all happened over a weekend, and the boys each received a simple forensic interview on Monday morning.

There were no repeat interviews, the boys disclosed significant details after the most open-ended questions, and they were interviewed almost immediately after disclosure. The session lasted forty-five minutes, during which time Alex told a detailed story of physical and sexual abuse. He described, among other things, being taken off the bus, near the pond on Nobody's Road, and sexually abused and humiliated in the woods. Interviewed separately, Wade told a similar story. He said Halsey "put his finger in my butt" many times.

The police arrested Halsey that night at his home. After waiving the right to an attorney, Halsey gave a bizarre statement filled with non sequiturs, sexual innuendo, and lies.[261] Halsey was charged with multiple counts of rape, assault, and battery. Parents soon learned that Halsey had been transferred in 1992 after a young girl's parents lodged a complaint about inappropriate "tickling." It turns out Halsey had also been removed from the approved driver list in bordering Mt. Greylock School District.

The main witnesses in the case were the twins. Alex Watkins described a varied pattern of what adults would see as humiliation, intimidation, and physical and sexual abuse. He also described being anally penetrated: "He told me that he was sticking his finger in my butt."[262] He described going to Halsey's house as well on occasion and being forced to sit in a box of smelly kitty litter while Halsey played pornographic videotapes. Wade, his brother, described, among other things, Halsey putting candy "down his pants" and masturbating in front of them on the bus. The third child to testify, Lucy Cohen, had moved to Florida with her family before Halsey's sudden reassignment in February 1992. Interviewed by police in Florida, where the family had not maintained contact with anyone near Pittsfield, Lucy quickly corroborated several aspects of the twins' story, including how Halsey would take children off the bus one at a time, near a pond.

The children's testimony was corroborated by physical evidence. For example, the twins described being chased by a grocery cart in the area off Nobody's Road in 1990–91. One of the two men who live on that road testified he found a cart in the same location in 1991. He also found pornography in the area, but this testimony was prohibited because the children did not mention pornography in the woods—just at his house. The twins further described an impressive constellation of items later found in Halsey's home: guns, knives, duct tape, and rope. Though those items might seem commonplace, the descriptions in some cases were quite specific. A small black pocketknife and a swordlike dagger with a hand on the handle, for example, were among the items that matched the descriptions provided by the boys. The twins also provided an accurate description of Halsey's house—a place Halsey claims they had never been to. They gave accurate descriptions of the inside of the house.

The medical evidence that the twins had been sexually abused was beyond dispute. A pediatric specialist testified that both boys had multiple lacerations inside the anus. In both cases, the lesions were in a pattern considered by the American Academy of Pediatrics to be "diagnostic of penetration by a foreign object into the anus." All the defense could do was suggest that the boys might have been raped by someone else—but these insinuations were not supported by actual evidence. The boys' pediatrician testified to having made additional physical findings that were "supportive," but not diagnostic, of sexual abuse. Once, their mother was so worried about both twins having an itchy and irritated anus that she discussed the matter with the pediatrician. The doctor told her it was either pinworms or sexual abuse. The mother considered the possibility of sexual abuse and eliminated it because she could not imagine it happening either at school or at home, let alone "en route." As a result, the boys took medicine for pinworms.

Halsey was convicted, sentenced to two consecutive life terms, and lost all subsequent appeals. But none of these facts have kept Halsey's name out of the witch-hunt narrative. He has been "sponsored" by the advocacy organization that embodies the narrative.[263] They have apparently relied on an account written by the same freelance writer who wrote about James Watt, without mentioning that six children in the case contracted venereal disease. Her account of Halsey's case is equally flawed, leaving out virtually all of the evidence of guilt.

SMITH & ALLEN

Location	Lorain, OH
Institution	Head Start Program
Date	1993
Lead Def.	Nancy Smith & Joseph Allen

Nancy Smith's name is also on the dedication page of Nathan and Snedeker's book, but her case is not discussed. Her codefendant, Joseph Allen, is not listed on the dedication page, but the National Center for Reason and Justice, an organization with which both Nathan and Snedeker are affiliated, has championed his case as a false conviction. Smith was a bus driver for the Head Start Program in Lorain, Ohio; the case began when a child told her parents in May 1993 that Smith had taken children to Allen's house, where they were bound, molested, and raped by the two adults. Smith and Allen were convicted by a jury, and their convictions were upheld on appeal in 1996.[264]

Smith has always maintained she did not even know Allen. This was her primary defense at trial, along with an attack on the credibility of the child witnesses. Allen's main argument on appeal was that it was unduly prejudicial to allow a witness to testify about how Allen raped her in 1985. (Allen pleaded guilty to those charges.) The case is complicated and merits more detailed attention than space allows here, but it is worth mentioning because of various strange statements made by some children. Before Allen was identified, several children described him as a "black man with spots," and others said he was a "white man painted black." These statements, which appear inconsistent and unlikely at first glance, were borne out when Allen was identified and apprehended. He is a black man with skin pigmentation problems; his face, legs, shoulders, hands, ankles, knees, buttocks, and penis all appear to be covered with white spots.

Furthermore, before Allen was apprehended, several children said he had dressed up like a woman in a pink dress and that he sometimes wore a strange mask; these are both the kind of details that Charlier and Downing labeled as "fantastic." Several children also described a "book" with pictures of a man shot in the head by a gun. During a voluntary search of Allen's house the police later found a High Society magazine with a picture of a man shot in the head, but they did not locate a mask or a dress. However, a second, more thorough search, executed with a search warrant, located a pink dress (size sixteen) and a mask with a snake on it.[265] One of the children was shown the mask by the police and asked if it was the one Allen had worn. The child said yes but that the eyes on top of the snake lit up and were pink. The police had removed the pink eyes, which were battery operated.

Although Smith maintains she did not even know Allen, there has been no other explanation advanced for how the children from her bus would have ended up at Allen's house. More importantly, three separate adults testified they had seen Smith and Allen together in different settings, including on the bus. The child suggestibility arguments that have dominated the witch-hunt narrative about this case cannot account for why children would be able to describe Allen's unusual physical features or the unusual items, later recovered from his house, before the police ever identified him.

Smith and Allen's convictions were set aside in an unusual proceeding in 2009 that was supposed to involve resentencing.[266] The state appealed the outcome, and their convictions were reinstated by the Court of Appeals. This outcome was upheld by the Ohio Supreme Court.[267] Smith, who had been free since the 2009 ruling, was resentenced in June 2013 in a deal that gave her credit for time served and assured she would not be sent back to prison.[268] Two months later, the Ohio Parole Board voted 9-2 against clemency in the form of a pardon.[269] Allen was resentenced to 10 to 25 years (with credit for time served) on October 1, 2013 in a deal that includes giving up any further appeals and resigtering as a sex offender for ten years after he is released from prison.[270]

Conclusion

The claims of a national witch-hunt are much stronger than the evidence that has been offered in support. There are no national data; instead, there are scores of comparisons to McMartin and various lists of people who were allegedly falsely accused or convicted. But the comparisons do not stand up to close analysis. There were clearly some poorly investigated and poorly charged cases, but fewer and far between what the witch-hunt narrative claims. There is no evidence of one hundred cases or, as some have claimed, hundreds or even thousands of such cases.

History Ignored

Silence, Denial, and Minimization

The witch-hunt narrative drowned out all accounts of social and legal responses to child sexual abuse in America during the McMartin era. There is no sense in the narrative that there were competing social forces concerning child sexual abuse during the period. There is no sense that, at the same time there were problematic prosecutions, real child sexual abuse was being minimized and denied. Indeed, there is little or no acknowledgment of the social forces that prevailed before child sexual abuse became "recognized" in the mid-1980s. Instead, the witch-hunt narrative is presented as if the social forces prevailing before 1984—ones that remain rather mysterious in nature—magically disappeared as soon as there was widespread publicity concerning child sexual abuse. The social forces that explain why child sexual abuse existed for so long without publicity or social recognition are never addressed, except in a condescending fashion. The idea that social forces denied the sexual abuse of children is treated pejoratively, with the word denial often placed in quotes, at least concerning any claim that denial still pervades our culture.[1] The idea of "sex-abuse hysteria" is presented as if child sexual abuse went from not being reported to being overreported. The witch-hunt narrative also conveys the idea that child sexual abuse went from being rarely punished to being all-too-severely punished. And it suggests that the so-called ritual day-care abuse cases began with the McMartin case. There is no recognition that there were proven cases of sexual abuse in day-care centers before the McMartin case, sometimes even including features that were later generally written off as "fantastic."

This chapter considers the extensive evidence from the McMartin era that contradicts the witch-hunt narrative. It surveys the extent to which child sexual abuse was minimized and denied during the same time period in which cases like McMartin unfolded. This chapter argues that even at the height of social concern about—and occasional overreaction to—child sexual abuse, there were also significant social pressures to minimize and deny such abuse. By this account, the contemporary history of child sexual abuse is far more complicated than the witch-hunt narrative allows. Some parents and professionals were too quick to believe the most incredible statements in some cases, but there were parents unwilling to believe solid evidence of sexual abuse in other cases. At the same time people demanded the harshest sentences in some cases, they rallied around admitted pedophiles and pleaded for leniency in other cases. And at the same time the allegations in some cases were criticized for being completely implausible, other cases were proving that factors labeled "bizarre" and "incredible" exist in reality. This is the unacknowledged history of our social and legal responses to child sexual abuse in America.

The Reality of Day Care Abuse

The witch-hunt narrative explains allegations of sexual abuse in day-care centers in the 1980s in terms of moral panic. According to this view, although social anxieties about day-care centers were building, it was not until the McMartin case that people started alleging sexual abuse at day-care centers—and they did so falsely, on the basis of unfounded fears. Under this explanation, the allegations had little or nothing to do with actual abuse. Sociology professor Mary de Young, a leading proponent of this approach, attributes day-care abuse claims to the fears created when "working parents reluctantly began transforming the almost covenantal duty of caring for their young children into businesslike contractual arrangements with day care providers."[2] Likewise, Debbie Nathan casts day-care workers as "symbols, products of a century's worth of American social and political history that has lately culminated in a new body of thought."[3] Recently, Richard Beck cast these concerns about day-care abuse as a contrivance by the political right.[4] None of these authors offers any recognition of the actual dangers posed by these "symbols." Labeling cases with words such as hoax and witch-hunt conveys the impression that all of these cases were entirely without factual basis. But there were real cases involving sexual abuse in day-care centers before and during the McMartin era.

Pre-McMartin

The McMartin case is often written about as if it were the first in which there were allegations of sexual abuse in a day-care center. Nathan suggests this view by labeling cases after McMartin as "junior McMartins." She also wrote an article entitled "What McMartin Started."[5] The idea that McMartin was the first such case is critical to the theory that fears about sexual abuse in day-care centers were exclusively a function of social anxieties and not based on any real danger. Beginning the discussion of day-care abuse with McMartin makes it much easier to discredit almost any other case that came afterward. The rhetorical device is so powerful that Charlier and Downing misstated the chronology of the cases in their series in an apparent effort to make McMartin appear to be first.[6] Recognizing various cases that arose before McMartin complicates matters significantly; it would then be necessary to acknowledge that, whatever our fears, some day-care abuse cases were based in reality. Recognizing that fact would make it difficult to write off similar claims as "fantastic" without a careful analysis of the factual basis for every claim. And it would be clear that children might be abused over a period of time yet not disclose the abuse, even in an institutional setting.

It turns out that the McMartin case was not the first in which widespread sexual or physical abuse was alleged in a day-care center. There were earlier cases with overwhelming evidence, cases that it would be nearly impossible to miss by doing even basic newspaper research. One of the most significant began just a few months before the first complaint in the McMartin case. Stephen Boatwright was arrested in Reno, Nevada, and charged with child molestation at the Papoose Palace Academy in late April 1983. Boatwright, who later pleaded guilty, lured as many as seventy children, over several years, into a basement storage area he called "the fort."[7] Beyond proving that claims of sexual abuse in day-care centers are not automatically "fantastic," this case also demonstrated that such abuse could occur without being detected quickly or easily. Boatwright fooled parents and the abuse went undetected for several years without any children disclosing it.

Other examples abound, but they tend to have been subject to only minimal local media coverage. Beryl Bishard, for example, the operator of Nanny's Day Care in Radcliff, Kentucky, was convicted of child abuse in 1981 that included tying children with medical gauze and forcing objects into their mouths.[8] David H. Perry, operator of two nursery schools in Gloucester County, New Jersey, pleaded guilty to sodomy and sexual assault of children under his care between 1979 and 1981.[9] Raymond Kuemin pleaded guilty to criminal sexual conduct against three children at the state-licensed day care run by his wife in Niles, Michigan.[10] George and Betty Warnock, who ran an unlicensed day-care center in Polk County, Iowa, were convicted in 1982 of child abuse that included the use of handcuffs and locking children in small wooden boxes.[11] Those who view day-care abuse entirely through the lens of sociological theory would later label allegations of this nature as "fantastic" and "highly improbable."

The Papoose Palace case in Nevada was not the first verified case of sexual abuse in a day-care center. David Perry, the operator of two nursery schools in Gloucester County, New Jersey, pleaded guilty to sexual assault charges in November 1983. Some of the thirty-six counts, which spanned more than two years, involved assaults in the basement of a church.[12] ("Activities in basement" was one of Charlier and Downing's "fantastic" elements.) Thomas Max Hetherington was charged with seventy-four counts of child molestation involving girls aged two to eleven. The abuse took place over a three-year period at his wife's day-care center in Ramona, California; Hetherington pleaded guilty in 1982.[13] A similar case in New Mexico demonstrated how poorly equipped government was to deal with allegations of sexual abuse in day-care centers in the early 1980s. In March 1982, Thomas McKeg was charged with thirty-seven counts of sexual abuse involving children ages three to five. He pleaded guilty or no contest to nine of the charges. The case attracted the attention of the New Mexico legislature and the attorney general's office because the first complaint about McKeg was made in August 1981, yet the center remained open for almost a full year, leading to numerous molestations that could have been prevented.[14] These cases not only demonstrate that children were being sexually abused in day-care centers before the McMartin case but also highlight the inadequate response that often followed disclosures of abuse.

These early cases also show the relative ease with which child abusers operated for years, even after detection. Eleanor Nathan—who was ultimately convicted of murdering an eleven-month-old boy and abusing dozens of other children in her care—operated for a surprisingly long time in California without being apprehended. Although she was under suspicion after the infant's death, it was not until three additional children ended up in the emergency room that the Department of Social Services closed her day-care operation. One of those children lost sight in an eye; another was taken to the emergency room with symptoms diagnosed as strangulation.[15] This was not Eleanor Nathan's first encounter with the law. Her day-care operation, in San Mateo, California, was investigated in the early 1970s when five separate complaints were filed in connection with a series of injuries to children in her care. An infant died in her care at that facility, but no charges were filed and the complaints were not pursued, apparently because Nathan had moved out of town. Another complaint was filed against her shortly after she opened her day-care center in Concord, California, in 1977. Apparently no action was taken on that complaint either. It was not until another child, the eleven-month-old boy, was dead and three more were injured that Eleanor Nathan was apprehended.

The pre-McMartin cases demonstrate a lot about the social and psychological forces that worked against disclosure and "recognition" of day-care abuse. They also stand as evidence against the claim that anyone charged with sexual abuse in a day-care center after the McMartin case began was probably the victim of a "junior McMartin." These varied cases illustrate that abuse in day-care centers was a proven phenomenon before McMartin began, so instead of dismissing such claims out of hand, it is necessary to judge allegations of day-care abuse with careful attention to the facts. Most important, these cases counter the claim that allegations of sexual abuse in day-care centers are, by their nature, so implausible as to be incredible.

During McMartin

Whereas the witch-hunt narrative never denies the existence of child sexual abuse in general, it never really acknowledges sexual abuse in the day-care setting. None of the major writings in the narrative contain explicit acknowledgment of any verified case of sexual abuse in a day-care setting during the era of McMartin. Nathan and Snedeker bury their acknowledgment of the Papoose Palace case in Nevada in a footnote that avoids identifying the case by name.[16] Debbie Nathan told an interviewer that the Bernard Baran case in 1985 was "the first daycare conviction we could find," ignoring the Papoose Palace case and others.[17] The internet-based Witch Hunt Information Center used the same label to describe the Baran case.

There was a major national study of abuse allegations in day-care centers that covered 1983–1985. The study, conducted by David Finkelhor and Linda Meyer Williams under the auspices of the Family Research Laboratory at the University of New Hampshire, focused on cases "substantiated" by state child protective service agencies.[18] The researchers, who identified 270 such cases, surveyed day-care licensing offices and child protective service offices in all fifty states, but some states did not respond and others did not have centralized data.[19] By extrapolating from the states with the most complete information, they estimated there were 500 to 550 cases in the three-year period. The study excluded small-scale operations (fewer than six children). These numbers put the Charlier and Downing series into context. Their list of thirty-six cases, analyzed in Chapter Three, involved approximately twenty-four cases in day-care settings; and Charlier and Downing covered a four-year time period, not three years as this study did. The study of 270 cases (from a likely universe of more than five hundred) demonstrates that the cases identified by Charlier and Downing were the statistical exception, not the rule. The witch-hunt narrative focuses on approximately one dozen cases from the middle to late 1980s; this national study suggests there were at least twenty times as many day-care sexual abuse cases in just three of those years. The official data the authors obtained allowed a comparison of substantiated cases versus total allegations in seven states. The substantiation rate for sexual abuse allegations in day-care centers during the time period was 21 percent. In other words, there was one substantiated case for every five reports. This finding contradicts the claim by proponents of the witch-hunt narrative that investigators are prone to "find" abuse wherever they look. These aggregate numbers demonstrate that investigators were more than willing to conclude that allegations were apparently unfounded. Of course, some of the reports that were screened out might have been factually true. It would be impossible to ascertain this without research into files that are confidential and unlikely to still exist. The point is, these data do not bear out a story of overzealous investigators who always "find" sexual abuse, whether or not it exists.

Few of the 270 substantiated cases generated headlines or resulted in any of the indicia of "moral panic" or "hysteria." Half of the substantiated day-care abuse cases in their three-year study resulted in no publicity at all, and often with just a license revocation but no criminal prosecution. These findings challenge the witch-hunt narrative, which describes the social climate exclusively as one of overreaction. The study identified thirty-two substantiated cases of day-care abuse with multiple perpetrators. Those are the kinds of cases Charlier and Downing said they were addressing in their series. But in exactly half of the cases in the national study—which were all "substantiated" by child protective services—the investigation ended without any criminal charges. Those cases also contradict the assertion that overzealous prosecutors were anxious to bring such cases regardless of the evidence. The witch-hunt narrative offers no theory to explain these contrary results, since it never predicts lack of publicity or a decision not to prosecute cases that meet the standard for substantiation.

The Finkelhor and Williams study also demonstrated that there were verified cases in which one or more of the following were involved: (1) female perpetrators, (2) abuse that went undetected over a long period of time, and (3) allegations considered "far-fetched" or implausible by proponents of the witch-hunt narrative that were proven to be true. This study has been criticized most for its conclusions about "ritual" abuse claims. What the authors actually said about the subject has been exaggerated and distorted for the apparent purpose of branding them as gullible and dismissing the entire study as worthless. It is important to remember, then, what the authors actually said immediately after observing that "some ritualistic element was noted by investigators" in thirty-six substantiated cases. They added that "what was happening in those cases is not usually very clear" and then proceeded to offer a typology of three kinds of ritualistic abuse. The first category fit the idea—held by some at the time, but clearly discredited since—that "large-scale organizations or cults" had infiltrated day-care centers. The authors did not endorse this idea but instead reported it as a position that "some investigators believe." The other two types of ritual abuse were markedly different: one was called pseudo-ritualistic abuse, and the other, psychopathological ritualism.[20] These two categories provide a much more realistic notion of what has been lumped together under the label of "ritual abuse." Those seeking to dismiss the report summarily ignore these distinctions and their implications.

Finkelhor and Williams's study used pseudonyms for all of the cases except McMartin and Country Walk. The study has been severely criticized for counting the McMartin case as substantiated, since the witch-hunt narrative is built on the idea that there was absolutely no evidence of abuse in the case.[21] Chapter Two demonstrates why the narrative is wrong about this. But Finkelhor and Williams can be faulted for counting the case as having more than three hundred victims. In their defense, the study was based on how cases were classified by public authorities. Nevertheless, it was well-known when the book was published in 1988 that (1) the McMartin case was hotly contested, (2) most of the original defendants had been dropped, and (3) the case was an extreme outlier in their data.

A brief survey of cases identified through press accounts and legal records during this era further demonstrates the reality of day-care abuse in the McMartin era. Here are a few examples of identified cases that are never acknowledged in the witch-hunt narrative but are useful in understanding the phenomenon.

Seering Family Day Care (Contra Costa County, California, 1984)

Flora and William Seering's day care license was revoked by the California Department of Social Services "primarily upon allegations that [William] had sexually abused a four-and-one-half-year old girl." The girl testified, and "although there were some inconsistencies in her testimony, the girl said that Bill had hurt her between her legs with a needle, had tied her up, and touched her."[22] Dr. David A. Kerns, medical director of ambulatory services at Children's Hospital in Oakland, testified to a "sharp angular defect of the hymen" that "speaks for some sort of sharp object having done it." The Seerings' objections on appeal concerned the use of closed-circuit television and the admission of expert testimony that relied on child abuse accomodation syndrome. The medical evidence was not contested and has not since been discredited. The pressing question is why there was no criminal prosecution. The answer likely speaks to the difficulties in relying on the statements of such a young child even when there is strong medical evidence.

Fairmont Baptist Church (San Diego, 1984)

Bus driver Vasco W. Walter, Jr., "confessed to substantial acts of molestation, including fondling and oral copulation" over the period June 1984 through December 1984.[23] The idea that a bus driver might commit such acts of sexual abuse is precisely the fact pattern that retired English professor Frederick Crews labeled as "far-fetched" in the New York Review of Books, after an essay promoting the witch-hunt narrative.[24] This case, like the Halsey case, involved not only the sex crimes but the culpability of those who supervised him. Even "after receiving numerous warning signs" regarding Walter's unfitness to supervise children, church leadership placed him in charge of religious training for children at the church.[25]

Pearl Lee Mitchell licensed day care (St. Petersburg, Florida, 1985)

The seventy-seven-year-old husband of the day-care operator was arrested for sexual abuse of girls aged two to four. Court records indicate that his wife "had caught her husband in several sex acts with young girls over the past years." Richard J. Mitchell entered pleas of no contest.[26] This is the kind of crime that might seem unbelievable both for the age of the perpetrator and the age of the victims. But there is no doubt that it occurred.

Bo Peep Day Nursery (Harford County, Maryland, 1988)

This case involved allegations of physical and sexual abuse at the Bo Peep Day Nursery. The charges originally involved four girls; they expanded to include five or six other children who attended the facility. A complaint in July 1987 resulted in a four-day hearing before the Harford County Health Office, followed by a seven-day hearing before the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene. The hearings included a considerable amount of hearsay evidence. The mother of a five-year-old girl testified her daughter said, "Mom, will you lick my butt" and something about sucking her mother's finger "until the stuff comes out."[27] The mother of another girl testified that her daughter described how an employee would pinch her "twinkie" (her term for vagina) and "put a black stick in her" during naptime.[28] This girl was seen by her pediatrician about a painful urination problem before the allegations became public. The owners of the facility objected to the use of hearsay evidence. They also presented a psychologist who considered some of the children's statements inconsistent or so implausible as to be flawed. For example, a girl who said she had been hurt in the vagina insisted that blood had come from her knee. The hearing officer discounted the psychologist's arguments because they did not take into account the developmental level of each child. The statement about blood "could quite possibly result from having blood drip on her knee"; a child this age "would quite naturally believe she was bleeding from the knee," he opined.[29] Two pediatricians were part of an interdisciplinary team that evaluated nineteen children who attended Bo Peep in the summer of 1987. One was Dr. Charles Shubin, who had examined between two thousand and three thousand children for evidence of sexual abuse. The doctors concluded that eight of the children (seven of them female) exhibited physical findings consistent with sexual abuse; this included "vaginal scars and tears and anal gaping and scarring."[30]

The hearing officer concluded that several children with no other connection to each other gave "remarkably consistent" stories, and that a preponderance of the evidence supported the revocation of the license. Defense lawyers called it a "witch hunt."[31] The administrative licensing decision was overturned in Circuit Court on issues having to do with the use of hearsay evidence; that decision was overturned by the Maryland Court of Appeals.[32] There was a criminal investigation, but no charges were filed. It is not clear whether this is because parents were unwilling to allow their children to testify, or the children were not considered likely to be considered competent. There were civil suits settled out of court. The case is notable for the care taken by the hearing officer to consider the developmental stages of the children and not to simply judge their testimony as if it had been provided by an adult. The case also highlights the significance of hearsay evidence in child sexual abuse cases. Several of the children made explicit statements that would cause any parent deep concern. Although the rights of defendants might well keep those statements out of criminal court, their potential relevance seems clear in this case.

Bethel Baptist Church (Fruitport, Michigan, 1989)

Two juveniles were accused of molesting approximately fifty young children in the church nursery center between 1985 and 1988. This is precisely the kind of abuse the witch-hunt narrative would claim is unlikely to have occurred over such a long period of time without someone detecting it or disclosing it. But that is what happened. The case is verified through the confession of the perpetrators. One of them revealed details during court-ordered therapy at a residential treatment facility; the other later pleaded guilty to criminal charges.[33]

These examples contradict the witch-hunt narrative in various ways. They are most important for illustrating the difficulties in detecting and prosecuting this kind of abuse—even in the years when the witch-hunt narrative claimed sex-abuse hysteria was sweeping the country.

The Reality of "Fantastic" Elements

Writers who promote the witch-hunt narrative often employ the word fantastic to describe various allegations. Charlier and Downing's series is best remembered by the "fantastic elements" they utilized to link cases across the country. Nathan and others also use the device of describing cases as "ritual abuse" and then dismissing them on the grounds that there is no evidence such cases occur. But those arguments have been used to dismiss cases with features that have been proven to be true.

"Fantastic" Elements in Real Cases

Skepticism about widespread claims of satanic and ritual abuse became the dominant position in the 1990s—and for good reason. The idea that a network of organized pedophiles infiltrated day-care centers in the 1980s deserves to be dismissed. As Kenneth Lanning wrote in the FBI's Investigator's Guide to Allegations of "Ritual" Child Abuse, "some professionals, in their zeal to make American society more aware of [the sexual victimization of children], tend to exaggerate the problem."[34] Lanning concluded, after years of reports of widespread satanic ritual abuse, that no evidence "of a well-organized satanic cult" had been found in any of the cases. This report was followed two years later by a study funded by the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect (NCCAN). Described in the press as "the first empirical study of [the] actual prevalence" of ritual abuse, its findings were hailed as evidence that "organized satanic cults don't exist."[35]

But these two reports were careful to distinguish between conspiratorial claims involving networks of perpetrators that had infiltrated day-care centers and claims of individual cases involving satanic or ritualistic elements. The NCCAN study made it clear that it found "convincing evidence of lone perpetrators or couples who say they are involved with Satan or use the claim to intimidate victims."[36] The primary author of the report described an intergenerational ritualistic case, including black robes and candles, with medical evidence of chlamydia, a sexually transmitted disease, in five children's throats.[37] So, too, an investigation in Utah uncovered a case in which three adult women recalled satanic sexual abuse as children involving "robed ceremonies, alters, [sic] candles, animal sacrifices and extreme physical and sexual abuse."[38] The attorney general's office interviewed the suspects and reported that "both the mother and father admitted to serious sexual and physical crimes against the children and named several other individuals who were involved."[39] The statute of limitations prevented prosecution. Those cases did not involve "organized cults" but nevertheless stand for the proposition that children have been sexually abused in ritualistic or satanic ways, and therefore claims involving such elements should not automatically be written off as "fantastic" and unrelated to reality.

The FBI Investigator's Guide distinguishes between claims that were physically impossible or had never been proven (e.g., cannibalism and the sacrificing of babies) and the ritualistic claims that were "possible and probable" or corroborated (i.e., child pornography, cases involving victim threats and manipulation).[40] This guide also contains an entire section on "Alternative Explanations," which explores six reasons for a child possibly claiming something fantastic or ritualistic that is not literally true. What is most important about the analysis has been lost entirely in the witch-hunt narrative: some explanations are consistent with the child having been sexually abused, and others are not. The explanation it described as "most controversial and least popular" is one that suggests there was no abuse: "overzealous intervenors" who misinterpreted, embellished, or otherwise subtly affected the child's statements. Other explanations, however, such as "normal childhood fears," suggest there was actual abuse; children "might describe their victimization in terms of evil that they understand." So even though this guide has become best known for its official skepticism of claims of ritual abuse, it actually recognized many activities described as ritual abuse and it cautions that there might be plausible explanations for children making such statements in other cases with sexual abuse. There has been research since publication of the guide bearing out the reality of sexual abuse in cases where children make "fantastic" statements.

Those distinctions have been ignored in the witch-hunt narrative. A. S. Ross, who wrote the first investigative journalistic piece challenging the existence of ritual abuse cases,[41] wrote eight years later in Redbook that investigators had "not found any physical evidence to support the existence of such cults or their practices." Writing in the online magazine Salon, David Futrelle summarized the NCCAN report in 1997 as having "examined over 12,000 accusations of ritual abuse, finding no physical evidence to back up any" of the claims. In fact, the executive summary of the NCCAN report that he purports to summarize contradicts this extreme claim. More stridently, Howard Fishman argued that all claims of satanic ritual abuse are "a delusion suffered and/or fostered by rabid, drooling fanatics."[42] But there are actually two kinds of fanatics in this debate: the ones who still cling to allegations of cult conspiracies and the sacrificing of babies, and those who deny all claims of ritualistic sexual abuse.

Many of the elements Charlier and Downing called fantastic have been proven to exist in actual cases.[43] To listen to the most virulent of the denials, however, one would think that no adult has ever committed a sex crime with some of the more extreme items on their list, such as devil worship. But there are many proven cases in the public record. For example, Bradley James Key and Michael Paul Dillard were convicted of child endangerment for satanic rituals that injured three young adolescent boys in Pike County, Ohio. The rituals involved candles, incantation, pentagram drawings, and bloodletting. One boy "had hot candle wax dripped in the shape of a cross on his chest, back and genitals."[44] The unacknowledged history of child sexual abuse also includes cultlike cases with multiple perpetrators. In November 1991, a terrified twelve-year-old girl fled to a women's shelter in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, to escape a group of adults she was convinced had supernatural powers. She told stories of being subjected by her "parents and neighbors to ritualistic torture that included bloodletting with a sword, hot needles under their fingernails, sodomy." It is precisely the kind of case that would-be skeptics deny. But the evidence proved to be overwhelming. Rickie Jay Gaddis had physically and sexually abused seven children for at least eighteen months. He used "ceremonial swords" to draw blood to pour on the grave of a daughter killed in a fire three years earlier. A boy had been tattooed in one of these "ceremonies," and the children had been sodomized. The police found everything the girl described, including the swords.

According to Detective Richard Rok, "the thing that still bothers me the most about all of this is that so many people knew about this, yet did nothing."[45] The county child protective service agency had a file on Gaddis "for years" but had taken no action even though a school nurse reported suspicions about the family almost three years earlier. Several of the defendants pleaded guilty. Gaddis was found guilty of more than 150 counts of "horrific sexual, physical, and emotional abuse" ranging from terrorist threats to rape, incest, and involuntary deviant sexual intercourse. Later upholding these convictions, Judge Tamilia noted that one "victim's testimony was corroborated by the testimony of three eyewitnesses."[46] The court rejected the claim that evidence of "terroristic threats" and "instilling fear and menace on the victims" was unfairly prejudicial. To the contrary, the court found it was directly relevant to the charges.

Another case like this emerged in Florida. Eddie Lee Sexton, Sr., also ran his family like a cult, subjecting them to the kinds of rituals that Nathan and others claim is only imaginary. But the horrors were real, including a nine-month-old child who was murdered and buried on Sexton's command at a Florida campground, where the family was fleeing from child-abuse charges in Ohio. Skipper Lee's body was found where Sexton's daughters said it had been buried. The senior Sexton, who told his children he was the devil, inflicted horrendous tortures on his family, including sexual abuse. Two adult sons testified about rituals in which they drank deer's blood and joined hands around a dead cat.[47]

Similarly, a "ritual abuse" case with satanic elements was verified in San Diego, where two defendants were charged in 1986 with threatening and sexually abusing seven boys and girls (ages eleven to fourteen) who lived in the same apartment complex. Robert Wilkins was convicted by a jury of multiple counts of "forcible oral copulation" and "committing a lewd and lascivious act with a child under fourteen by force or duress" and sentenced to forty-six years. His conviction was upheld on appeal.[48] Lori Bartz was charged with the same offenses plus false imprisonment and assault with a deadly weapon. As reported in the San Diego Union-Tribune, Bartz "used satanic rituals to frighten and intimidate some of the victims into performing sex acts."[49] She pleaded guilty to nine charges in exchange for the dropping of sixty-two charges and the state's agreement not to seek a sentence longer than fifty years. After being sentenced to forty-eight years, she appealed on the grounds that the sentence was cruel and unusual given her "lack of intelligence and emotional immaturity." The appellate court found although she "'almost' believe[ed] true the fantasy world she created," her sentence was appropriate because the victims were particularly vulnerable, she took advantage of a position of trust, and she engaged in a pattern of violent conduct that indicates a serious danger to society.[50]

In Northern California, there was the case of Daryl Ball, Jr., and Charlotte Mae Thrailkill, with multiple child victims (ages five to eight) and allegations of threats and other kinds of abuse labeled as "ritualistic." The prosecution described those elements and cited the Finkelhor study specifically to explain that "these cases are distinguished from the incest model by the extreme terror shown by the victims."[51] The factual allegations are precisely the kind that Nathan disavows, having criticized Finkelhor for "believing" (as she put it) that ritual abuse cases actually exist. This case was classified as ritual abuse primarily because the children were threatened, with several testifying they were tied with rope. The preliminary hearing, which lasted throughout August 1987, was the longest preliminary hearing in Sonoma County history. Some of the children broke down and were removed from the case[52]; medical evidence was presented that corroborated the abuse.[53] Both defendants later pleaded guilty to "forcible lewd and lascivious conduct" involving five children.[54] In 1998, Thrailkill became the first woman in California to be declared a sexually violent predator after she decided not to contest the state's petition. She asked to be sent to a state hospital.[55]

There are even verified cases of sexual abuse in the context of organized cult activities.[56] The existence of these cases does not prove anything about other cases, of course, but it does demonstrate that such things are possible. Since cases with similar allegations have been uniformly dismissed as fantastic, the existence of proven cases demonstrates that automatic rejection on such grounds is inappropriate. In sum, there is extremism on both sides of the ritual abuse controversy. On the side that included the organization Believe the Children, seemingly anything a child said, no matter how implausible, was taken at face value. Prosecutor Kathleen Morris suspected, at least for a time, that there was baby killing in Jordan, Minnesota, without any reports of missing babies or evidence of their death. On the other hand, the witch-hunt narrative has adopted the position that children's statements involving ritualistic elements that have been proven in real cases are nevertheless so "bizarre" as to discredit the child automatically.

The Child Pornography "Myth"

There has also been minimization and denial of child pornography as an element in child sexual abuse cases. Charlier and Downing, for example, lump allegations of child pornography with the most bizarre and far-fetched claims. Philip Jenkins and others have made similar arguments, relying on the dubious work of Lawrence Stanley, who coined the phrase "child pornography myth" in an article in Playboy magazine.[57] The proof that Stanley offered for this "myth" is the same handful of day-care cases that have been widely distorted in the witch-hunt narrative: McMartin, Jordan (not actually a day-care case), Amirault, Edenton, and Country Walk. In all of these cases, there were statements by some children about having been photographed in the nude—but no photographs were ever recovered. As a result, the witch-hunt narrative argues that such charges, at least in connection with day-care or other multiple victim cases, are without any foundation in fact. Debbie Nathan asserts that "there has not been a single case" in which allegations of child pornography were "physically substantiated."[58]

But these arguments overlook a host of cases with precisely the kind of evidence Nathan and Mark Pendergrast deny. Charles Bishop, one of the Kern County defendants, was convicted largely on the basis of the pornographic pictures he took of his victims.[59] Grant Self, whose name appears on the dedication page of Nathan's book, had two prior convictions that included similar photographic evidence.[60] A connection between child pornography and day-care abuse was also established before the McMartin case began through a confirmed case at Isabel's Day Care, not far from Manhattan Beach, California. The case began when a three-year-old girl told her mother in 1981 that "James [the owner of her day-care center] took pictures of my butt today." When the police executed a search warrant, they found thousands of sexually explicit photos and slides of past and present students. Edwin James Meacham, a biochemist with a doctorate from the University of Southern California, did not disavow the pictures; instead, he claimed he was "doing research." Many of the pictures were taken in the bathroom of the day-care center. (Remember that Charlier and Downing included "activities in bathroom" and "nude photography" as incredible or fantastic elements of ritual abuse cases.) Meacham was convicted of child pornography in May 1982, and his conviction was upheld in 1984 in an opinion that is readily available through standard legal research.[61] This was not the only case in which there were proven allegations of child pornography in a day-care context. In January 1984, still a month before the McMartin case hit the news, Robert McCormick, a forty-three-year-old teacher at the ABC Scholar Day Care Center, pleaded guilty to "sexually abusing and/or taking the nude photographs" of preschoolers in Prince George's County, Virginia.[62]

Another relevant case consistently overlooked by those purveying the "child pornography myth" involved the Rainbow Day Care Center in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. John W. "Jack" Shaver, owner of the center, was arrested in 1990 after he retrieved pictures of naked children from a photo lab. When police searched his home, they found thousands of pictures and negatives of naked children, along with pornographic magazines depicting children engaging in sexual acts; twenty parents picked out their children in Shaver's enormous collection of nude photos.[63] Shaver's case demonstrates how such predators are able to elude punishment, even when their behavior raised suspicions and resulted in multiple allegations over the years. Shaver escaped no fewer than four times in the years before he was apprehended at the Rainbow Day Care Center. Before moving to Florida, he lived in Hawaii, where he volunteered at a day-care center in 1979. He was asked to leave that position because the director was "uncomfortable" with how he handled the children. He then opened the Kailua Beach Preschool.

In 1983, he lost his license for that facility after Honolulu police received complaints that Shaver was "washing off [young girls] by rubbing, tickling and running his hands up [their genitalia]." (Again, the "activity" was in the bathroom—something Charlier and Downing would label "fantastic.") Shaver pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor and paid a $200 fine.

Two years later he bought a day-care center near Fort Lauderdale. The criminal background check revealed nothing because he had never been convicted of a felony. In 1986 and 1987, during the height of the "panic" about day-care sexual abuse, two unrelated parents complained to child protective services that Shaver had touched their children inappropriately. Neither case went forward, though, because the agency concluded the evidence was insufficient. When Shaver was finally apprehended in 1990, his defense attorney argued, audaciously, that Shaver was the victim of a "panic."[64] This argument rings hollow in light of his previous history; but it also defies reality given the outcome of his case. A circuit judge dropped twenty-eight of the twenty-nine charges of possessing child pornography pursuant to a state appellate court decision that defendants can be charged with only one count of child pornography no matter how many photographs they possess. (Shaver had more than two thousand pictures in his possession.) At the same time Southern Florida was supposedly in the grips of "hysteria" over child sexual abuse, Jack Shaver received probation in exchange for his guilty plea.[65]

A similar case in Massachusetts bears out the connection between day-care abuse and child pornography—and the difficulty in getting people to take it seriously. Robert Shell of Arlington, Massachusetts, was investigated by the Department of Social Services in 1988 for allegedly abusing his own children. The case was not considered strong enough to prosecute, but it was sufficient for DSS to issue a cease-and-desist order when Shell began operating a family day-care center in Arlington. DSS employees warned parents who were entrusting their children to Shell that he posed a serious danger; some parents did not want to hear the warnings. The director of family day-care licensing reported that, despite the "hysteria" supposedly infecting Massachusetts at the time, "we were told by at least one parent that she could do whatever she wanted to do with her kids and that she didn't believe it."[66] Shell, who worked as a custodian at several day-care centers, was arrested in 1990 after an investigation into a series of larcenies at day-care centers in Lexington and Burlington. The police seized photos of naked children between the ages of nine months and three-and-a-half years in the act of being sexually abused. Shell met several of the victims through his work at various day-care centers. He pleaded guilty to thirty-five charges, including indecent assault of two girls under the age of four.[67]

The prevalence of child pornography in Southern California at the time of McMartin is illustrated by the fact on the same day the defendants were being arraigned in the McMartin case, there was also a probation violation hearing in Los Angeles County Superior Court for Allan Licht, who had been prosecuted for child pornography in 1981 after authorities seized forty thousand pictures of boys engaging in sexual contact "with men and one another." Licht's probation violation hearing involved charges that he developed photographs of a similar nature for a Vancouver travel agent.[68] Catherine Stubblefield Wilson was also prominent in Southern California at this time. The mother of five, who prosecutors claimed made $500,000 per year by supplying child pornography across the country, had a customer list of thirty thousand people. Wilson distributed films with titles such as "Little But Lewd" and "Kinder Orgy." (A jury deadlocked eleven to one for conviction after the first trial. Prosecutors moved ahead with a retrial, and Wilson ended up pleading guilty to a single count of child pornography.)

One might wonder, in light of these cases, how Lawrence Stanley supported his oft-cited claim of a "child pornography myth." The answer is partly that Stanley was describing how effective law enforcement officials had been in driving "commercially produced magazines such as Lollitots, Baby Love and Nudist Moppets" out of the market. What replaced that market, Carol McGraw documented in the Los Angeles Times in 1985, was "a thriving cottage industry that creates its own pornography and distributes it through an informal but extensive underground."[69] This is what Stanley minimizes. A close reading of his "award-winning" article in Playboy reveals that Stanley's own estimates contradict the idea of a child pornography "myth."[70] After debunking some overstated claims about the size of the child pornography business, Stanley allowed that "a small, essentially insignificant group by some estimates as few as 5,000 people" are involved in child pornography. Stanley does not explain why thousands of child pornographers constitute an "insignificant" number, but his statement nevertheless provides a basis for concluding that thousands of children are victimized in the production of child pornography. It turns out Stanley's interest in child pornography was neither academic nor detached; it was economic and personal. Stanley is a self-proclaimed "girl-lover," who produced a variety of magazines with pedophile themes, sold pictures of young girls at nudist camps, and produced a newsletter called Uncommon Desires—"the voice of a politically-conscious girl-love underground."[71] Stanley does not consider child pornography to be a social harm in the first place. It is no wonder he minimizes the size of the industry. What is surprising is how many others have relied on him as some kind of expert.

This discussion of ritual elements and child pornography is probably the section of this book that is most likely to be misrepresented by proponents of the witch-hunt narrative. The narrative uses a kind of guilt-by-association to discredit cases (and people) by associating them with credulous acceptance of all sorts of "ritual abuse."[72] So I will close this section by reemphasizing that this is not an endorsement of any theories about networks of organized groups that infiltrated day-care centers. Rather, it is a plea for those who want to engage this issue with an open mind to pay attention to the FBI report that is misrepresented almost as often as it is cited. Elements that have been labeled as ritualistic have occurred in documented cases, and accordingly, children who make statements about such elements should not be dismissed out of hand.

What Hysteria?

The witch-hunt narrative says in no uncertain terms that hysteria about child sexual abuse swept the country in the 1980s. It was supposedly strong enough to create allegations of sexual abuse out of nothing; Professor Stephen Ceci uses the phrase "air of accusation."[73] There are two serious flaws with this claim. First, there is almost no evidence to support it, in exact times and places when this phenomenon was supposedly at work. Second, this account of the 1980s does not recognize the forces of secrecy, silence, and disbelief that produced an air of denial around child sexual abuse during the same era. The reality is that serious sexual abuse allegations were often ignored, sometimes for years, at the time this hysteria was allegedly occurring. The hysteria claim also overlooks the difficulties in prosecuting cases and the remarkably lenient sentences that were commonplace for those convicted of sexually assaulting children.

Places Allegedly in the Grip of Hysteria

Even in specific communities where "sex abuse hysteria" was supposedly the worst, there is little evidence to support the witch-hunt narrative. The unacknowledged history of the communities in which the most infamous cases occurred actually contradicts the narrative. What happened in the McMartin case spread to only a handful of other preschools in Southern California, and it caused significantly less damage than is often claimed. Beyond McMartin, there is no evidence that the Kelly Michaels case caused any kind of outbreak of false accusations in New Jersey. To the contrary, there is a powerful story that disproves the hysteria hypothesis. Similarly, events in Dade County (Florida) and Boston during the middle to late 1980s provide considerable evidence that contradicts the witch-hunt narrative.

Southern California at the Time of McMartin

The McMartin case is the premier example of social hysteria over child sexual abuse. Many accounts claim that "hysteria broke out" when the Manhattan

Beach Police sent the letter of September 8, 1983. But, as demonstrated in Chapter Two, the letter resulted in less than is ever recognized. The preschool remained open throughout the fall, it was many weeks before there was a meeting among parents, and the story did not reach the newspapers or television until five months later.

There was, however, a kind of social contagion in the McMartin case once it was the subject of intense media coverage, resulting in some nearby preschools being implicated as well. At the height of the belief that there was a broader conspiracy afoot—something many people, including investigators, believed in 1984 and 1985—several other day-care centers were named in connection with the McMartin case. Prosecutors claimed at one point that children had been "swapped" between the McMartin Preschool and the Manhattan Ranch Preschool.[74] A few other schools were named at various points by parents connected to the McMartin case. But this was nothing like the claims that quickly became part of the witch-hunt narrative. Richard Wexler asserted that the McMartin investigation "spread to sixty-four other daycare centers; seven of them closed."[75] In point of fact, the investigation spread to seven other South Bay schools, and three of those preschools never reopened. There is no evidence of the case spreading beyond that.

Seven South Bay preschools are often lumped together in stories about this era, but what happened at the preschools varied significantly, reflecting a complex social reality that is not captured in the witch-hunt narrative. The first case to arise elsewhere in the South Bay began with a mother's call on March 28, 1984, to the Lomita Sheriff's Station to report suspected sexual abuse at the Peninsula Montessori School No. 2 in Rolling Hills. The timing of the call alone, coming at the peak of the most intensive and pro-prosecution coverage of the McMartin case, raises obvious concerns about the possibility that it was caused by overreaction. But what this mother reported would likely lead any good parent to be concerned. She observed her four-year-old daughter "lying on top of her brother and simulating sexual intercourse" and then "kissing her younger brother's penis saying 'Let's make love.'" Her daughter had been attending the preschool since September 1983; her three-year-old son had started attending in December. This behavior is far beyond the bounds of what is recognized as normal sex play in young children. Claudia Krikorian, the owner of the school, did not cooperate with the investigation at first. There was an administrative finding that she impinged on the investigation in two ways: (1) the suspect was tipped off about the investigation, making the subsequent search essentially futile; and (2) she did not supply authorities with a complete list of students attending the school.[76] (Krikorian was never charged with any crimes.)

The primary children in the case were interviewed in a matter of days, not months. The case did not expand beyond the students in the 1983–84 class. The interviewing was done by two seasoned deputy sheriffs, women with a combined twelve years' experience and more than one thousand child abuse investigations. They interviewed nine children, six of whom were medically examined by Dr. Carol Berkowitz at Harbor-UCLA Hospital. The suspect, a teacher's aide who was immediately fired, had started working at the school in September 1983.

The first child was interviewed by Los Angeles County Deputy Sheriff Susan McGirt two days after the initial report. This child identified the teacher's aide as the person who taught her the behavior that startled her mother.[77] McGirt attempted to interview the second child, but the boy was completely nonverbal. His mother reported he said that the same teacher's aide had shown him pictures of people in the nude.[78] The mother of another child reported that her son, who attended the school from September 1983 through February 1984, came home from the school [one day in January] and told her he had seen a 'naughty' or 'dirty' picture at school. At the time the mother assumed that "a teenager passing by the school had shown him the picture."[79] McGirt reported that this child stated the same teacher's aide "showed him and another child a picture of a 'naked lady'." McGirt also "received information concerning other children" from psychologist Dr. Helena Barry. It included statements by one child about being taken to a house with two swimming pools, where a "black man with a mean face and long hair" was present.[80] Some aspects of the child's testimony strained credulity on their face. Nevertheless, there was medical evidence in the case. Six children were examined for indications of sexual abuse by Dr. Carol Berkowitz and nurse Mary Logan at Harbor-UCLA Hospital. Those medical examinations concluded that four of the children examined had been sexually abused. The findings on one child were described as "severe," labeled as "supportive of chronic sexual misuse including sodomy."[81] There were "no hymenal remnants visible" on this child, a finding that would still be considered significant today.

After considering all of the evidence, an administrative law judge found that the first child "was molested by [the teacher's aide] on the campus of the R.H. School." The judge found that four other children had been sexually abused, although "it was not established that these children were molested by [the teacher's aide]."[82] These conclusions seemed carefully tailored to the quality of the evidence, and of course they were under a standard of proof for a civil action, not the much higher "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard for criminal court. The charges did not spread to other teachers, and the nature of allegations that were accepted was not fantastic or incredible in any way.

The parents of several children brought a civil lawsuit against Krikorian and the school. Krikorian countersued. The teacher's aide refused to answer any questions, citing his constitutional right against self-incrimination. (He was later deported.) After taking depositions from two of the children, the insurance company settled the case for $1 million, over Krikorian's objections.[83] The superior court eventually decided Krikorian could get her license back. She expressed concern that her name would be forever linked to sexual abuse, even though there was never any evidence she was aware of abuse. Indeed, her position was that no abuse ever occurred. Nevertheless, it may well be that the failure of justice in this case was in the decision not to prosecute the aide.

The second case related to McMartin involved Michael Ruby and the Manhattan Ranch Preschool. Again, charges focused on a single teacher. This suspect was ultimately charged and tried; the eleven-week jury trial ended in a hung jury. The district attorney decided not to retry the case and then dropped all charges. Deputy District Attorney Lisa Hart said the decision not to retry was not a matter of "pulling out" but rather was out of "consideration for the children."[84] It is impossible to evaluate the merits of the case without gaining access to the daily trial transcripts, which were sealed by Judge Bob T. Hight. It should be noted, however, that Manhattan Ranch Preschool did not close permanently—it was sold and remained open during the investigation and subsequent trial—and the charges against Ruby did not spread.

The third case with links to McMartin involved the St. Cross Church in Hermosa Beach. The day-care center at the church was first implicated in April 1985 by one of the children in the McMartin preliminary hearing. There is no question that claims made about the church in the McMartin case were beyond far-fetched. One child in the preliminary hearing in the McMartin case testified about witnessing satanic rituals at the church including black robes and drinking blood.[85] Nevertheless, there are significant omissions in the witch-hunt account. First, it should be noted that the St. Cross day-care center was not closed by the state. (The following year, it was closed voluntarily by the board of directors.) Second, Faye Fiore reported in the Daily Breeze that two men confessed to sexual abuse occurring at St. Cross Church in the 1980s but their statements were beyond the six-year statute of limitations in effect at the time of the acts.[86] Apparently, the hysteria that is claimed to have gripped the area during this time did not prevent those confessed incidents from happening. As nobody was ever charged and the center was not closed by the state, this case does not provide much support for the witch-hunt narrative.

The fourth case with links to McMartin was a twenty-two-pupil preschool in Manhattan Beach called Learning Game. According to newspaper reports, three of five children who made statements relating to abuse of some sort also indicated something about the McMartin Preschool as well. A memo by the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Task Force in December 1985 stated that two preschools were being investigated beyond McMartin and Manhattan Ranch: "One, the Learning Game Preschool, is clearly linked to McMartin. The other, Children's Path Preschool, is not." The Learning Game was closed in December 1984, and it never reopened. No charges were brought against anyone. On the basis of available information, this seems to be strong evidence of overreaction to the McMartin case; the school was closed owing to uncorroborated claims that were never proven.

The fifth preschool mentioned in connection with McMartin—Children's Path, also in Manhattan Beach—was closed for two weeks and then reopened as Creative Kids. There was no hysteria; the sentiment of the parents was all in favor of reopening. Even if the initial revocation was without substantial basis—and there is nothing in available records to support the claim that there was sexual abuse at this preschool—the disruption was minimal, and no one was charged, let alone prosecuted.

The sixth preschool, Children's Path in Hermosa Beach, provides support for the witch-hunt narrative. It was closed temporarily and was going to reopen, having changed one or more staff members. A small group of parents discouraged the owners from reopening, however, through outrageous forms of protest such as "wanted" posters depicting teachers from the preschool. Such actions demonstrate the fever of emotions that ran through the immediate community. However, news reports indicate there was medical evidence of abuse.[87] It does not appear that the state overreacted, but the case is complicated and there is almost no available original documentation to help verify published reports.

The seventh preschool case in the South Bay linked to McMartin provides the strongest evidence in favor of the witch-hunt narrative. It involved Peninsula Montessori School No. 1 in Torrance. The school was also owned and operated by Claudia Krikorian, owner of the Peninsula Montessori School No. 2 in Rolling Hills, where allegations of sexual abuse had been made against a teacher's aide months earlier. A review of the charges involving the Torrance school bears out the claim that the state officials were being overzealous and unreasonable. Krikorian was written up for missing floor tiles in a classroom, for a cement stairway with a crack, and for a toilet bowl that smelled of urine. But the primary charge in overall significance was that an employee of the school had sexually molested four students. No charges were ever brought against him, and Krikorian appealed the temporary order of suspension to an administrative law judge. There was an eleven-day hearing in October 1985. Two months later, the judge upheld the license revocation in a fourteen-page decision that contains no discussion of the factual basis for the sexual abuse claims, even though they were the focus of almost the entire evidentiary hearing. Instead, Judge Richard Lopez simply stated, "it was established by direct evidence" that each child had been sexually abused.[88] Krikorian appealed the decision to superior court, where, eighteen months later, Judge H. Walter Croskey overturned the ruling. His eighteen-page decision said "each of the four girls who testified presented serious credibility problems," and he provided relevant details about each girl's testimony. "The concerns that all serious persons involved in this field have toward possible manipulation of child witnesses," he reasoned, "would be aroused by the facts in this case." The judge concluded that the children's testimony was "totally unconvincing."[89] Although it would require a complete examination of the transcripts of the October 1985 hearing to evaluate this decision independently, the opinion is persuasive and provides enough details to conclude that Montessori No. 1 was the worst local case to occur in the wake of McMartin. Although no criminal charges were brought, a man's reputation was damaged and Claudia Krikorian had to spend a significant amount of money to defend her business.

This was the last of the preschool cases directly linked to McMartin. Indeed, Bob Williams, who wrote a series of articles critical of the McMartin case for the Los Angeles Times, reported that "by the end of 1985, the tide of allegations began to recede."[90] The "cloud seems to have lifted," he later quoted a Torrance preschool operator as saying.[91] Real damage was done in the case of several preschools, but the nature and extent of the damage has been exaggerated in the witch-hunt narrative. The reach of the social hysteria beyond the McMartin case was significant, but also highly localized and included at least two cases in which there was credible evidence of abuse.

Criminal charges were brought in three other cases in Southern California that had been mentioned along with the McMartin case in various news stories. There was no claim that the McMartin case was literally related to these cases, but since they were mentioned together in media stories these are cases most likely to exhibit the kind of hysteria attributed to the McMartin case. Henry Lawson was charged with child molestation at the Little Angels Preschool in Lynwood, some fifteen miles from Manhattan Beach. Campbell Greenup was charged with molesting girls, aged five to seven, at his Greenup School in Northridge; and four adults were arrested in Pico Rivera on the basis of some fantastic claims, including satanic ritual abuse, made by neighborhood children. Lawson eventually pleaded guilty after a judge ruled that his confession to police would be admissible. Greenup, who claimed he was the victim of a "political witch-hunt," was convicted by jury of molesting six girls four to eleven years old.[92] Charges against the adults in Pico Rivera were quickly dropped, and they were eventually awarded $9.9 million in damages. Their case is mentioned frequently in the witch-hunt narrative; it is case number six in Charlier and Downing's series. The other two cases are never mentioned.

Beyond the most localized effects, which have themselves been exaggerated, there is no evidence of a wave of unjustified arrests or convictions for child sexual abuse in Southern California at the time of McMartin. To the contrary, the claim that the McMartin case had a major impact across California, or even across Southern California, is not borne out by data from the California

Department of Social Services (DSS). There were 220 complaints statewide in 1985 and 240 in 1986. There were in that period thirty-eight thousand licensed day-care facilities in California.

New Jersey at the Time of Kelly Michaels

The local response to the Kelly Michaels case (the subject of Chapter Five) was much less intense than the local response to the McMartin case; it did not spread to any nearby day-care centers. No cases have been held up as examples of day-care centers wrongfully closed or wrongfully accused in the wake of the Kelly Michaels case. Nevertheless, Dorothy Rabinowitz described the "social climate" at the time of the Michaels case as "more virulent than the Asian flu."[93] She did not offer any evidence from New Jersey at the time of the Michaels case to support this claim. The Charlier and Downing list of thirty-six contained two New Jersey cases: one was Michaels, and the other, which preceded the Michaels case, involved a camp counselor. There was no connection between the two cases, however, other than the fact that Ralph Underwager—a controversial psychologist who became a prominent defense expert through the Jordan, Minnesota, cases—testified for the defense in both of them. There is simply no evidence in New Jersey of what Rabinowitz called a "national pathology" at the time of the Michaels case.[94] No similar allegations emerged from any of the thousands of day-care centers covered by the same large media markets that include Maplewood, New Jersey. No explanations have been offered as to why this alleged "social contagion" never expanded beyond this single facility.

In fact, through a coincidence of names, there was something akin to a natural experiment to test the claim that there was a "climate of hysteria" in New Jersey at the time of the Kelly Michaels case. It stems from the coincidental fact that there was a Wee Care Child Care Center in Clifton, New Jersey—less than fifteen miles from the Wee Care Day Nursery where Kelly Michaels worked in Maplewood. (There was also a Wee Care Nursery School in nearby South Orange, run by the same organization that ran the Wee Care in Maplewood.) The fascinating but unnoticed "natural experiment" sheds light on whether strong concern about possible sexual abuse in a day-care center in New Jersey, when the Kelly Michaels case was unfolding, was likely to generate false allegations through anxious questioning by parents. When news of the Kelly Michaels case was first reported by a local newspaper in nearby Clifton in mid-August 1985, Leslie Kropinack, director of the Clifton school, was "besieged" with calls. "Several dozen parents were 'quite upset' after reading about the charges last week," she said.[95] They thought the charges stemmed from the Wee Care Child Care Center in Clifton. Of course, if there really were mass hysteria around Maplewood in the summer of 1985, then allegations of some sort would have been generated against at least one staff member at the day-care center. But that did not happen. Some, perhaps all, of the anxious parents in Clifton undoubtedly asked their children if anything bad had happened to them at school. Some undoubtedly used leading questions and were unwilling to accept an initial denial. But not a single one of those inquiries resulted in a reported accusation, even though this is the most common explanation in the witch-hunt narrative for how these cases begin.

Dade County at the Time of Country Walk

Strong rhetoric has also been used to assert there was public "hysteria" over child sexual abuse in Dade County, Florida, at the time of the Country Walk case (the subject of Chapter Six). Peter Boyer claimed, in his 1998 Frontline program called "The Child Terror," that a "fever in Miami" lasted from 1984 through 1991. The unusually long time period—eight years—was apparently selected to link the Bobby Finje case (which ended in an acquittal in 1991) with two cases from 1984 that Boyer cited as the proof of this "fever." The cases from 1984 were Country Walk and a home day-care involving Grant Snowden. Neither the Country Walk case nor the Snowden case has been accurately portrayed in the witch-hunt narrative.[96] But for the purpose of examining the broader claim about sex abuse hysteria, what is most interesting is the lack of any additional cases to prove the existence of a trend that allegedly lasted for eight years. Dade County is one of the largest in the United States; there were thousands of day-care centers in Dade at the time of Country Walk and thousands more home babysitting services. Yet, as far as can be ascertained from all major sources in the witch-hunt narrative, not a single one of those centers or babysitting services joined the three cases that Peter Boyer linked together years later.

There were three other day-care sexual abuse cases that received media attention in Miami in 1984. None of these cases provide support for the witch-hunt narrative. Indeed, all of them suggest the existence of social forces that run counter to those embodied in the witch-hunt narrative. The first of the three cases, in chronological order, involved allegations of sexual abuse at the Lehrman Day School, run by Temple Emmanuel in Miami.[97] The case had several notable features: it stayed out of the newspaper until the Country Walk case broke months later. The allegations did not expand or spread beyond the original claims. And most significantly, the case involved unequivocal medical proof of sexual abuse. The two-and-a-half-year-old boy who made the first allegations tested positive for gonorrhea of the throat. But the case turned out to prove the difficulty of prosecuting child sexual abuse cases, particularly with young victims. Even though the child had incontrovertible medical evidence and identified the suspect, there was insufficient evidence to prove a criminal case.[98] The boy was developmentally too young to testify, so the case was dismissed.

There were two other day-care cases involving allegations of abuse in the local news during the time of Country Walk. The first one, which emerged in August 1984, when Country Walk began generating headlines, involved the Turtle Top Day Nursery. The State Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services (DHRS) closed the school pending an investigation of "allegations that children have been severely spanked by the 70-year-old owner."[99] A week later, Circuit Court Judge Richard Hickey allowed the center to reopen, finding that the state had not gathered "substantive evidence" against A. Andrew Berent.[100] The DHRS investigators eventually collected statements from six children who had allegedly been "beaten, humiliated, and molested" by Berent.[101] The state scheduled a hearing to present the evidence in February 1985, and the center closed voluntarily a few weeks before the hearing. Accordingly, the evidence was never presented in a legal setting. No criminal charges were brought, and there is no other available information about the case beyond the media coverage. But it would hardly seem to be evidence of hysteria.

The final case arose in mid-July 1985 and involved the Hazel Crawford Day Care Center. This one is particularly important because it involved some of the same members of Janet Reno's staff who have been accused of "witch-hunting" in the Country Walk case. The case began with the arrest of Stephen Bergman by the North Miami Police Department, which charged he had sexually abused a four-year-old girl earlier that week.[102] In what might be the surest sign of an overreaction, two judges separately denied Bergman bail the next day. (Three days later, he was ordered released on his own recognizance.) A month after that, however, Christopher Rundle, an assistant state attorney for Dade County, announced that the state had declined to file charges.[103] He defended the initial arrest, explaining that the standard of evidence to arrest someone is much lower than the standard for filing a criminal case. Clearly, the state concluded that the child's statement was not clear or convincing enough to warrant prosecution. Some parents expressed outrage at the decision, and the family of the four-year-old girl filed a civil lawsuit against the Bergmans. Eventually, a six-person jury "took twenty minutes to clear a former North Miami Beach day care center operator of wrongdoing."[104] This decision was rendered in 1989, two years before the "fever" that allegedly gripped Southern Florida had broken. It would appear that the "hysteria" in this case involved one family; their initial statements were (appropriately) taken seriously by law enforcement, but after careful and expedient review it was decided not to prosecute. This seems to be the appropriate decision, and it was made by the same actors who Peter Boyer and others have claimed were so biased that they constantly "found" sexual abuse where it did not exist. It is difficult to square these three cases with the claim that the county was infected by hysteria during this time.

Boston at the Time of Amirault

The most publicized of day-care sexual abuse allegations in Massachusetts involved the Fells Acres Day School in Malden, Massachusetts, near Boston. The first allegations were made in the fall of 1984. The prosecution against the Amirault family, who owned and operated the center, lasted for years as there were ultimately four separate trials, all ending in conviction. Dorothy Rabinowitz has made the claim that the Amiraults were tried and convicted at a time when hysteria was rampant in Massachusetts.[105] Under this view, the social hysteria must have existed for more than five years, since that is how much time elapsed between the first trial and the final conviction. Without such an expansive view, it is difficult to explain how hysteria could account for the defendants all being convicted at their second trials.

But the evidence for sex abuse hysteria in Massachusetts is almost nonexistent. An article in the Boston Globe at the height of publicity about the Amirault case indicated that thirty-five facilities in Massachusetts had been investigated and four had been closed.[106] The Office for Children had jurisdiction over more than ten thousand day-care facilities at the time. The three facilities beyond the Amirault case have never been mentioned in the witch-hunt narrative, and there is no evidence in the public record to suggest they involved false accusations.

The possible exception is Caring for Kids, a day-care facility in Braintree, Massachusetts, that was included on Charlier and Downing's list of thirty-six cases. The allegations began with two children and eventually involved three others, although the parents of two of the children observed videotapes of their children being interviewed and concluded that no abuse had occurred. The community, however, was not "hysterical." Eighteen parents of children who attended the day-care centers testified in favor of Deborah Wingard, who operated two facilities under the name Caring for Kids. It is difficult to assess the case from existing DSS records alone, since they do not include a transcript of the ten-day administrative hearing. But Chief Administrative Magistrate Christopher F. Connolly, who presided over the appeal of the license suspension, concluded in July 1985 that "no sexual or physical abuse of children occurred at Caring for Kids, Inc."[107] A spokesman for the state licensing board said this was the system operating as it should; the licenses had been temporarily suspended for good cause and both were later reinstated after further investigations. There was no foregone conclusion of abuse since precisely the opposite was actually concluded. The center did not reopen, because Wingard moved away. Whatever one concludes about the underlying merits, the idea that the greater Boston area was swept up in some kind of mass hysteria does not fit the facts.

The only case beyond McMartin where the complaints at one facility actually spread to another one is the Georgian Hills case in Memphis, home of Charlier and Downing's newspaper. What happened in that case was a terrible injustice; fifteen employees at the Daybridge Daycare Center lost their jobs. But there were no other cases from the time period that had localized effects as severe as these two, and there is no evidence of widespread hysteria even in the same times and places where it was supposedly the worst.

"Air of Denial"

Beyond the evidence about specific places, there are powerful social forces, never acknowledged in the witch-hunt narrative, that also contradict the claims of "hysteria" and overreaction to allegations of child sexual abuse. Those forces were at work throughout the time of the alleged "modern American witch-hunts." Their origin is in the era before child sexual abuse was "recognized" as a social problem. The primary forces are secrecy, silence, and disbelief. These forces foster an "air of denial," the polar opposite of the "air of accusation" that practically defines the witch-hunt narrative.

Recognizing these factors is critical to placing the witch-hunt narrative in context. Vital to this understanding is some historical perspective that is sorely missing from the narrative. The emergence of the McMartin case coincided with the recognition of child sexual abuse as a social problem. A pivotal event in the process of social recognition was the television movie about incest called "Something About Amelia." Broadcast on January 9, 1984—less than a month before the first stories about the McMartin case were aired—the movie addressed what the New York Times called "undoubtedly the biggest of social taboos."[108] As nervous as the topic made television reviewers, it garnered an enormous audience, and hotlines were flooded with calls afterward. Later that month, Jeffrey Masson made headlines with scholarly revelations from the Freud archives about how Sigmund Freud lost his nerve and, in the face of intense criticism, turned away from recognizing the importance of child sexual abuse.[109] An excerpt from Masson's book The Assault on Truth: Freud's Suppression of the Seduction Theory was the cover story in The Atlantic magazine in February. The biggest of social taboos was suddenly in the news.

In understanding the events that came afterward, we should give consideration to the vast history during which child sexual abuse was not "recognized." The era is sometimes described such that it seems as if the only thing lacking was an "understanding" of the problem. This argument has been advanced in defense of the Catholic Church. For example, Philip Jenkins has written that the Church was essentially "guilty of applying standards that had prevailed before the revolution in social sensibilities."[110] (He squares this position with the fact that child sexual abuse has long been a crime by labeling it illegal "in the technical sense.") But there was also a remarkable denial of what was obvious—in broken bones, in venereal disease, and in incest victims. The "discovery" of the physical abuse of children came when pioneers in the field refused to ignore the implications of x-rays documenting broken bones. Masson reconstructed the efforts of two early French physicians to recognize the physical and sexual abuse of children in the late 1800s. Dr. Ambroise Tardieu recognized that the sexual assault of girls was often overlooked; similarly, Dr. Paul Brouardel was often "drawing the attention of his audience at autopsies to the abuse of children by their parents and teachers."[111] It would be more than fifty years before Dr. John Coffee, a radiologist in the United States, wrote an article in 1946 about abnormal bone fractures in infants.[112] It has been reported that the journals' editors "were so alarmed" at the implications of the study that "the eventual article did not contain references to intentional abuse."[113] Sixteen years later, Dr. Henry Kempe and his colleagues coined the phrase battered-child syndrome for the clinical condition of children who have suffered serious physical abuse.[114] The power of denial prevailed during those decades. History professor Lynn Sacco has documented how, during the twentieth century, "doctors refused to consider the possibility of incest" when new diagnostic procedures revealed gonorrhea infections in "respectable" families.[115] Rather than revise their views about the prevalence of incest, doctors speculated that perhaps the disease was transmitted by toilet seats. Harvard psychiatrist Judith Herman has written about how the profession still considered incest to be a rare occurrence, with a prevalence of maybe one in a million children, as recently as the 1950s.[116] This perception was off by a staggering amount—a multiple of tens of thousands.[117] Historian Linda Gordon has documented how case workers in Boston, during the Progressive Era, construed father-daughter incest as an encounter between a seductive and sexually precocious girl and a relatively innocent man.[118] Another historian, Estelle Freedman, has recounted how a major study of child sexual abuse and incest in the1950s described the majority of victims as "seductive" and "flirtatious," stigmatizing the victims as the perpetrators.[119] The social forces of silence and denial that explain this history should be kept in mind when considering the abrupt cultural change to the intense media spotlight on sexual abuse in January 1984.

None of those forces are acknowledged in the versions of history that describe the middle to late 1980s as a period of witch-hunts over child sexual abuse. Instead, the entire view of our social response to child sexual abuse is wrapped up in words such as hysteria. Indeed, the witch-hunt narrative is built on the notion that child sexual abuse suddenly became overreported. A primary target in this narrative is Dr. Roland Summit, a psychiatrist who published an influential article in 1983 about what he called the "Child Abuse Accommodation Syndrome."[120] Summit advanced a theory about how children come to "accommodate" sexual abuse—that is, how sexual abuse can continue to be perpetrated without children telling anyone. The first component in his framework is secrecy. Summit theorized that "attempts by the child to illuminate the secret will be countered by an adult conspiracy of silence and disbelief."

Lee Coleman, a psychiatrist hired by the defense in the Country Walk case and many others, began attacking this idea in 1986. Speaking at a convention of the political advocacy group Victims of Child Abuse Laws (VOCAL), Coleman allowed that this dynamic might happen within families, but he mocked the idea that it would happen in other contexts as "totally ludicrous." It "makes absolutely no sense," he argued, that this would happen when the allegation involves a teacher, coach, or virtually anyone else who might be accused in an institutional context.[121] Coleman and others have belittled the idea of "denial," arguing instead that, particularly in an institutional context, adults invariably overreact to children's disclosures rather than ignore or deny them. The "air of accusation" is a primary component in the hysteria claim that has been widely accepted in the years since the McMartin case ended. Richard Gardner made this argument in his 1991 book Sex Abuse Hysteria: Salem Witch Trials Revisited. Charles Krauthammer relied on the same idea to argue in 1993 that "we have become exquisitely over-sensitized" to child abuse.[122]

There is no question that the McMartin case was characterized by an air of accusation in the months when the case became a national news story and was rushed to the grand jury. The concept has little or no application, however, to many other cases advanced by the witch-hunt narrative, where the initial accusations involved one or two related people and did not spread beyond that, regardless of the intensity of community concern and publicity. Moreover, the opposite phenomenon—an air of denial—is apparent in countless institutional abuse cases. This is what explains hundreds of pedophile priests who operated with impunity for decades in a variety of jurisdictions. It also explains how hundreds of pedophile Boy Scout leaders could operate for decades without being apprehended.[123]

The air of denial is fueled by a sense of disbelief that adults, particularly those in positions of trust, could do horrible things to children. This is precisely how Barry Seigel, in his book A Death in White Bear Lake, explained a family physician seeing horrendous physical signs of abuse but not comprehending that the cause was intentional.[124] There was a "sense of disbelief" that anything so awful could be happening. The same phenomenon explains how Waneta Hoyt could be accepted as "the unluckiest woman in America" when she actually killed all five of her children over time.[125] Her family was long considered as case evidence that Sudden Infant Death Syndrome must be genetic. The physicians' "disbelief" of the abuse hypothesis in both cases might be written off as a product of the time. The murder described in Seigel's 1990 book was more than twenty-one years old; Hoyt's crimes also went undetected for nearly twenty years. But a comprehensive study of death certificates published by the Gannett News

Service in 1990 concluded that at least half of child-abuse deaths go undetected. This study was based on 49,569 death certificates in 1987, one of the years the witch-hunt narrative places at the height of hysteria about child abuse.[126] Yet, when writing about the exaggerated abduction figures that were widely accepted in the early 1980s, Philip Jenkins concluded that "children are at a low risk for homicide."[127] In his careful analysis of official statistics, there is no mention of the idea that such statistics might significantly underreport this crime. The reasons for the underreporting subvert his entire argument about hysteria.

A sense of disbelief can also arise if the person charged with sexual abuse does not fit social stereotypes of sex offenders. This sense of disbelief is particularly likely to happen in institutional settings because offenders tend to "groom" both victims and parents in order to avoid detection. An academic study of admitted child molesters examined this process in detail; the men studied "described themselves as charming, nice, and likeable."[128] Norman Watson, who molested hundreds of boys over several decades as a Little League coach, described the same process in a 1999 prison interview with Sports Illustrated.[129] Watson molested boys without any consequences through all of the years described as "hysterical" by Drs. Coleman and Gardner—and he was in the same part of Southern California described as the epicenter of this phenomenon. Watson was apprehended because a man he had molested twenty-three years earlier, and whose children had reached Little League age, hired a private investigator to look into his "nagging" and unresolved feelings about the matter.

A football coach in Pennsylvania was apprehended in a similar, but less deliberate, way. Richard Hoffman wrote a personal memoir that involved abuse in his childhood. He did not know that the abuser, John E. Feifel, was still coaching (and still abusing boys), but his book resulted in the man's apprehension and conviction.[130] The witch-hunt narrative contains no social or psychological explanations for how such abuse could go on undetected for so many years, particularly years when sex abuse hysteria supposedly gripped the country. The reality is that the witch-hunt narrative is underinclusive and incomplete. However accurate its description is in a few select cases, it misses important dynamics that explain many other cases. The disbelief that a "respectable" person would sexually assault a child was widespread during the 1980s (and later), and it worked in the favor of many child molesters.

This myth has been used in telling many of the alleged witch-hunt cases—as if having a steady job or being a professional rules out being a child molester. In fact, the cover of respectability is often an integral part of grooming parents, avoiding detection, and manipulating victims. In her initial article about "Junior McMartins," Debbie Nathan argued that these cases were impossible to believe in part because the alleged perpetrators were "white and middle class"—"in short, the last people you'd associate with sleazy trench coated pedophiles."[131]

This time-worn cliché of pedophiles fails to recognize how child molesters actually gain access to children. It is not by lurking around in "sleazy trench coats." From detailed interviews with child molesters in treatment, Carla Van Dam documents how they "groom adults" in order to obtain access to children; the grooming involves presenting yourself in a likeable way and "providing timely and appreciated assistance." As an assistant prosecutor in Delaware explained, "Nice guys make good child sex abusers. Kids don't like mean, nasty guys."[132] Neither do the adults who are critical to gaining access to children. Nathan's way of thinking is precisely what pedophiles bank on—that they appear to be so unlikely to have sexual interest in children that any allegations to this effect are quickly dismissed as improbable.

The witch-hunt narrative also suggests that children easily disclose sexual abuse, dismissing the significance of the forces of secrecy, fear, and shame. Consider this explanation by Professor Maggie Bruck in the Edenton, North Carolina, daycare case involving Robert Kelly:

> Q: Would it be fair to say that one of the least favorite subjects, ah, to talk about, whether it's with their own parents or, ah, stranger would be anything that occurred to them of a sexual nature?
> A: Oh, I don't agree with you, Mr. Hart. I think that children, in fact, love to talk about those kind of things especially among themselves. . . .
> Q: Tell me, Doctor, from your experience how great a time would a child have going and telling her friends and neighbors and other people about having someone stick his finger up their butt, how much glee would be involved in that?
> A: You know, I don't know, Mr. Hart, but if they get a good laugh from their friends and if it could be something that would make them a really important kid and that their friends could all jump in and say is that what happened to you, I've got an even better one, it would be a really great topic of conversation.[133]

But survey evidence illustrates quite the opposite. Victims of sexual abuse typically do not "love to talk about it"; rather, they avoid reporting and often disclose the information to no one.[134] Aside from the issues of embarrassment and humiliation that Bruck does not recognize, children who report sexual abuse can also face indifference, or worse. Turning a blind eye against such allegations is the response in many institutions where the allegations are seen primarily as a threat to the organization's well-being. It is a common dynamic in families as well. Pursuing allegations against "upstanding" perpetrators can trigger hostility and pressure to drop the charges. In short, although the witch-hunt narrative is built around the idea that an "air of accusation" has led to countless false accusations, this account overlooks powerful countervailing social forces that often create an air of denial and indifference.

Examples of this kind of denial abound, even in the years when the witch-hunt narrative claims there was hysteria in the opposite direction. James Joseph O'Boyle, a respected police officer in East Rockhill Township, Pennsylvania, counted on this phenomenon while abusing scores of boys in the 1980s. "Denial was just the reaction O'Boyle correctly assumed people would have," wrote Stephen Fried in a chilling investigative story in Philadelphia magazine.[135] "There were cops who looked the other way, employers who didn't make routine background checks, reporters who knew but didn't or couldn't write the story."[136] A comparable case emerged from Hapeville, Georgia, in 1994, when Walter P. West pleaded guilty to thirty-three counts of child molestation, ending a long pattern of sexual abuse that covered all the years of the McMartin case. "Officials were told of numerous accusations of possible child abuse by a Hapeville police officer but failed to act," reported the Atlanta Constitution.[137]

In 1986, Calvin Trillin described a case in The New Yorker in which authorities in the Mormon Church and local law enforcement in Redmond, Oregon, turned a blind eye on a "valued member of the community," Ed Dyer. Dyer was scoutmaster of the church's Boy Scout Troop 26. In 1982, the parents of a boy in the troop informed the local bishop that Dyer had made sexual advances toward their son. After establishing that "there were other stories," the church asked Dyer to resign. They did not inform local authorities, however; nor was Dyer excommunicated. "It's just something you don't want to believe has happened," a church member later explained to Trillin.[138] A year after that, the church undertook a more serious investigation, resulting in a thirty-page dossier, including tape recordings, proving "a pattern that went back at least twenty-five years." Dyer was eventually "disfellowshipped" from the church, but he continued to have access to boys through his work with the U.S. Forest Service. In the spring of 1984, when the McMartin case was all over the national news, someone in the church with detailed information about Dyer tried to get the Redmond Police to investigate the matter. But nothing happened. The reason was never specified. Trillin speculated that:

> The police were reluctant to launch a vigorous investigation of good old Ed Dyer or that, like some members of the church, they were simply unable to face the possibility that what was being said about the man who had been entrusted with so many boys for so many years was true.[139]

That such sentiments would prevent action from being taken in a case involving a man with a long, documented history of predatory behavior contradicts everything the witch-hunt narrative claims about social responses to child sexual abuse in 1984. When new allegations reached the state police more than a year later, Dyer was arrested. After pleading guilty to two counts of second-degree sexual abuse, Dyer was sentenced to a total of twenty days, with three years of probation—less than three weeks in jail.

Faced with a child disclosing sexual abuse, many adults would respond, both within families and in institutions, by avoiding "getting involved." Mandatory reporting laws are aimed at addressing this problem. The witch-hunt narrative is built around the idea that sexual abuse is often tragically overreported. But this position overlooks the immense evidence of underreporting. Survey data consistently indicates that mandated reporters underreport their suspicions. A Rand Corporation survey of twelve hundred pediatricians, child psychologists, social workers, school principals, and child-care providers found that about 40 percent "had at least once suspected child abuse but failed to report it."[140]

Though there are penalties for failure to report suspected cases of child abuse, there are few reported cases of prosecution for failure to report. And the few cases that have gone forward have generally been unsuccessful even in the face of substantial evidence—bearing out a social reluctance to punish anyone for this behavior. Jason Berry, in the first major exposé of the Catholic Church, documented widespread failure to report known pedophiles. Patrick Boyle, reporting on more than two hundred confidential files, described a similar phenomenon in the Boy Scouts. Reflecting the social reluctance to criticize those who fail to act, a book review of Scout's Honor said it "falls short on the level of outrage" provoked by Berry's book because "the sins seem primarily ones of omission."[141] Many of those sins of omission occurred in the mid-1980s, when cases like McMartin and Jordan, Minnesota, were dominating the news.

Similar events occurred in Florida. In April 1988, an anonymous source informed local police about a complaint made to school authorities by the parent of a second-grade girl at the Nativity School in Hollywood. The school principal had not informed authorities, as required by law, of the complaint against Edward Charles White, known to the students as "Mr. Ed." Detectives eventually discovered that White had been "discharged or terminated" from four other schools in the archdiocese between 1962 and 1976. Church records did not include any explanation. The investigation led to White's arrest on charges of sexually abusing twelve children. Some charges had to be dropped because of a restrictive statute of limitations; White pleaded guilty to others. The Hollywood police said that officials of the Nativity School "should be charged with failing to report suspected child molesting."[142] As a local newspaper editorial pointed out, "no one at Hollywood's Nativity School wanted to think the unthinkable." No one was charged; yet this unwillingness to "think the unthinkable" took place during the time when Peter Boyer later claimed a "fever" of sex-abuse hysteria was gripping South Florida.

A case that became public in the small town of Boulder, Montana, also demonstrated the power of denial during the same era. Douglas Marks, a "widely admired" elementary school teacher and member of a prominent local family, was arrested in 1989 on four counts of felony sexual assault against four of his students between 1985 and 1989. Marks had been sexually abusing children for decades; court records listed twenty-two accusations dating back to 1956. County Attorney Rich Llewellyn identified forty-five victims, but there were probably many more. The fathers of two of the boys involved in the 1989 charges had themselves been victims. The extent to which officials turned a blind eye to Marks is stunning. He was first apprehended for sexual abuse in 1959; no charges were brought, but he was forced to take an "indefinite leave" from Jefferson High School. He was later hired at the elementary school.

Over the years, "people went to officials and said things, but nobody paid attention."[143] Paul Myrhow, who was molested by Marks in the early 1980s, reported him in 1985 to Daryl Craft, a longtime friend who had become deputy sheriff. As reported in the press years later, "Craft did not doubt the story—he, too, had been molested by Marks." But the complaint did not result in an arrest. Myrhow went back to authorities in 1989. The four charges that were later brought against Marks were all based on events that had occurred since his report in 1985. Marks pleaded guilty to four counts of felony sexual assault and was sentenced to twenty years.[144] School board chairman David Reiter said later "it was fairly common knowledge of his sexual preferences." Why was nothing done, even after a report in 1985? "I think there is a tendency for everyone to submerge these bad thoughts," he said.[145] In other words, even at a time of alleged hysteria about child sexual abuse, it was easier to turn a blind eye than deal with a known pedophile.

The same disturbing behavior was documented through an eight-month investigation by two reporters at the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette who examined allegations of sexual misconduct against school teachers. They concluded, "When teachers are accused of sexual misconduct, some school officials and school boards quietly sidestep legal and ethical issues to protect their schools from scandal."[146] The study was published in 1996, four years after Dr. Richard Gardner flatly asserted it is "no longer the case" that those revealing sexual abuse will be met with a disbelieving community. Gardner claimed the opposite was true, that police and child protective services were more likely to "accept as valid even frivolous and absurd accusations."[147] But Hargrove and Roth found that "sexual allegations by students have been greeted with shrugs, although a teacher's files indicated previous sex-related complaints." There is no reason to think this phenomenon was peculiar to Arkansas.

The witch-hunt narrative is further contradicted by the intense pressure families have experienced to withdraw sexual abuse charges, particularly against "beloved" figures like coaches, teachers, scout leaders, and choir masters. When a twelve-year-old girl in Florida disclosed that Ronald Bach, a popular physical education teacher at Miami Springs Middle School, had sexually abused her, the community rallied around Bach. The family was ostracized. Later, Bach pleaded guilty.[148] A family in Barrington, Rhode Island, experienced the same thing when their child spoke out against Carlton Bittenbender, a popular Boy Scout leader who has since been proven to be a serial child molester.[149] To these families, the witch-hunt narrative is a cruel misrepresentation of social pressures that, in their experience, are the complete opposite of "overly sensitive" to sexual abuse.

Difficulties Prosecuting Child Abuse

The witch-hunt narrative also contains a significant myth about prosecuting child sexual abuse: that these cases are somehow "easy." Kim Hart of VOCAL was quoted in Charlier and Downing's series as saying that legal reforms to accommodate child witnesses are "just an easy way to get an easy win."[150] Debbie Nathan's first article in her witch-hunt oeuvre was captioned: "Gayle Dove and Mickey Noble had their day in court. But what difference does that make, when you've been labeled a daycare child molester?"[151] In other words, defendants stand virtually no chance of prevailing when charged with sexual abuse in a daycare center. This is a convenient argument to make when one is arguing that someone was falsely convicted. But Nathan provided no data on conviction rates to support her claim. Entirely lost in the witch-hunt narrative is a sense of how hard it actually is to win a child sexual abuse case. In the case Nathan wrote about, Noble's conviction in that trial was overturned on appeal, and she was acquitted in a second trial, seemingly contradicting the notion that these charges bring an automatic conviction. Dove's conviction was overturned on appeal; she was convicted a second time, and the conviction was also overturned on appeal. Charges were later dropped. The case poses an important question about uses and limits of evidence concerning children not named in the charges at hand.[152] Reasonable people can disagree about where courts should draw such a line. Seeing the case for those issues, however, highlights the difficulty in proving sexual abuse cases involving multiple children, something never acknowledged in the witch-hunt narrative.

The complexity and challenge of proceeding with young victims has been overlooked by proponents of the witch-hunt narrative. Many states also had age limits or competency requirements that kept children under the age of seven out of court. It was effectively open season on those children since they had little possibility of legal recourse. States that switched to a case-by-case approach accommodated younger children, but some children will always be too young to testify. In some cases this problem has been misinterpreted as evidence of a witch-hunt. The Presidio Child Development Center case in San Francisco is a primary example. Six children tested positive for a sexually transmitted disease and dozens more were thought to have been sexually abused in 1986, but charges were dropped (because the children's testimony was "too vague.") That fact apparently explains why this case has appeared on several lists of so-called witch-hunts. But as Captain David Fox, a physician and father of children who attended the facility, told the press, "Just because this case didn't reach prosecution, doesn't mean that it didn't happen."[153] Unfortunately, this distinction is often blurred in the witch-hunt narrative, where dropping charges is routinely considered as proof that charges had no basis in fact.

Cheryl McCall highlighted a similar tragedy in the December 1984 issue of Life magazine, describing a case prosecutors declined to accept because the witnesses were too young, even though the family court had found:

> that over a period of three years [a father] had sexually abused his daughters in many ways, cruelly forced them to take part in and observe other vile acts and permitted his uncle similarly to abuse the girls in his presence.[154]

These kinds of stories are told in the media only relatively rarely; indeed, they have been overshadowed in an avalanche of articles about hysteria and witch-hunts.

Another case like this, also lost to virtually every historical account of day-care abuse in the 1980s, is the Sugar Plum School House in Lake Worth, Florida. The case began when a mother alleged that her three-year-old daughter told her "Ba Ba Blue" had "poked a hole in her bottom." The mother indicated that the man who co-owned and operated the center responded to that name. The girl was examined by Dr. Donald T. Drummond, who found a tear in her hymen that indicated recent trauma.[155] The man was arrested November 23, and the school held an informational meeting for parents on November 27. At least two other families came forward after the meeting. Their children were interviewed by the police, and both children apparently implicated the same man.[156] An investigation by Child Protective Services resulted in a finding that sexual abuse was "indicated."[157] Using enrollment information provided by the Department of Health and Rehabilitation, the state attorney's office endeavored to contact 120 people. A small number were never reached, but virtually everyone who was reached reported their child had indicated nothing about abuse. It is worth pondering the significance of this result since the argument in several other cases is that anxious parents caused their children to respond in the affirmative. These parents were presumably no less anxious or concerned, and yet this widespread parental interview process produced no additional reports.

These results apparently puzzled the grand jury as much as they puzzled a reporter who later obtained as many documents as possible. The grand jury issued two findings on March 17, 1989: (1) the owner and operator of the school was "completely innocent" of any and all charges, as were other teachers and staff at the school; and (2) the child who triggered the investigation "has been sexually abused."[158] Perhaps the child was abused elsewhere; perhaps the grand jury was wrong about part of its findings. Either way, the age of the child made it impossible to ascertain with any more certainty where and how she sustained what one expert diagnosed as a repeated trauma to the vagina. The failure of justice in this case, however, was to the child whose story has been lost in accounts of the 1980s that reflexively label day-care cases as witch-hunts.

Courts have made various accommodations for children as witnesses since the early 1980s. Many states had "corroboration requirements" that required evidence beyond a child's word in order to file sexual abuse charges. Elizabeth Holtzman, the Brooklyn district attorney, told the New York Times in July 1983 that there were "at least 24 cases in the borough last year that could not be prosecuted" because of this requirement.[159] Jeanine Pirro, chief of the Domestic Violence Prosecution Unit in Westchester County, estimated that twenty cases a month could not be prosecuted because of this requirement. These numbers would translate into thousands of cases across the country that could not be pursued even though prosecutors thought the evidence was strong. Yet in the absence of such a requirement, there were jury instructions that routinely warned jurors in child molestation cases that without corroboration the word of a child was not as worthy of belief as the word of an adult. The "cautionary instruction" that was used in California reads:

> Corroboration of the testimony of a child under the age of fourteen years upon and with whom a lewd and lascivious act is alleged to have been committed is not essential to a conviction. However, a charge of committing a lewd and lascivious act is one which is easily made and, once made, is difficult to defend against even if the person accused is innocent. The law requires that you examine with caution the testimony of the child with whom the lewd and lascivious act is alleged to have been committed.[160]

This instruction tilts the proceedings in favor of the defendant. Although the California Supreme Court ruled in 1975 that this instruction was inappropriate, Judge Bob Hight agreed to use this instruction ten years later in Michael Ruby's case, stemming from Manhattan Ranch Preschool.[161] The case went to trial while the McMartin case was still in preliminary hearing stage, and it ended in a hung jury. Reforming such laws, as happened throughout the country during the McMartin era, did not magically eliminate the prejudices that created them in the first place. But to listen to the witch-hunt narrative, one would think any accusation by a child is almost automatically believed in court.

Another accommodation that courts made to the testimony of children was to loosen requirements about specifying the precise dates of any alleged misconduct. Children do not have datebooks; nor do they have the same sense of time that adults do. Many cases in the 1980s were dismissed, or the conviction was reversed, on the grounds that the time frame had not been specified narrowly enough. The Tots 'N' Toddlers Center in Berlin, New Jersey, was closed in March 1985 by a superior court judge after an investigation by the New Jersey Division of Youth and Family Services. A grand jury indicted Robert and Nancy Knighton on charges of sexually abusing seven children between 1981 and 1984. The criminal charges were eventually dismissed, however, because of an appellate decision in a separate case requiring the prosecution to specify the exact days when the alleged abuse occurred. Requirements about specifying the time and date of the allegations were later relaxed in child sexual abuse cases. Some of the convictions against James Watt (discussed in Chapter Three) in White Plains, New York, were overturned on the same grounds, even though a number of those charges included strong medical evidence of abuse. (Watt's conviction was upheld on one charge.) One of the "Bronx Five" cases was also overturned on these grounds. The first sentence in the appellate court decision reads:

> The record in this case unequivocally indicates that defendant, a teacher's aide at the Puerto Rican Association for Community Action Day Care Center (PRACA), engaged in criminal activity involving the rape, sodomy and sexual abuse of innocent, defenseless children between the ages of three and five years.[162]

But the court then indicated it was forced to reverse the convictions because the charges were framed as a "continuing course of conduct" and the "time interval alleged in each count was so excessive as to be unreasonable." The court's own reading of the facts suggests this case was not a witch-hunt but rather a monument to the difficulty in charging a case that involves young children.

There was a final reform, widely supported by parents and many legislators in the 1980s, that was supposed to ease the discomfort of testifying in court. Many states adopted laws permitting children to testify by closed-circuit television. This would allow them to testify without having to stare at the defendant or appear in the actual courtroom. The use of closed-circuit television was seen by many as an infringement on a defendant's right to confront witnesses, even though the reform did not exempt the child from cross-examination; it only exempted the child from having to look directly at the defendant.[163] But prosecutors in many cases were too worried that convictions won through closed-circuit television would be voided. And indeed, this is what happened. The Craig's Preschool case, analyzed in Chapter Three, was remanded to the trial court on grounds that had nothing to do with the strength of the state's evidence; the court required "case-specific findings" to justify the use of closed-circuit television, and the prosecution later decided against trying to reconvict Craig.[164] The U.S. Constitution was read to require the confrontation of witnesses in person, unless there is a specific showing that doing so would be traumatic. The catch-22 is that proving the existence of trauma basically requires a process resembling the kind of trial one is presumably trying to avoid. So even if the state prevails, the end result is still two court proceedings, not one. This explains why one of the major innovations in the 1980s, designed to minimize trauma, is almost never used.
